To the Editor of the "Age."

Sir:—The contribution in the 'Age" of 9th inst., reporting the Rev. Mr. Brazier's sermon upon Spiritualism was interesting, much of which was in my own line of thought, such as that "our departed friends exist," and that they "exist in conscious and intelligent state." He might have gone further, and said that in Biblical times there were trances and visions, and the gift of tongues and healing, and the "discerning of spirits (I Cor., xii: 10), and inasmuch as spiritual beings communed with mankind in the past, should they not still continue to communicate with mankind? They do thus communicate. There are thousands—aye, millions—in the most enlightened countries in the world noted for their intelligence, conspicuous for their integrity, famous for their scientific attainments, prominent for their good moral characters and scholarly research, who will solemnly testify that after years of candid investigation, and upon strictly scientific principles, they have demonstrated the truth of present-day spiritual manifestations—manifestations from their friends whose bodies rest beneath the willows. The testimony of these millions is as direct and overwhelming as it is unimpeachable. Both Spiritualism and theosophy are the direct antitheses of materialism. Take Spiritualism from the Bible and you rob it of all life, for it is the "spirit that giveth life." The primitive Christians were religious Spiritualists. When John was about to worship a spirit whom he took to be God, the voice said, "See thou do it not, for I am thy fellow-servant and of thy brethren the prophets." On the mountain of Transfiguration there appeared in glory two men (long dead) Moses and Elias, and "behold they talked," and so forth.

True, as the Rev. Mr. Brazier states, there were, and there are, evil spirits. No intelligent Spiritualist denies this, and the Roman Catholic Church has had its exorcists for the casting out of these obsessing spirits. Hence it is wise, as the apostle taught, to "try the spirits." But Spiritualists as a body do not "deny that Jesus Christ was the Son of God;" but do deny that He was the very God. They accept these words of Peter—Jesus Christ, "a man approved of God by wonders," and so forth. Personally, and most emphatically, do I believe that "Jesus Christ came in the flesh, and that he reigns to-day in the heavens," the brightness of the Father's glory. There are, be it said with sorrow, spiritists—not Spiritualists—who deny that Jesus Christ existed. This is the output of a painful ignorance. Spiritism should never be confounded with Spiritualism. The two words are not synonymous. Spiritism is little more than Babylonian or Judaistic necromancy, telling fortunes, hunting coal fields, and divining for selfish purposes.

Spiritualism and true Christianity are in perfect accord. And certainly Spiritualists believe that they should "try the spirits"—test the communicating spirits; and they also believe in testing Spiritualists themselves, as to whether or not they "walk in the spirit"—the spirit of truth, integrity, purity and love. And they further believe in trying or testing Christians—Christian believers—and they test them by these words of Jesus Christ, "And these signs shall follow them that believe in My name, they shall cast out devils (demons, obsessing spirits); they shall speak with new tongues. * * * They shall lay hands on the sick, and they shall recover." Do these signs, these phenomena, follow Christians to-day? Here is a further test of a Christian rule laid down by Christ:—"Verily he that believeth on Me the works that I do shall he do also, and greater works than these shall he do, because I go unto my Father" (John xiv:12). This language cannot be misunderstood. Do Christians do these "greater works"? Will they turn to II Corinthians, xiii: 5, where they will read: —"Examine yourselves whether ye be in the faith."

"Swedenborg, who consciously conversed with the spirits from both the heavens and the hells for 27 years, wisely opposed promiscuous spirit intercourse for selfish, sordid interests. I do the same. It was really unfortunate in Mr. Brazier to be so deceived by a spirit—"a lying spirit"—and in my opinion the only way to effectually prevent lying spirits from returning to earth and communicating is for our world to prevent sending so many conscienceless liars over into the spirit world. Is it not possible that this lying spirit that deceived Brother Brazier was the very spirit—or one of that class—whom the Lord sent forth to persuade Ahab? These are the words: "Now, therefore, behold the Lord hath put a lying spirit in the mouth of these thy prophets, and the Lord hath spoken evil concerning thee," and Jeremiah exclaimed from the depths of a sorrowing soul, "Oh, Lord, thou hast deceived me and I was deceived."

"It should be understood that dying effects no moral or spiritual change in a human being. They all take with them to the future life their consciousness, their memories and their tendencies, and they retain them until they progress and unfold, becoming more Christ-like. To this end Jesus Christ, we are told, descended into hell (Hades) and preached to the "spirits in prison," and the fact of this preaching implies future repentance and progress.

Spiritualism has come to stay. It is the genuine gospel of the Christ. It is God's living witness of a future conscious existence. It reproves the erring, comforts the sick, and dries the mourner's tears, and is making rapid strides throughout the world. Archdeacon Colley, of England, is preaching it in unmistakable language from his pulpit. The vicar, or rector, of Emmanuel Church, Boston, America, is preaching the ministry of spirits and the laying on of hands. The philosophy of Spiritualism is similar to the new theology of the Rev. Mr. Campbell. It is liberal Christianity in its pristine purity, and is destined to uplift humanity and usher in the millennial age of human brotherhood and a present heaven of peace and good will to men.—Yours, etc.,

A VERY IMPORTANT MATTER.

What Is the Present Status of Spiritualism?

It is to be hoped that the Spiritualists of the United States have some pride in presenting their movement to the world as it really is in respect to numbrs, societies, and wealth, Up to the present time, less than one-third of the 760 societies in the United States have made their returns to the Census Bureau. Naturally, many interested people are asking if less than one-third of our leaders have any love for their religion. It rests with the Spiritualists to have their movement properly presented in the report of the Director of the Census.

Mr. North is doing everything in his power to collect reliable statistics with regard to Spiritualism. I have done my best to aid him; I have sent out over 600 letters of inquiry to which very few replies have been received. Some of the good people to whom I have written inform me that they are too busy to furnish desired information; others write long letters about their societies but do not fill the cards as requested; others still make no reply whatever.

It is probable that some of the people to whom these letters go, think that they are getting even with the N. S. A., or spiting its President, by refraining from giving attention to these important letters. They are simply injuring the cause they profess to love by withholding the desired facts. Neither the N. S. A. nor its President, gains anything prsonally by receiving these communications. The statistics gathered are turned over to the government by whose clerks compilations are made, showing the standing of Spiritualism in our country.

It should be a matter of pride to all Spiritualists to have their religion stand on equal footing with other denominations by having authenticated data placed in the hands of the government. Is it not the duty of the officers of all local societies and camp meetings to make returns at the earliest possible moment in harmony with facts? Why should not all the members of the Board of Trustees of the N. S. A., likewise the members of all State Boards, be willing to aid in this good work?

We have very few days remaining in which to report the facts regarding the various activities connected with the Spiritualistic movement. Prompt action is now ncessary. I appeal therefore, to the officers of all the local societies, and other associations, to fill the cards forwarded them, according to instructions, and mail them at once to me. Credit is given to everyone who makes returns for his local organization. I am gaining nothing for myself by doing this work; it is for Spiritualism that this added labor has been undertaken. Unless there is co-operation on the part of all local workers, Spiritualism will make a poorer showing in the census report of the present year than it did in the one made by Supt. Porter, in 1890.

Spiritualists, will you not arouse yourselves to the duty of the hour by giving your immediate attention to this important work? It will be your fault if your religion shows a falling off where it should show a decided gain. Once more let me urge you to give this matter considerate attention.

Yours for Spiritualism,
HARRISON D. BARRETT.

Poem by Theodore Tilton.

I stood beside a burial urn
And thought how life is but a day,
And how the nations each in turn
Have lived and passed away.

The earth is peopled with the dead
Who live again in deathless hosts,
And come and go with noiseless tread,
A universe of ghosts.

They follow after flying ships,
They flicker through the city's marts,
They hear the cry of human lips,
The throb of human hearts.

They waken us at morning light,
They cheer us in our daily care;
They bring a weary world at night
To bow the knee in prayer.

Their mission is of heaven assigned,
To comfort sorrow 'til it cease,
And in the dark and troubled mind
To light the lamp of peace.

Oh, what a wondrous life is theirs,
To fling away their mortal frame,
Yet keep their human loves and cares
And yearnings still the same.

Oh, what a wondrous life is ours,
To dwell within this mortal range,
Yet parley with the heavenly powers,
Two worlds in interchange.

So leaning on the burial urn,
I thought how life has double worth
If man were only wise to learn
That heaven is on the earth.

THE CAUSE AT LOS ANGELES, CALIFORNIA.

Communication from Mrs. E. G. Howe.

During the last few weeks the cause of Spiritualism in Los Angeles has been attracting much interest among the outside people. The Truthseeker's Society, the oldest in the city, has had such speakers as J. J. Dryden, Dr. Adah Patterson, Emilie Kratz, and Lettie M. Allen.

The Society of Spiritual Progression has a regular pastor in Mary C. Vlasek, who, in addition to her duties in connection with her society, is the conductor of the Union Lyceum, the only lyceum in Los Angeles. This society has also a Ladies' Auxiliary, The Sunshine Club, which is organized for, and does, a great deal of charitable work in Los Angeles. A Young People's League was recently organized in connection with this work, with 36 members, which affiliated with the State Association on May 12, with special services. The Ladies' Auxiliary to the Truth Seekers, "The Guiding Star," held a basket picnic at the Spiritualist camp grounds at Edendale on May 30, at which time they presented the camp association with a large American flag. Arthur S. Howe, president of the State Association, presided, and made the presentation speech for the Guiding Star Association, of which he is a member, which was ably responded to by the president of the camp association, Arthur Prentice.

The day was a most enjoyable one, although the recent exposure and arrest for not paying a license had brought among a few of the Spiritualists a little discord, which, however, was on the outside, and did not interfere with the meeting.

At the present time the movement in Los Angeles is one of complete harmony among the affiliated societies, although the city officials are compelling a few to pay the license of thirty dollars a month or leave the city; it is hoped that as an organized movement we may soon receive recognition.

There are a few self-styled Spiritualists in this city who do not belong to any society, are not interested in consolidation of effort, and who through their own classification of everything into one class, and that Spiritualism, which has been very misleading to the general public, as well as to Spiritualists themselves, who were not in touch with the organized movement.

We have had in this city for some few months Hugh R. Moore, recently of New York, who, while he has been known in the East as a Spiritualist, came to this city and established a "Church of Humanity," and as he did not affiliate with the Societies, they paid no attention to his work, although through recent exposure by those who feel it their duty to expose such impostors who work under the cloak of Spiritualism, Mr. and Mrs. Moore were classed as with the Spiritualists.

The enclosed copy from the Los Angeles Herald of June 5 will explain the position of the State Association Board. All who claim Spiritualism as their religion are not working with the organization of Spiritualism, and while we deplore the fact, we are unable at present to do more than protect those who are, and do work for it.

A mass meeting was held at Long Beach on Sunday, June 2, which was one of the best we have held.

Three sessions were held, and each was well attended, and many were turned away in the evening for lack of room, although the Odd Fellows' Hall is a large one. This society was recently organized, and bids fair to be a strong one. Other locations in California are awakening to the fact that the only protection, as well as recognition, to the Spiritualist movement, can only be obtained by a more united and uniform effort for organization, and are uniting with the State Association for more efficient work and a greater protection for the worker. A SPIRITUAL MESSAGE.

The Progress of Soul Development Is An Impulse of the Infinite.

Every created soul has an atmosphere, an aura of its own. During life the concentrating and refining forces constitute a self-restoring power. In all processes of life the spiritual essences are evolved containing the elements of form, consistence, color—all the characteristics of life they represent. The rose has within the spirit germs of the whole family of roses. The lily—the peerless immortal flower—has the undying essence of purity and beauty to become embodied in still finer life through all spiritual spheres and conditions. All evolve the elements of form, character, to be reincarnated into finer forms, re-endowed with conscious life of immortality. Animals, vegetables and minerals are endowed with immortal life and being.

The spiritual essences are delicate, fine, formed of ethereal elements, transfused in harmony, beauty and inconceivable superiority of indestructible life.

Thus with the soul, evolved in the current of magnetic force, it brings forth the material for reincarnation, walks forth amid the beauty of a true reincarnation which is the keystone of the arch that unfolds the true faith in immortality. The soul cannot be corrupted or destroyed; it is the life inspiration and fulfillment—eternal unfoldment, the reincarnation.

Folded close within the soul is the organism of a true humanity. The soul develops according to the laws of its own life—its capacity and progress. The progress of soul development is an impulse of the infinite—wave meets wave with intensified emotion, thought stirs the soul with infinite love. Sympathy and love are the great powers of life.

Love generates spiritual radiance which transcends expression. Every true aspiration clothes the soul in brightness. The tender blooms of flowers are like living sunbeams where color blends in perfect harmony with ethereal vibrations. Through the mist of new-born harmonies, ethereal light breaks upon the higher spheres; the reincarnated soul ascends the heights clothed in divine beauty, sandaled with light, robed in perfect whiteness, scattering over all the bloom of love, the awakening of a new life divine, with love, harmony and happiness. PRESENT CLAIMS OF SPIRITUALISM.

Mrs. Russegue Explains What It Stands For and Gives Psychometric Tests.

Special Spiritualistic services are being held here this week under the auspices of the Montreal Church of Spiritualism. The services express the initiatory stages of a permanent organization, which those interested in occult manifestations intend to establish. The idea is to secure the services of a pastor or lecturer, who will promote the study of spiritualistic phenomena and form a continuous bond of union between the members.

In order to give stimulus to the movement, Mrs. Russegue, one of the most celebrated mediums and clairvoyants on the continent, is here on a visit. She opened the campaign yesterday with two exceedingly able and interesting addresses, in Karn Hall, and these will be followed up by others to-night, to-morrow night and Wednesday night—all expository and explanatory of modern Spiritualism.

The services were well attended, and there can be no doubt Mrs. Russegue succeeded in exciting the interest and riveting the attention of her audiences. She speaks with great fluency and charm. Her diction is lofty and pure. Her voice thrills and penetrates. She has great mental power; and she appeals to the reason as well as the imagination of her hearers. After each of her addresses which she preceded by prayer, and Scripture readings, she gave a series of psychometric tests, in which by means of articles collected from members of the audience she located their owners, and sketched their life history in a way that made the subjects feel that they were under the scrutiny of some subtle, mysterious and uncanny power that was capable of probing the hidden depths of character and bringing to light qualities that those concerned may have believed themselves to possess, but which they could in few cases have defined with such precision and none with such wonderful eloquence.

Mrs. Russegue is well advanced in years, has evidently had ripe experience of life and a profound knowledge of human nature.

Her morning discussion was an exposition of what Spiritualism stands for, while in the evening she explored the world of thought, showing how much mankind owed to thought in the general industrial economy and social conditions under which we lived. The evening address was in a sense complementary to the morning one.

Spiritualism, it was explained, implied a larger spiritual perception, the betterment of humanity, a higher conception of spiritual unity, a better and higher conception of truth, a closer relationship between God and man.

Paul had said that he who would learn spiritual things must become spiritually minded, and Spiritualism implied this as well as closer relationship between the souls of men and women and the infinite—between the human and divine. Spiritualism meant the living of higher and holier lives—purity of life and character, for it was through pure, godly and holy lives that we became the medium of the transmission of the divine messages to mankind.

Revelation Still Going On.

The great distinction between the church of Spiritualism and other churches was that the dogmas and doctrines of the other churches were fixed and definite. The revelations from the divine power, the infinite and absolute Ruler of the Universe, ended with the sacred writings. Spiritualism, on the other hand, believed in their continuity. The emanations from the divine were as potent in the world to-day as they had ever been. God's laws were eternal and unchangeable; but we were in the midst of changes, and modern Spiritualism provided the means by which the divine message could be conveyed to all generations of mankind. It was a spiritual intelligence that brought forth wireless telegraphy.

Speaking of immortality, Mrs. Russegue contended that it was through Spiritualism alone that proof of spiritual life was to be obtained. "No spirit," said she, "ever came back to the world to tell us that we were to die. They all told us that we were to live forever."—Montreal Daily Herald, Canada.

A GREAT FELLOW.

The Devil Has Helped to Demonstrate Immortality.

The theologians are in the habit of making the most stupendous assertions, based on pure assumptions and preconceived ideas, which no reasoning will touch.

So often we think of saying, "Some dogs are more logical than some theologians." One of these writers asserts that Sir Oliver Lodge recently lectured on "Scientific Immortality," and that this "nothing but sound lecturer" offered not a single "scientific argument to prove his glowing belief in immortality." Lodge, in his papers and addresses has always summarized the most advanced discoveries and theories bearing on a future life. He utilizes the material furnished by the best reasoners and master logicians of every age. These facts can no longer be ignored by thinking men.

Some men reason to a contrary conclusion, after reading the most logical statement, and this writer, in speaking of the "facts" in Hyslop's book, "Evidence for a Future Life," says that its author has never found any scientific proof of immortality. Hyslop is a professor of logic ond the logic of his book in favor of spirit identity, seems unanswerable.

Now, if spirits have proved their identity, they exist; if they exist, then a future life is a fact. Our Spiritualistic friends believe that immortality has been demonstrated, and that spiritistic experiment has so far furnished the only valid evidence; but the theologians assert that Spiritism is the work of the Devil. Let us give the Devil his due, assuming that the Devil exists. If the Devil has helped to demonstrate immortality, let us honor the Devil some, because he has done more for us than the theologians have been able to do. Can the theologians furnish us with any proof of immortality, or any clear and definite statement assuring it? If not, I fear the Devil will get them at last.

SPIRIT MESSAGES.

Given Through the Mediumship of Mrs. Nellie Davis, of Kewanee, Ill.

I should like to send out a letter this evening, if I thought mamma would see it, and I would give her a little comfort, for mother and my sister Addie and my brother Herschel are still in earth-life. Mamma thought that no just God could take me away, when I was needed so badly at home, and I want to explain now that I was the only support the family had after Father passed away, and I tried to do more than my frail body could endure, so my body would no longer hold my ambitious spirit.

I stand by you so many times, Mamma; I read your heart and I sense your thoughts, and you wonder so many times if I am happy, and if I know all you have to contend with. Yes, dear Mamma, I know all, and that is the reason I come here where I find the gateway open to everyone. Knowing that there are those connected with the family who are interested in Spiritualism, and there are many who knew me that have tried to comfort my people by getting them to understand that the spirit can return, so I am here to-day, hoping to say something that will be convincing to them. I want to say to my brother that I was with you on May 28 when you went out leaving Mamma so sad, and did not return until two o'clock the next morning. You first entered a saloon, two blocks from home, where you met Frank W. and Ira M., and they asked you to go to the vaudeville show. You accepted the invitation. There you met Blanche and accompanied her home. She stopped on the way at a friend's home for about twenty minutes, and you waited on the outside and sat down on the curbing. You told her that you were going away, and was not going to tell anyone where you were going. When you returned home Mamma was sitting up waiting for you.

Now, some may wonder why I write as I do. But I have often heard my brother say, if some one would come and tell him something that he was sure they had no way of knowing about, that he would believe that we could return. Then again I thought if he knew that father and I knew what he was doing, he would lead a better life. So for his good and for Mamma's happiness I write as I have. I wish also to send thanks and appreciation to the ones who were so kind to me at St. Elizabeth's Hospital, New York City, as that is where I passed out.

Now I don't know of anything more to say of interest, more than trying to prove my identity. My mother's name is Nancy and my father's William.

Please put me down as Effie Geneva Sargent. I passed away about 16 years ago.

EFFIE GENEVA SARGENT.

How beautiful it is to be able to send out a few words to those in earth-life, after passing away.

I have been some little time in the spirit world. As near as I can count the time, I think it is about seven years. I was a young girl when I passed away—only seventeen, and as I look back now to that life with its faded memory, I realize how little I knew of life, nor what I must pass through if I had lived on earth longer.

I dreaded to leave home and my parents and brothers, for I knew just how they would miss me; and while they knew where I was going, and that I would be happy, it did not make it much easier for them to part with me.

Oh, I wanted to tell them that all was done that could be done for me, and my time had come, and I know if they could only see the beauty and happiness that surrounds me in my spirit home, and how good and kind everyone is to me, they would not feel badly about my going away.

I used to talk to the girls about what I was going to do when I got older, and I am glad to come back and tell them that many of the things I had planned have been outwrought and fulfilled in my spiritual home. I said I would have little children around me (for I always wanted to have a sister) that I could train. I would have music and other studies that would be helpful to them.

Now in my spirit home I have little ones that I am training, and we have music and flowers and beautiful things to cultivate their love of them and all that is refined and sweet.

And other plans that I had in view, young as I was then, but inspired, I think, by spirits, by forces that I did not understand, they have all been outwrought and fulfilled. As the years have passed, while my people on earth have been going through their experiences, sometimes they meet with things that are very hard to bear, and I have thought so many times, that if they could only know that Maggie was with them, looking after them, they would be glad that I had not gone far away. And I am waiting to meet them in the bright beyond; to welcome them to my spirit home, where there is music and flowers and sunshine, and to show them something of the joys which I am sure they will be pleased to find after the cares and trials of earth-life are gone.

I hope they will know of my coming here, and I have some things I would like to tell them about that will be a great benefit to them.

I will say that my father's name is Thomas and my mother's name Mary.

I know they will all be glad to hear from me. I must go now. I send my love to all my friends.

AN ENTIRELY NEW DEAL.

The POSTAGE on papers has been increased to all the British possessions on this continent. On a single paper we are compelled to pay ONE CENTS each week, amounting to 52 cents a year, whereas previously we only paid the pound rates—a mere trifle. Hence, to all the British possessions on this continent the paper hereafter will be $1.50 per year.

Calls Methuselah a Myth.

"Prof. Frederick Starr, leader of the department of Anthropology at the University of Chicago, has exposed Methuselah. The professor told his class that he did not believe Methuselah ever lived 969 years, or within centuries of that age.

"Although the Bible says Methuselah lived on earth this length of time, and divides his life into periods, Prof. Starr, with the cold criticism of science, deprived him of the honor he has borne for centuries, surpassing the life-clinging efforts of every venerable person in history, and making the centenarians of 1907 seem mere striplings.

"An attendant assertion by Prof. Starr was: 'People live longer nowadays than in those early times.'

"Prof. Starr is also doubtful if Saul, David and Solomon ever reigned forty years each, as the Bible declares."

Thus an Associated Press dispatch.

That University of Chicago seems to have thinkers as Professors, and the whole world should be glad.

It is known to all persons, or should be, that primarily all peoples noted time by moons, just as the American Indians still do. These moons constituted a year, requiring nearly thirteen to make a solar year. Methuselah's 969 "years," divided by 13, and he was about 74½ of our years old when he was drowned in the great deluge. It was probably this old-time citizen who was refused a place in the ark, and who yelled to old Noah: "'Go to 'l with your ark; I don't think there'll be much of a shower."

All the moons of Adam were 930, otherwise 71 and a fraction years. Seth lived 912 moons—a little more than 70 years. Enoch lived 960 moons—nearly 74 years.

Later the seasons were used for noting time, summer and winter each constituting a year. After the division of the starry vault into constellations, by the Babylonians, and the Zodiac was completed, then it was found the sun seemed to circle the entire heavens, and then reached the place of beginning, then the solar year was determined, and all the ancient modes of noting time were dropped out of use.

But they who swear by the Bible as the inspired word of God know that because of our sins human life has been greatly abridged. Had it not been so man would have scaled heaven and captured that ivory throne ere this.

Ingersoll's Apostrophe to Liberty.

O Liberty! Thou art the god of my idolatry. Thou art the only deity that hateth the bended knee. In thy vast and unwalled temple, beneath the roofless dome, star-gemmed and luminous with suns, thy worshipers stand erect. They do not cringe or crawl, or bend their foreheads to the earth. The dust has never borne the impress of their lips. Upon thy altars mothers do not sacrifice their babes, nor men their rights. Thou askest naught from man except the things good men hate—the whip, the chain, the dungeon key. Thou hast no popes, no priests, who stand between their fellow-men and thee. Thou carest not for foolish forms, or selfish prayers. Thou hast no monks, nor nuns, who, in the name of duty murder joy. At thy sacred shrine hypocrisy does not bow, virtue does not tremble, superstition's feeble tapers do not burn, but Reason holds aloft her inextinguishable torch, whose holy light will one day light the world.

Other Worlds to Conquer.

Bishop Fallows, of St. Paul's Reformed Episcopal Church, this city, in a recent Sunday morning discourse, declared that missionary work in heaven will be carried on for the benefit of souls inhabiting the multitude of other worlds than the planet earth; and he warned his congregation it would be well to be prepared to contribute liberally to the missionary funds which will be needed in Paradise.

That information is highly important, and comes when it is most needed. We had been taught in the long ago by the preachers, that all who shall reach that heavenly shore will become choristers on their arrival, and that "Glory, glory, glory to God and the Lamb" will be the burden of their song, and it will continue forever. After singing that song for a few million years it would be supposed it would become somewhat monotonous, and the desire would be felt that the words ought to be occasionally changed.

Well, Brother Fallows has made a grand discovery. He assures us missionaries will be sent out from the pearly courts to proselyte sinners, not only residents of our solar planets, but they will skip out to the innumerable planets of other solar systems, and thus the good work of saving souls for Jesus will go on forever. Of course the clerics, God's earthly representatives, on advent to the streets paved with gold, with infallible Bible written by the fingers of the Supreme, will continue on duty. We half way tumbled to Bishop Fallow's discovery two weeks ago, when, in "A Subject for Thought," we said:

"It is but reasonable to presume all the other planets of our own solar system, as the innumerable planets of all the other millions of suns, are inhabited by beings similar to man. Were the inhabitants of all that retinue of worlds affected by the sin of our first parents? And do they, too, need a savior to redeem them from the awful consequences of that sin?"

We then expressed a desire to learn from headquarters if we were correct. Almost immediately thereafter there comes the desired information, and we are told in addition by the Bishop:

"I am not sure that Christians in heaven will not have to raise money and with equal ardor and enthusiasm labor for the salvation of souls of other worlds than ours."

True, a doubt seems to be expressed, but in consideration of that doubt it would be well enough for Christians on earth, when taking their departure, to lay in a good supply of ready cash to supply imperative needs, else, possibly, some of the outer planets may fail to be visited by Christian missionaries, and immortal souls may be lost.

Welcomed from the Other Shore.

The late death of Mrs. McKinley, as described by those who were in attendance at the passing of this good woman, relict of the murdered President McKinley, seems confirmatory of the teachings of Spiritualism. One of those who watched at the deathbed speaks of the last moments as follows:

"I will never believe that Mrs. McKinley did not know at the very moment of the soul's transition that she was passing from death into life.

"I bent over her at that moment and saw her face transfigured as though animated by great joy.

"Sweetly, tenderly, spiritually beautiful was its aspect. The breathing had grown shorter, shorter, shorter; there was a convulsive tremor; the muscles of her shoulders and throat slightly struggled; she raised her arms, her lips parted, and through them came a sound not articulate, but like a sobbing, joyous sigh.

"Once more she breathed gently. Not more soft was the flight of the soul than was that exhalation. Some of us were kneeling at the bedside, and it seemed as though we almost saw the reunion between the wife and her loved husband.

"In death Mrs. McKinley's face is stamped by a beauty ineffably sweet and a contentment not less than divine."

Clairvoyants who have watched the soul's parting from its earth tenement, all agree in making similar statements. Something is seen that causes the features to light up with joy, as if loved ones from the other shore had welcomed the arrived spirit to its new home. Can there be a doubt that her loved one was there to greet her, and fold her in his arms? No slumbering in the grave in good orthodox fashion, but "when she died on earth she was born in heaven," a condition awaiting all humanity.

Desperation.

According to his own confessions under oath, Harry Orchard, an assumed name, used as a witness in the prosecution against Wm. D. Haywood for the murder of Governor Stuenenberg, of Idaho, was a hired assassin, without a parallel in modern history. Under arrest, and held as a prisoner for the crime, and representing himself as the tool of others, with probably a promise of freedom if those he represents as his employers are convicted, he tells of scores of murders perpetrated by himself, with a coolness and bravado worthy a better cause.

If Orchard escapes justice by turning informer, then prepare to expect every other criminal to imitate his example, and swear he was a willing and paid tool of another, probably an enemy. The Progressive Thinker has no opinion of the guilt or innocence of Haywood, and hopes if guilty he will be properly punished, but it does not hesitate to declare, a prosecution must be in desperate need which calls such a wretch and black-hearted assassin as Harry Orchard admits himself to have been, as the principal witness in support of such prosecution.

Fettered in Infancy. A Contrast.

The hope of the church is based on indoctrinating youth, and getting them into the folds of the church before they have learned to think. In many churches, particularly in the Catholic, the infant is baptised and enrolled a member when it is christened, thus inheriting its religious belief, and doubling the real membership of the church. The church acts on the theory, "Just as the twig is bent, the tree's inclined." Children are not allowed to read books that antagonize their faith, if parents and priests can prevent it.

The ranks of Spiritualism, on the contrary, are augmented by thinkers from the church, who, in mature life, have discovered the falsity of their paternal teaching. They naturally bring along with them many of the errors of childhood, which they are ambitious to engraft on Spiritualism. Very few embrace the whole truth at once. Taught the Bible was inspired by God; that Jesus was sired by the Eternal Father, and was virgin born, and made familiar with some good sayings his biographers credited to him, these are the most difficult to get rid of.

Accustomed to the church from infancy, such persons at first wish to make Spiritualism an appendage of that institution, and can hardly tolerate those who see no virtue therein, and nothing worthy of perpetuation. Their humanitarianism is not an offspring of Christianity, but is an outgrowth of our common needs.

Were we to ask deliverance from anything it would be from the preacher who inherits his religion, and who never had the bravery to think along other lines of thought than those he drank in with his mother's milk.

Sleepers, Awake; the Day Dawns.

He who supposes the hand of progress has reached its culmination should keep one eye on Rome, and the Vatican. Of course the powers in command, to be consistent with their past, must do all they can to keep alive ancient customs which they received from the pagan founders of their system; but to the critical observer evidence is daily accumulating that a bloodless revolution is pending, which will bring Catholicism into the foreground. Protestantism must take many steps forward, else fall a great distance in the rear.

It is almost certain that the Pope is convinced of the truths of spirit communion with mortals. An allocution from his pen is all that is needed to set every priest and prelate, every cardinal and Jesuit, at work promulgating the truth. Protestants cannot remain silent onlookers. They will come to the front, and swear, if need be, that they were the original discoverers and promulgaters of the new faith, and, possibly they will find proof that the Fox girls had been educated by Protestant parents; were, therefore, made capable of holding communion with disembodied minds. Here is a very recent cablegram from Rome that reveals what is in the wind (reader, pause and reflect):

"A remarkable open letter, which broadly attacks the idea of infallibility of the Pope, has been addressed to Pius X. by a group of Italian priests. It is a reply to a censure by the pontiff in his allocution of April 17th against the modern school ecclesiastics. The letter contends that Catholicism should abandon its archaic position and by recognizing claims of science and democracy, regain its hold on mankind. It indicates the right of the young men in the church to a certain amount of liberty in their work. Certain pontifical appointments to high dignities are strongly criticised. The Pope is charged with paralyzing the work and institutions of his predecessors, particularly of having introduced reactionary theologians into Biblical commissions. The writers repudiate the Pope for wisdom, equity and clemency."

This is only a side thrust. The whole system is involved, and modern thought is sure to be triumphant ere the end of the agitation is reached.

Too Bad!

Dr. Chalmers, high medical authority of Glasgow, Scotland, declares emphatically that there is death in kissing; that the kissing of infants frequently transient germs of disease. Must mothers forego that luxury of love to save the darling from death?

The Honest Question.

A thousand men, says the Detroit Press, can go to work at 7 o'clock in the morning without the ringing of a bell. Why is it 300 people cannot assemble in a church without a previous ding-donging lasting half an hour?

The priest, alone, can answer.

TAKE NOTICE!

Spiritualists Everywhere Be On the Alert.

Spiritualists of the United States, do you want Spiritualism properly represented in the report of the Director of the Census? If so, urge the officers of your local and State association to fill and return the card sent them long ago, by the Department. Every opportunity has been given us to prove by figures how many we are, and it will be our own fault if we are incorrectly reported. Spiritualists, have you the courage to stand up and be counted? If so, send in the reports of your local societies.

Californians Are Awake!

"Rev. Dr." Hugh R. Moore Is Repulsed by the Summerland Camp Management—That Camp Has No Use, Knowingly, for Any of His Ilk—Mrs. R. S. Lillie, a Strenuous and Honest Worker, Writes Burning Words Against Fraudulent Doings of Base Deceivers in the Garb of Mediums.

To the Editor: Summerland, Cal., is to have its Camp Meeting as the closing of our winter's work with them, as we have held a service there each Sunday afternoon since the month of November. The camp will open June 23, closing June 30. Col. J. L. Dryden of Los Angeles, is engaged for the week, as is Mrs Cowell of Oakland, to serve as test medium.

Mrs. Grace E. Aitken will also give messages, and John W. Ring will give a series of lectures.

Mr. Lillie will have charge of the music.

My guides, of course, serve through the session.

Notwithstanding the many articles appearing in your valuable paper regarding the faking of mediumship by the notorious Hugh R. Moore and aids, the Summerland society and myself found ourselves in a very unpleasant dilemma. One of their number went to Los Angeles to attend the recent "Fiesta,' commissioned to look after test mediums, as new and good talent for the coming meeting.

Mr. Moore's meetings are well intended to deceive, as both he and Mrs. Moore have the appearance of people of refinement and sincerity, and they tell a story of martyrdom, of how they have been persecuted by people in the east, etc., until, as is always the case, there are plenty of Spiritualists ready to defend them and help to establish themselves in a city where again they will be assured a rich following.

Of course, the person who went from here heard only their public work, and thought it was remarkably fine, and so reported, and before I was aware of it they had been engaged for the entire time of the camp. A meeting of the board was called and I carried a file of Progressive Thinkers, a copy of May No. of "Reason" with its editorial by Dr. Austin, adding these to the experience I had at the time Lily Dale camp suffered such humiliation at his hands, and others of his craft, some ten or twelve years ago, through which I passed, and saw the evidence of their treason.

The Summerland Board would by no means have a person with such a record upon their platform, and immediately took action, notifying him that his services would not be required.

I was asked if I was willing my name should be used, and I answered, most assuredly so. I hide behind no bush, am ready to put myself on record as one who believes the platform of Spiritualism should not be contaminated by such as Hugh R. Moore," who has been so indiscreet, and left such a trail behind him, with all of his apparent brightness, that some are not working upon hearsay evidence, or even that they have seen paraphernalia and means he made use of, but have heard also, by his own word of mouth his methods.

There is a class of faking pretenders who have "obtained money under false pretenses" so long that their place rightly and legally is in a states prison or penitentiary, behind the bars.

The humiliation of loyal workers in Spiritualism, who have been compelled to do their work and be followed immediately, too often by such as he is, has been more than words can express, and has been the cause of many leaving our ranks and either going into the churches or standing, waiting to see what action is going to be taken by the body of Spiritualists regarding such people.

THE TIME FOR SOME ACTION IS NOW!

When persons have repeatedly brought Spiritualism into disgrace by their conduct, when people of repute testify that they have found indisputable evidence of the fraud and trickery made use of by certain individuals, that should be sufficient, I believe, to cause those in authority in National and State Associations, to send out officially a note of warning to all societies, that it would at least be wise for them not to employ those under the ban of such accusations until they can clear themselves in the estimation of all fair-minded people.

The people here did not seem to understand the fact that a man by the name of Moore, operating as a medium in Los Angeles, was the same Moore who had left a society in New York so disgraced by his flight and silence, and so humiliated that when such grave charges were made against him, and evidences accumulated, he should fail to meet it like a man. These same people would not take the experiences and testimony of those who had paid so dearly for it at Lily Dale, nor of others in Philadelphia, and other places, but believed him to be a persecuted "innocent." Now they are reaping what he has sown, and they have prepared the field.

Now there are some of the best, most sincere and true Spiritualists in Los Angeles, who are doing the same thing, who are nursing the same "suckling," and who will sooner or later be in the dust and ashes of humiliation, when he has gotten all he can out of them and is forced again to fly to other fields.

For although some of the articles have spoken of Californians as "dead easy," and California a rich field for fakirs, it will be found that there are some in California whose eyes are not closed, and who are at work, and Hugh R. Moore, the "Rev. Dr." (isn't that enough to make us all despise prefixes and titles?), will find that Los Angeles has occasional hot waves which will make the climate uncomfortable for him, all in good time. One of those waves struck him last week when both Mr. and Mrs. Moore were arrested; full details of this are not at hand.

Some of those who have befriended him believe he is a medium. If so, then just so much the more is he to blame to willingly drag his mediumship and his spirit friends into the depths, where for mercenary purposes he is willing to descend.

Again others will say, "I witnessed their work and know it couldn't have been done except by mediumship," This is absurd, 'Tis THEIR TRICK, NOT YOURS! and you simply didn't see through it.

Where so-called mediums resort to fraud, they are either not mediums at all or they have so LITTLE of it that it would be like looking for a needle in a hay stack. THEY HAVE confederates, and information, and helpers in every city. That is what Spiritualists and Spiritualism have to contend with now. That is what is making the work more and more difficult for honest women and men who have left all to follow this Christ of truth, and who find their cross so heavy, and the way so hard. Spiritualists hear these words. Spiritualists are, many of them, dissatisfied now with mediumship as it is. Sensationalism has vitiated their spiritual appetites until they are ready to leave the faithful workers they have known for years, and run after "false gods" in search of the marvelous.

Spiritualists who should have developed long ere this, enough spiritual discernment to read the word LIAR when it's written all over a man's face—but no, their unbounded love and sympathy overbalances for the time their judgment, and they become unconsciously and unintentionally aiders and abettors in the crime of these worst of criminals, who are carrying on their work in New York, Boston, Philadelphia, Chicago, Los Angeles, and all great cities, onward they move, a caravan of pretenders, fakirs, deceivers, leeches, barnacles, attaching themselves to Spiritualism and causing it to become a by-word and reproach.

Who will point the way out of this? Who will arise and save Spiritualism from this condition?

R. S. LILLIE.

MOORE SCORNED BY SPIRITUALISTS.

State Society of California Repudiates Fakers — Officials of Reputable Organization Refuse to Allow New Yorker to Speak at the Edendale.

The California State Spiritualists' Association, through its president, Arthur Howe, utterly repudiates H. R. Moore, whose fortune teller's license was recently revoked by Mayor Harper immediately after his arrest for trying his weird arts on the Los Angeles public. The fact that Moore's unsavory record, together with his charlatanic practices, is known to the local members of the State Spiritualists' Association bars him from any chance of gaining admittance to the local organization, and should he ever attempt to gain a place on the roster of the association he would be refused.

President Howe of the State Association repudiates Moore, and is emphatic in his statement that the latter can never hope to gain a place in the ranks of the reputable Spiritualists until he disproves the reports of his conduct, which have followed him here from all over the country. Even were that possible, it is not probable that he would be admitted, for Moore's work as a medium is not at all in accord with the ideas of local Spiritualists.

"Moore has never applied to the California State Spiritualists' Association for a certificate of membership," said Mr. Howe, "and should he do so it is almost certain that it would be refused.

Opposed to Fakers.

"The Association is decidedly against persons such as Moore, judging by his record, must be. While we have never been called upon to investigate this record, it appears to me that if Moore were all right he would endeavor to refute it at once; but this he has never done.

"Two sections of Article 9 in the by-laws and qualifications of the State Association would at once bar Moore from membership. One of these, Section 2, says: 'Proof of good character covering a period of five years prior to application.' Part d. of the same section says that: 'Satisfactory evidence of the genuineness of the applicant's mediumistic gifts.'

"Moore was at the picnic held by the Guiding Star Association at Edendale recently, and I was approached by two or three persons and asked if I would not invite him to address the assemblage. I personally did not care to have him, but thought it best to consult with other members of the Association. They one and all stated positively that he should not be allowed to speak.

"As to his having taken up a collection of $15 at the time, it might have occurred, but without my knowledge, and certainly without the sanction of myself or any other member of the State Spiritualists' Association. Of course, we did not particularly watch his actions, but it is certain that whatever money he obtained at the picnic was solicited at odd times and in secret."

Not Inquisitorial Body.

Mr. Howe also stated that were it in his power he would at once bring about an investigation of Moore's methods, and, if they were as crude and charlatanic as reports state, help in the expose.

"As president of the State Association of Spiritualists," said Mr. Howe, "I cannot bring about an investigation. The powers of myself and associates are of a purely judicial nature in affairs of this kind.

"The board of directors of the State Association is not an inquisitorial body, but an executive and judicial body. Those outside our organization we have no power to restrict. Moore is not in any way affiliated with the California State Spiritualists' Association.—Los Angeles (Cal.) Herald.

WILL CLEAR THE CITY OF FAKE MEDIUMS.

Officials Take Determined Stand — Mayor Harper Revokes the License of H. R. Moore, Exposed at Fake Trumpet Seance Last Tuesday Night.

Mayor Harper is determined that mediums who are caught red-handed conducting swindling games shall be forced to discontinue practice in Los Angeles.

"We do not put the license fee at a prohibitive or exorbitant figure," said the mayor yesterday afternoon, "and we are determined that those who get fortune tellers' licenses shall not conduct a business of fleecing the public. I have instructed the license office not to issue a license to H. R. Moore or any member of his family. The public must be protected. The police department has instructions how to proceed in these cases."

Captain Paul Flammer is watching the Spiritualistic fakers closely and it is believed his men are gathering evidence in half a dozen cases.

Men from Captain Flammer's department who worked up the evidence in the Mazzini case say they can procure convictions in half a dozen more cases. They began operations by getting "readings" from the man who organized the Mediums' Protective association.

The fraudulent mediums are in fear and trembling. They freely predict a heavy sentence for the hostler humbug. At the Spiritualists' picnic held at Glendale last Thursday, Moore, who was arrested in the raid Tuesday night, took up a collection in behalf of Mazzini. He succeeded in raising $15. [Moore is also working for his organ, the Light of Truth.]

Yesterday afternoon Harry Pierce, a bartender employed by Dan Jerrue, at his saloon at Fifth and Los Angeles, and G. A. Plaisaunce, of 241 North Bunker Hill, who says he is with the McCord company, of 312 South Broadway, went to the city jail and called on Mazzini. Later Pierce gave bail for the pseudo Hindoo priest.

This is the second time Plaisaunce has aided the little faker. When Mazzini was previously arrested and thrown into jail Plaisaunce was active in procuring bail for the discredited fortune teller.

During Mazzini's trial, when witness after witness gave evidence showing him to be a humbug, Plaisaunce tried to convince newspaper men in the court-room that the cockney hostler was a seer of marvelous power. Then Plaisaunce begged the reporters not to print his name, declaring it would hurt him in business should it become known that he was connected with Mazzini.

The police say they have not far to seek for the motives of men who espouse the cause of humbugs.

If the predictions of the detective bureau are not far wrong, the dragnet will bring in a dozen more cases of practicing without a license in a short time.

A close watch will be kept on the Moore family, now that they are deprived of a license, and the police say arrest is likely to follow violation of the ordinance.—Los Angeles (Cal.) Herald.

EMPORIA, KANSAS, TO HONOR FOUNDER.

Dr. G. W. Brown to be Guest at Semi-Centennial—Founded City in 1857—Last Survivor of Five Interested in Locating of City in Rich Neosho Valley—Dr. Brown Plans to Attend.

Dr. G. W. Brown, 907 Kilburn avenue, is to be the honored guest of the citizens of Emporia, Kan., at the semi-centennial celebration July 3 and 4, of the founding of the pretty city that nestles in the Neosho Valley. Dr. Brown was president of the company that promoted the founding of Emporia, and with the late General Deitzler located the town site in February, 1857. The presence at the celebration of the only survivor of the five identified with the early history of the now flourishing city has been demanded by the citizens of Emporia, and W. A. White, editor of the Emporia Gazette, on behalf of the committee has invited Dr. Brown to be the guest of honor at the celebration, with all expenses incident to the trip paid. July 3 will be given over to an Old Settlers' reunion, at which Dr. Brown will be one of the speakers, and as he is thoroughly conversant with the history of the thrilling times in Kansas, his presence on the program will be the feature of the reunion.

Dr. Brown was a witness to the stirring acts of old John Brown and his raiders, and his presence on the ground where his band roved at will half a century ago will be a most noteworthy event, and the opportunity of hearing first-hand the many incidents connected with the locating of a town in those stirring days will not be overlooked by the people of Emporia and vicinity.

Dr. Brown has accepted the invitation and will leave Monday, July 1, to participate in the fiftieth anniversary of the city he founded in 1857.—Rockford (Ill.) Star.

NO SPECIFIC FOR DRUNKENNESS.

So Says a Prominent Physician.

In regard to the query for drunkenness in a late Progressive Thinker by your correspondent from San Diego, Cal., I wish to inform him that there is absolutely no specific known that is worth "a tinker's ——." The drug, tartar emetic, is sold by fakers who triturate it with other harmless drugs. These are put up in powders and sold at exorbitant prices. Antimony, the principal ingredient, is a poison, and is not used very much, if at all, by the modern up-to-date physician, who, in fact, uses comparatively few drugs, and if the people were educated to the point where he could be appreciated, would prefer to use only those in which he absolutely knows there is a positive remedial value. Strychnia and atrophine, used in the Keely cure, have slight value in acute alcoholism, and this only when indicated. Suggestion is considered of value, especially where the patient wishes to co-operate and is sincere. In the French school, the result of the immortal Charcot, this has given some satisfaction. D. S. AN AWAKENING CONSCIENCE.

It Will Come to All Sooner or Later—The public Awakening to the Great Need of Reforms—The Spiritualist Conscience Becoming Quickened.

It is sometimes well to look backward and see the progress that has been made instead of ahead to the goal that has not yet been reached.

Secretary Root has taken this backward glance and reports to the nation through the medium of an address to Yale students that the public conscience tolerated conditions in the past which would be unimaginable to-day. "The whole system of federal government has been lifted to a higher plane, with a clearer moral vision," and this moral elevation of the government corresponds with a public demand that old abuses be ended.

Among the specific instances of a change for the better, which can be appreciated only by a comparison with the past, is the attitude of the public toward the manipulation of railroads now and thirty years ago. The secretary asserts that the Chicago and Alton affair would not have attracted any attention in the days of the wrecking of the Erie and the Union Pacific.

Another specific instance is the prosecution of the land thieves for offenses which had been allowed to continue so long that they had come to be looked upon almost as vested rights.

If one were to look upon local affairs in Chicago with the same purpose, that is to say, to find improvements already made, rather than those which ought to be made, the same conclusion would be reached. It is not a long time since it was thought legitimate for a sheriff to grow rich from the profits in feeding prisoners. Certain fee offices paid higher wages than the office of president of the United States. Justice of the peace, prosecuting attorney, and police officials grew rich at the expense both of the criminal classes and of the public, and it was taken as a matter of course by people in general. Now, the few instances remaining of the fee system cause so much protest that the public forgets how much of it has been abolished.

In the business world the same progress is discoverable. Methods indorsed by merchants a generation ago are felt to be immoral now. Large corporation in underselling and ruining competitors in order to have a free field in which to demand high prices are applying what was considered sound business principles once. Thirty years ago few saw the immorality of rebates. The conception of railroads as common carriers with obligations to treat all alike was in the statute books, but was not a part of the common consciousness of the public. Now a man who gets a rebate is not looked upon simply as lucky. He is considered a conspirator and a thief.

No one person can be credited with this awakening of the public conscience. Courageous statesmen, the public press, and other agencies have all had something to do with creating the present conditions. So much is now taken for granted that the world needs someone to come along, as Secretary Root did, and remind it that the advance leaders of an earlier day would have died happy if from some mountain height they could have seen such a land of promise as this. The fact that there is complaint now about matters which never troubled our fathers is a good sign and not a bad one.

The above from the Chicago Tribune should have gone further, and illustrated the "awakening conscience" in the ranks of Spiritualism, in the unceasing demand now being made for honest mediumship and pure Spiritualism. All along the line the signs of the Times show great improvement, in the result of an awakening conscience. JUS TICE.

THE SPIRITUALIST CENSUS.

How Many Are We?—Shall We Be Listed as Spiritualists on the National Census Records?

Brother H. D. Barrett is making a masterly appeal to the Spiritualists of the nation to get in action, and make the showing upon the National Census Books that they are justly entitled to.

He has presented the necessity and numerical value of being registered among other religious organizations.

We certainly believe we have the most practical religion and provable philosophy on the face of the earth, and upon the scientific side it penetrates the ether space and reaches other habitable planets, and isn't there enough in it to make it worth recording before the world of religions?

It will require but a few moments for the young, active Spiritualists in every part of America to take the census of the Spiritualists—the believers in the possibility of spirit return, and the other short clauses in the Declaration of Principles, in part or as a whole, in their immediate surroundings and send them in to the Secretary of your State Association, to be forwarded to the National Secretary.

To the friends—the Spiritualists—of Illinois, I wish personally to repeat the appeal of President Barrett, and ask that you constitute yourself a committee in your own town to hunt up the names, or at least the number, of real Spiritualists and send the same to me, at 15 Park avenue, Chicago, and I will forward them to the National Secretary.

I hope by this means to gather in the numerical standing of the Illinois Spiritualists.

Do not say you have no time, but employ some of your leisure toward hunting Spiritualists. Get in touch with your fellowman. Don't write me long-winded letters, for I shall have no time for long-winded replies, and don't fill up with regrets and "knocks" against our innocent little "Declaration of Principles."

If you love your angel friends do something to prove it to them. They are in a condition of continuous activity and must hold at least a wave of pity for the inactive, mildewing friends who have found the truth of continuity and retired into wise(?) and conceited seclusion to gloat out a useless existence.

If you love the truth you have found you will not be afraid to tell it to the world. Don't dwarf your spirit by hoarding what you know and expect it to unfold you in the future.

Let us make the acquaintance of our neighbors, and record our names as SPIRITUALISTS beside our Methodist, Baptist, Presbyterian and Catholic brothers and sisters, and show the earnestness and the enthusiam we claim for our beloved Cause.

Let each society "get a move" on itself, and send in the Spiritualistic Census at once. We have but little time, and that is all the more reason we should increase our motions in this instance.

T. WILKINS, Sec'y. I. S. S. A.

SCIENCE OF THE SOUL.

An Address by Geo. W. Lewis, A. M., at Colonial Hall, New York City.

BY ACQUIRING A KNOWLEDGE OF THE INTRINSIC CHARACTER AND FACULTIES OF THE HUMAN MIND AS MANIFESTED HERE, WE SHALL BE ABLE THEREBY TO KNOW SOMETHING OF THE MENTALITY AND CHARACTERISTICS OF THE SOUL IN REALMS SUPERNAL, FOR THE SOUL OVER THERE IS THE SAME SOUL THAT WAS INCARNATE HERE. IT IS CO-ETERNAL WITH THE UNCREATED CORPUSCLES OF MATTER. IT IS THE ARCHITECT AND BUILDER OF THE HUMAN BODY, AND ELECTRICITY IS THE CONNECTING LINK BETWEEN MIND AND MATTER. IN EARTH-LIFE IT CONSTRUCTS ITS BODY FROM TERRESTRIAL-PHYSICAL SUBSTANCE, AND IT CAN THEREBY COME IN CONTACT WITH GROSS MATTER, AND THE PHYSICAL FACTS OF ITS ENVIRONEMENT. AND IN ETHEREAL REALMS ITS BODY WILL BE COMPOSED OF ETHEREAL SUBSTANCE, AND ALWAYS OF THE SUBSTANCE OF ITS ENVIRONMENT. THE SOUL BUILDS THE PHYSICAL BODY BY MODIFYING, CONTROLLING AND DIRECTING THE PHYSICAL FORCES, THROUGH ITS INHERENT POWER OF VOLUNTARY AND AUTOMATIC ACTION, WHEREBY IT POSITS THE ULTIMATE CORPUSCLES OF MATTER IN POSITION TO FORM THE SPECIFIC ORGANIC STRUCTURE. THROUGH PASSION IT LAYS THE FOUNDATION OF THE HUMAN EDIFICE IN PROTOPLASM.

About four hundred and sixty years before Christ, Democritus, an eminent Greek philosopher, of the New Eleatic School, was born in Abdara, Thrace. He inherited a large fortune and traveled extensively in Asia and Egypt, acquiring an extensive knowledge of the philosophy of the most eminent scholars of his age. He wrote many works on the physical and moral sciences, on mathematics, music and technical subjects. He was the founder of the atomic theory of the universe. He taught that every thing in existence, in its last analysis, consists of infinitely small, indivisible atoms, each having a definite form, quality and movement, whose inevitable union and separation shape all different things, construct all forms, produce all laws and effects, and dissolve them again, that new forms and combinations may again be builded up, and thus insure the perpetuation and continuity of all material forms and forces, in succession. He contended that the gods themselves, the human organisms and mental faculties, all originate from these ultimate, indivisible atoms of matter.

The school of Democritus was succeeded by that of Epicurus, a Greek philosopher, born in the island of Samos, 342 years before Christ. At the age of eighteen he went to Athens, became a pupil of Pamphilius, and an ardent admirer of the atomic theory of Democritus. He traveled for several years, and at the age of thirty established a school of philosophy at Athens. He was a man of the purest morality and of unimpeachable character. It is said he wrote over 300 works, and that in all his writings he never used a quotation. He endeavored to clear up the uncertainties in the philosophy of Democritus by reconstructing the atomic theory. He set forth the following axioms:

(1) "Nothing comes from nothing." And (2) "That which exists can never be annihilated." He contended that all matter consists of atoms, and these are indivisible aand unchangeable; that the only properties they possess are shape, volume, gravity and numbers. That the universe is infinite and unchangeable, the aggregate quantity of matter always remaining the same. He broke away from the Theocracy of his time and held that the universe could not have been created by the gods. The whole processes of nature were the result of the precipitation, shape and aggregation of the atoms of matter.

He held that the soul was formed from an aggregate of the infinitesimal, unseen, indivisible atoms, and that it must again be resolved back into its constituent elements, and that therefore the soul is not immortal. But when he commenced reasoning about the gods, he deviated from the trend of his philosophy. He contended that the gods are living beings of human form, composed of ultimate atoms: yet he held that they are immortal. He endeavored, however, to explain the contradiction the best that he could. But it remained for Lucretius—one of the most brilliant of the Roman poets, a contemporary and friend of Cicero, born 96 years before Christ—to clearly develop and formulate, in an attractive manner, the atomic theory of the universe. He accomplished this in his immortal work, "De Rerum Natura," the greatest of didactic poems the world has ever seen. But the atoms of Democritus, Epicurus and Lucretius, we must remember, were not the chemical atoms of the last century, formulated by John Dalton in 1804.

The atoms of Democritus, Epicurus and Lucretius corresponded more exactly to the corpuscles of the scientists of the present day. The science of chemistry is of ancient lineage; it came down to us, in one form or another, from remote antiquity.

The Phlogiston Theory.

The views and theories advanced were modified and abandoned from time to time as new discoveries were made or new theories advanced. The "phlogiston" theory advanced by Stahl, who was born in 1734, was swept aside by the system advanced by Lavoisier, an eminent French chemist born in Paris in 1743.

He first caused the quantitive method to be recognized.

But John Dalton, an eminent English chemist, born at Eaglesfield, in Cumberland, England, September 5, 1765, was the author of the atomic theory of chemical combinations. He discovered the law of chemical equivalents, of multiple proportions, and that the atomic weight of compounds is the sum of the atomic weight of all their ingredients. He commenced the formulating of his chemical atomic theory in 1803, and gave it to the world in 1804. But these atoms, as stated, were not identical with those of Democritus, only that they were conceived to be indivisible. The atoms of Dalton were the minimum proportions of different substances that could enter into chemical combinations, while the atoms of Democritus, Epicurus and Lucretius were the ultimate, indivisible corpuscles of matter. They were similar to the corpuscles represented by the scientists and physicists of to-day.

Matter and Electricity.

In 1903 Sir Oliver Lodge, one of England's most noted scientists, in an address before a body of British scientists, in speaking of matter and electricity, and dealing with electrons as the units of electricity, made an attack upon the atomic theory of Dalton, suggesting, but not then concluding, that the atomic theory which has stood the unquestioned scientific test for 99 years was a fallacy and a delusion.

But in 1904 Dalton's theory, which had been accepted by the scientific world for one hundred years, was ruthlessly swept aside to give place to the fragmentary corpuscles of the exploded atom. And these corpuscles were claimed to be nothing more nor less than electricity. And thus the electrical theory of the universe was sprung upon the scientific world.

In August, 1904, at a meeting of the British Association, Mr. Balfour, its president, found many of the Sections in full accord with his views, when, as president of the Association, he made a sudden demand upon scientific men for a re-examination of the foundation for their beliefs and theories.

Mr. Balfour warned them that the scientific structure they were rearing could not stand. But when he heard Mr. Lamb's address in the Mathematical Department, he declared that his own iconoclasm was outdone by the professor of that department. Then in Section D. the biologists turned strenuously against the time-honored Atavism. And in Section A, where they discussed radio-activity, there was a flat rebellion against the theory of the constitution of matter. And from the conflicts that arose many of the scientific men returned to their homes, it is said, with saddened hearts. The scientists pointed to the philosophers and metaphysicians as being "blind leaders of the blind." And they took a pledge against the use of metaphysical terms.

A revolt sprang around from the physicists in the exposition of phenomena that seemed to overturn all current theories of the constitution of matter. Modern science had assumed the existence of real material corpuscles acted upon by physical forces. But now suddenly their indivisible and indestructible atom is suspected of having exploded—blown up, and of having hurled the little fragments of itself, designated by them as corpuscles, in all directions with inconceivable rapidity. And they claimed these corpuscles to be electricity, and thereby they established, in their own estimation, the electrical theory of the universe.

Therefore the constitution of matter as we thought we knew it was brushed aside, and instead of matter we have nothing but electricity. But it is not really the case that the scientist has atoms, corpuscles, ethers and vibrations before him; he only has thoughts, theories and opinions about these elements. He is only dealing with phenomena of whose intrinsic reality he knows nothing. Indeed, if he were consistent he would have to ignore the very existence of mind itself. But Mr. Balfour, in his address, called the attention of the assembled scientists to the fact that in passing from the consideration of the visible, tangible and ponderable elements of nature to the phenomena of the invisible, intangible and imponderable agencies, they must necesssarily depart from the processes of the physicist to those of the philosopher and the metaphysician. He contended that if the scientist returns to his right mind, and contents himself with a patient study of experience, he will find no difficulty in acknowledging the supremacy and priority of mind.

I read with much interest an article bearing upon this subject in Number 902 of The Progressive Thinker, under the heading of "Scintillations," from the facile pen of the accomplished scholar and eminent scientist Edgar L. Larkin, of Lowe Observatory.

In this article the writer aims to give an outline of the trend of the leading scientific thought of to-day, and in accordance with modern thought, says:

"All thoughts, dreams, activities, impressions, influences, intuitions, and entities whatever, that ever appeared in my brain were caused by the oscillations of matter, and they cannot be caused in any other way."

Atomic Theory of Democritus.

This seems to indicate that the scientists of to-day have returned to the atomic theory of Democritus and his successors; that they have gone back nearly 2,400 years to adopt the corpuscles of Democritus, Epicurus and Lucretius, and to drink at the Castalian font of heathen wisdom. They have gone back to take counsel of the heathen philosophers of antiquity, who devised their corpuscular theory to disprove the existence and immortality of the soul, and to annihilate their gods, and sweep them from the cosmic universe. The article then proceeds to give an outline of some of the astounding deductions of very recent science. The statement then sets forth that from 1804 to 1904, physics and chemistry were based upon the absolutely indivisible atoms of matter, the smallest bodies in existence, the atom of hydrogen being the least in weight.

It states that the atom of hydrogen is now broken up into 700 parts called corpuscles, and the atom of mercury into 200,000 parts. Then follow these astounding deductions:

"The mass of one corpuscle is such that the number required to weigh one drugstore grain is 100,000,000,000,000,000,000,000,000."

One Drugstore Grain of Matter.

But with these figures before you how many of my hearers can estimate them?—how many can comprehend their value?

I will try to make it as plain as possible to you.

This tremendous number, consisting of the figure 1 with twenty-six ciphers following it, is what mathematicians call one hundred septillions. But that expression is about as incomprehensible as the figures themselves. I will give an illustration in terms with which you are somewhat familiar. The sum of 100 septillions is equal to 100 million times 100 millions multiplied by 100 millions. And this is the the astounding number of corpuscles which the scientists of to-day have determined that exists in one drugstore grain of matter. This is, indeed, a most astounding statement. Possibly it may be a fact. But who can tell? It is given, not as a postulate, not as an approximation, but as a scientific deduction. The statement that any human intellect can accurately count, measure or weigh such infinitesimally small, invisible corpuscles of matter, is astounding beyond all human comprehension. Is it within the scope of finite minds? It draws most heavily upon human credulity. It is further said:

"And a row of them (corpuscles) placed side by side an inch long would contain 12,500,000,000,000."

This number is 12 trillions 500 billions. Or, in other words, it is 12,500 times 100 millions. These are most extraordinary statements. Instead of being sound deductions of scientific inquiry, they would rather seem to be overdrawn hypotheses and fantastic imaginations of some ardent scientist with an ambition to excel his fellow scientists. Even Professor Larkin, the eminent scientist that he is, in one brief sentence dispels all these scientific vagaries as to weighing, measuring and counting these infinitesimally small, invisible corpuscles of matter. He says:

"No brain, not even that of the ablest mathematician, can commence to think about a corpuscle, of its weight or diameter."

If, therefore, the weight and diameter of these corpuscles transcend human comprehension, how can the number of corpuscles in a drugstore grain be counted? How can they be weighed?

Or if the diameter and dimensions of a corpuscle passes human comprehension, how, I repeat, can the number placed side by side to form a linear inch, be counted or determined?

As easily could you count the number of animals, whose size and dimensions you do not know, which, being placed side by side, would form a line 300 feet long. The statement further represents:

"Nothing whatever exists but corpuscles. This seems to render obsolete the prehistoric word soul. If souls exist they are congeries of corpuscles. * * Since no thing nor entity exists but corpuscles, or ever did, they cannot end and are immortal."

An Eternal, Uncreated Mental Entity.

In dealing with the invisible, intangible, imponderable elements of nature, who can state it as a scientific fact that there is nothing in existence but corpuscles? It may be stated as a postulate, but not as a fact. By no means do we undervalue the great importance of scientific research, nor do we minimize scientific deduction. If the above statement were given as a postulate or hypothesis, we could have nothing to say. Only this: we might disregard the hypothesis, as without merit, or we might present a more reasonable one. But it is quite another thing to give it as a clean-cut deduction of science. May there not be an eternal, uncreated mental entity, a vis dirigens, which from its inherent uncreated energy can modify and control the physical forces, so as to segregate these corpuscles and build them up into the multiplied forms that exist on the earth? I submit, when we depart from demonstrated fact and go into the realms of hypothesis, it is as reasonable to postulate the existence of an eternal, uncreated psychic entity, a vis dirigens, with its inherent powers, as it is to postulate that nothing exists in the universe but corpuscles of matter. Yes, the hypothesis of eternal, uncreated, individuate psychic entities with their own inherent powers is more reasonable than that "nothing exists but corpuscles." Does the energy that resides inherent in the corpuscles build up the infinite variety of organic forms? For many years I have followed the trend of scientific research. I have paid close attention to current deductions. I have given careful attention to the researches of Professor J. J. Thompson, one of England's greatest scientists; to those of Lord Kelvin, and others—the most eminent scientists of both Europe and America. I followed their researches and deductions in electricity, in their attempt to count, weigh and measure the number of atoms of matter that could be contained in an ordinary thimble.

They gave out as scientific conclusions some of the most astounding results—results akin to those mentioned herein, in relation to the corpuscles in a drugstore grain. But, I could not say then, nor do I believe now, that it is within the scope of mortal man to count, measure or weigh with precision the invisible atoms or corpuscles of matter, with numbers running up into the octillions, nonillions or decillions. Approximations, postulates and hypotheses are one thing, but exact scientific deductions are another. Given the ancient atoms, or the modern corpuscles, it is difficult to see how scientists can by scientific deduction account for the infinite variety of forms, organized and inorganic. Life cannot arise from non-life. Mind cannot arise from non-mind. Ex nihilo nihil fit—

"Out of nothing nothing comes," is as true to-day as it was in the days of Democritus or Lucretius.

The Soul and Laws of Gravity.

Some years ago a number of scientific tests were made and carefully conducted to determine whether or not the soul entity is a substance subject to the laws of gravity. Scales were carefully made and adjusted for the purpose, on which was placed the bed with the invalid who was to be made the subject of the experiment. The matters of weighing and carrying out the process in matters of detail was supervised by trained scientists. In these experiments the body weighed precisely the same a moment after death that it did a moment before death. If these experiments were accurate in all respects, and correct results made known, it would logically follow, either that there is no soul, or that the soul is an entity not subject to the laws of gravity. But if the evidence aliund is sufficient to warrant the belief that man has an immortal soul, then the experiments would establish the fact that the soul entity is a substance not subject to the physical law of gravity. But on the 11th, 12th and 13th of the present month the daily papers have given accounts of similar experiments under the supervision of five physicians in Boston, headed by Dr. MacDougal of Haverhill, Mass.

These experiments, it is said, extended over a period of six years, and the conclusions reached by these eminent physicians is to the effect that the human soul weighs from one-half ounce to one ounce, avoirdupois. From their experiments on dogs, they find that the weight of a dog immediately after death is precisely the same as it was before death. This would signify either that the dog has no soul, or that its soul entity differs from that of man, in this that it is not subject to the law of gravity. These experiments, if accurately conducted, and all errors carefully eliminated, open up to psychologists a question of the most vital and far-reaching importance. I contend, however, that the experiments and tests have not as yet been sufficiently crucial to warrant a scientific deduction free from doubt and suspicion.

There is surely a discrepancy between the results of the former experiments and those of recent date. Errors are not all eliminated from the former, the latter or both. Other experiments along these lines with absolutely scientific precision are requisite before the results announced can be accepted as scientific deductions. Many of the most delicate factors are involved in this problem, all of which must be taken into account before a satisfactory result can be reached.

A few of these factors are the following. For instance, the human organism is built up not alone from food and drink, but from an infinitude of invisible particles, or corpuscles of matter absorbed from the atmosphere and ether, and incorporated into the physical organism. During old age and illness the affluent corpuscles exceed in weight the influent ones. At death the last inhaling breath enters the lungs before the last exhaling breath departs therefrom. And how do these balance? These elements have weight, however small, and in the solution of the problem these, with other elements, must be taken into the account. The difficulty or the impossibility of doing so is no answer to the question. The accurate scientific conclusion is what is demanded.

Matter and the Soul.

The question should, and undoubtedly will, be pursued until unquestioned results shall be obtained. But if experiments along this line shall finally establish the fact that the conscious intelligence, the reasoning and mental faculties of the dog are the product of corpuscles of particled matter, a problem of the grhvest importance will confront the psychologist. All who believe in the immortality of the human soul will be brought face to face with this, the most momentous problem they have ever considered. For the mental faculties and conscious intelligence of the dog are the same in kind as those of man. They differ only in degree. And if it can be scientifically established that the mentality of the dog is the output and product of particled matter, how can you escape the conclusion that the conscious, intelligent mentality of man, the human soul, does not originate from the same source? How can you prove that the mental faculties of the dog arose from unthinking matter, and that the mentality of man, the human soul, could not so arise. Please solve the riddle, you who can.

As has been said, in 1904 modern scientists swept away Dalton's theory of chemical atoms, which had borne uninterrupted and unchallenged sway in the world of science for one hundred years, and substituted in place thereof the theory of corpuscles of which we have spoken. But this has been the history of science through all its journey from remote antiquity to the present day. Each theory, though honored and respected in its day, has been swept aside and another substituted in its place, so that what was science yesterday is only nescience to-day. And to-day no scientist can say when the corpuscular theory of the universe will be swept aside to give place to another. And no one can predict what scientific theories will obtain in the scientific world one hundred years from to-day. No one can tell how many of the scientific notions of to-day will, at that time, have been swept into a common grave of oblivion.

Mathematics is the only science that has reached any degree of certainty, or made any approximation toward a finality. On the other hand the speculative sciences are all at sea. None of them has reached any finality. There is no finality in the science of Biology, Zoology or Physiology. There is none in Astronomy, Geology or Chemistry. There is absolutely no finality in any of these sciences, nothing even approaching a finality in any of them, except in Mathematics. They are at all at sea, drifting at random like a ship without a rudder. And no scientist can predict whether or not any of the current theories shall be foundered upon the treacherous reefs and go down beneath the lashing waves, or whether they shall ride triumphantly into a haven of safety, unchanged and unimpaired.

The Conscious Soul.

In entering upon the second branch of my subject I shall, for the purposes of this address, postulate that the mind, the individual, conscious, intelligent ego, the spirit or soul—known by whatever name—is an individual, uncreated entity. I use these terms synonymously, as meaning one and the same thing.

I hold that the soul is a substance having, peculiar to itself, qualities and attributes different and distinct from those inhering in the substance we ordinarily know and designate as matter. I take it that the human being as he exists on earth is a dual unit, consisting of an ultimate, uncreated psychic body composed of uncreated corpuscles of matter. The mental or soul entity is the eternal, uncreated individuate psychic unit, having inherent in itself all the powers, attributes, faculties and impulses manifested by the human mind on earth, plus all the mental energies, faculties and attributes potentially inherent, and as yet undeveloped and undisplayed here on earth, for the progressive development of the mind is endless and eternal.

The substance we know as matter is particled, consisting of ultimate, uncreated atoms or corpuscles, and from these units the human body is constructed. Hence every form of matter, organized or inorganic, except the ultimate corpuscle, is a transient and temporary structure, and sooner or later, in minutes or eons, all material forms will again be resolved into their ultimate elements that they may be used again in building other forms of exquisite make and living beauty.

Thus it is and ever has been. The psychic entity, the immortal soul, uncreated and eternal, has existed as a psychic unit through all eternity past, and will continue with a permanent and eternal existence through all the ages and eons of the future, while all forms of matter are unstable, transient and fleeting. In sunshine or in shadow, in gleaming light or Egyptian darkness, through all the fleeting forms of matter, the psychic unit, the conscious, intelligent soul has persisted and will endure through all the cycles of the future.

> "The stars shall fade away, the Sun himself
> Grow dim with age and Nature sink in years,
> But man shall flourish in immortal youth
> Unhurt amid the wars of elements,
> The wreck of matter and the crash of worlds."

Immortal and Eternal Existence.

The human soul, the psychic entity, being uncreated, is irrevocably stamped with an immortal and eternal existence. It is unchangegd and unchangeable, except in its mental and psychic unfoldment in knowledge and progressive development. Fire cannot destroy nor frost congeal it. It cannot suffer from hunger, thirst or disease. No cosmic change nor curse of God can affect it. It is not a compound and cannot be destroyed. It is the same, "Yesterday, To-Day, and Forever."

The Soul Builds the Physical Body.

Matter has its own inherent qualities and properties. The ultimate corpuscles, the atoms, the molecules, the masses and the rolling spheres in the stellar universe are all acted upon and attracted by the physical forces. But none of these are inherent qualities of the soul. Human beings are attracted to each other, not by any one of these forces, not by corpuscles, atomic or molecular action, nor by the force of gravity. Mind is attracted to mind and soul to soul by kindness, gentleness, sympathy, affection and love. These are the psychic forces that bind heart to heart and soul to soul.

By acquiring a knowledge of the intrinsic character and faculties of the human mind as manifested here, we shall be able thereby to know something of the mentality and characteristics of the soul in the realms supernal. For the soul over there is the same soul that was incarnate here. It is co-eternal with the uncreated corpuscles of matter. It is the architect and builder of the human body, and electricity is the connecting link between mind and matter. In earth-life it constructs its body from terrestrial physical substance, and it can thereby come in contact with gross matter, and the physical facts of its environment. And in ethereal realms its body will be composed of ethereal substance, and always of the substance of its environment. The soul builds the physical body by modifying, controlling and directing the physical forces, through its inherent power of voluntary and automatic action, whereby it posits the ultimate corpuscles of matter in position to form the specific organic structure. Through passion it lays the foundation of the human edifice in protoplasm, and by appetite and hunger it supplies sustenance for building and replenishing the organism, and at death the soul takes its departure. Then must the body be dissolved into the corpuscles of matter from which it arose, and the spirit shall go to the realms supernal from whence it came. Then "Will Death be swallowed up in victory."

Shall we believe in irrefragable law?

Shall we believe in spirit guidance?

If we believe in the former, we shall believe in a systematic and orderly cosmos, with no hiatus or cataclysm in its essential continuity.

If we believe in the latter we shall believe in a mentally directed universe, with purpose and forethought, carrying on its evolutionary processes from an eternal past to an unending future, with a definite aim, not left to the random control of physical forces, like a ship without a pilot. Or shall we believe that both of these systems of forces are working in harmonious relations throughout the universe? The two beliefs are entirely consistent with each other. For we must remember that the universe consists not of matter and motion alone, nor yet of spirit and volition alone, but of both, which always work together in harmony. Scientific men contend that the first of these conditions alone exists, and they scout the idea of existence of the soul. It is unscientific and absurd, I contend, to deny the attributes of intelligence, guidance and personality, of sympathy, affection and love, to the whole. For man is a part of the whole, and the whole contains all of its parts. Individual conscious intelligence cannot be eliminated from the universe. The planet, even, is subject to conscious intelligent control. The intellect, the human soul, can so modify and control the physical forces and the elements of nature as to construct inland seas and join ocean to ocean. It can construct and maintain highways of travel under land and sea, and can traverse the heavens above.

It can denude the continent of its primeval forest, and produce climatic changes. It can cause the barren desert to become a bed of roses and exotic flowers. It can cause the waste places of earth to be covered with verdure and golden-headed wheat, and to produce sustenance for cattle upon a thousand hills. It can work changes in the species, and produce new and fresh varieties of organic life.

In all of these things, and in untold millions of others, there is no clash, there is no cataclysm, between the mental faculties and the physical forces. They work hand in hand together; they dwell in peace and harmony through the infinite and eternal realms of the universe. Yes, the soul has the inherent power to modify and direct the physical forces of the universe. And in this control of mind over matter there is no hiatus, there is no break, there is no cataclysm.

Tell me not, then, that it is unscientific, or unreasonable, to hold that the mind, the human soul, can modify, direct and control the physical forces and hold dominion over the forms of matter. Our powers on earth, it is true, are circumscribed, but we possess the inherent potentiality to do far more that has ever yet been done on earth. With nothing in existence but corpuscles and physical forces, how long think you would it have been before the pyramids of Egypt would have arisen, terrace above terrace, from foundation to apex? How long, with nothing in existence but corpuscles, would it have been before the cities of New York, Boston, London or Chicago would have been built? Were it not for the human intellect, the human soul, how long would the lightning have flashed in forked and zigzag lines across heaven's high dome before it would have driven a trolley car or lighted the streets of a great city?

But the uncreated intellect, the uncreated soul, known by whatever name, with its inherent powers of mentality, has so modified and directed the physical forces that under its potential energy all the works of art, science and civilization have arisen. Every stone in the great pyramids was hewn from the mountain sides, in opposition to the force of cohesion, and in defiance thereof. Every block of granite was by the inherent energy of the human mind, the immortal soul, placed in position against the force of gravity and in defiance thereof.

The human mind, the psychic entity, is vested with the inherent power of directing and controlling the physical forces, and of modifying, influencing and directing the actions of human beings and psychic entities. The traction manager of a great railroad can sit in his office and direct and control the actions of hundreds of human beings. It is, I submit, a more reasonable hypothesis to hold that the universe is dual, consisting of uncreated corpuscles of matter with their inherent physical forces, and of uncreated psychic units, uncreated souls, containing their inherent faculties and attributes of conscious, intelligent mentality, than to assume that nothing but corpuscles exists. And so far as human experience goes in this life, the mental and spiritual activities of man are superior to the physical forces. For the conscious mind can harness these forces and make them subservient to its will.

And if man is immortal, it is the human mentality that has an eternal persistent existence. For the same mentality that terminated its earth-life at death, commences its pilgrimage in realms eternal a moment after. And it commences there with the same mental development, character and state of progression with which it terminated its existence here. For life is eternal progression, in consonance with natural and eternal law. It is a natural and eternal growth. No man can be swung from the gallows into glory, for all progression is an eternal growth under natural and psychic law.

If, as the scientist contends, the soul is constructed from corpuscles of matter; if the soul is a compound entity; if the soul is derived from non-soul, then at death it must return to its original status, to its primary condition. If this be true, you may henceforth and forever, once for all, bid a last farewell to the cherished hope of immortality. Then forever after you may class the old historic belief, and the modern psychic faith in immortality, as a fallacy and a delusion.

BUT IT IS NOT TRUE. THE SOUL IS AN ETERNAL AND UNCREATED ENTITY, AND THE WISDOM OF THE SCIENTIST, THE MACHINATIONS OF THE PRIEST, OR "THE GATES OF HELL, CANNOT PREVAIL AGAINST IT."

CANNOT DISCERN GOD.

Cannot See the Utility of Worshiping.

To the Editor:—A Chicago Bishop of the Episcopal Church deplores the decadence of religious piety among church-going people. "Many," he says, "go to church because it is the fashion. They go to have a good time, while a few go to meet with God to worship him," thus inferring that the worship of God is going out of date.

Is this a sign of retrogression or progression, ignoring superstition?

But speaking of meeting with God, who ever met with God in church to worship him?

No church has even ever reported having entertained God.

To worship God, we, in order to excite our admiration for Him, must behold Him so as to know He is God; otherwise we cannot in reality or truth worship Him.

Why should humans worship that which they do not handle, touch or see? What use, anyway, would human worship be to the Divine?

Is not the whole thing a delusion and the invention of an ancient foxy priestcraft?

When the Lord of the Universe wants humans to worship Him, He, I think, will present Himself for that purpose. He does not present Himself now.

Alleged worshipers do not behold Him. Houses of worship are therefore a misnomer; hence, the worshiping masses are losing faith in their alleged houses of worship, seeing nothing there to worship; nevertheless they have been bled and fleeced and kept on their knees in ignorance and rags, while their clergy, contributing nothing to the material wealth of the world, have lived on the fat of the land, or, as Clara Watson has put it, "reveling in luxury and regal splendor."

But which of the Gods does the good Bishop favor for worship? The God of Nature or God of the Jews—the Christians' "Our Father"?

If the God of the Jews, the Christians' "Our Father," I am dubious of His existence. I am inclined to think that He, like our Christmas-tide Santa Claus, has no existence except in the imagination—a mere myth of the mind and the direct invention also of an ancient foxy priestcraft.

The Christians' "Our Father," the clergy say, forced us into existence, sinful and depraved as we are, and damned us because we are so. He created, they say, everything good, and yet He made hell and the Devil.

When we cannot help ourselves, He allows us to starve, drown or burn, and what is still worse, "no evil," they say, "can be done in the city that he has not done."

The God of Nature, I think, must be different and more benignly beneficent. We do not see Him nor expect to discern Him. But in His works we can discern Him and infer that behind all these wonders and beauties and bounties of Nature He exists. No one can tell where, but anyone endowed with intelligent reason can judge that He is not the Christians' "Our Father."

It is not the writer who would seem bent on berating the Christians' "Our Father"; it is the Christians themscriptures, a line of conduct unworthy of man, much less of God.

If, however, this service of church worship is intended as a pretense or substitute for the imagination, and no response thereto ever received, would it not be wiser to change the form of worship to that of bestowing deeds of loving kindness upon our fellow beings, one and all, which, I am sure, would be more acceptable to the Gods than that of shouting to them Hallelujahs, or chanting to them praises; especially when receiving from them no grateful response?

Remarkable Invention.

AN INSTRUMENT THAT IMPROVES AND STRENGTHENS EYESIGHT.

Spectacles May Be Abandoned

This instrument, which the inventor has patented, is called "Actina"—a trade-mark word.

In the treatment of eye diseases the inventor of "Actina" claims that there is no need for cutting or drugging the eye in treating most forms of disease. Cataracts, and other abnormal growths have been removed, and weakened vision improved or restored by this new and more humane method. "Actina" has been tested in thousands of cases and has effected marvelous results, many people testifying that it saved their eyesight. So confident are the owners that this device is an instrument of great merit that they will give absolutely a free trial. They want everyone interested to make a thorough investigation and a personal test of "Actina." One will be sent on trial postpaid so that any person can give it a test.

They issue a book—a Treatise on Disease—which tells all about "Actina," the diseases it will remove, what others think of it, what marvelous results it has effected, and all about the responsibility of its owners—all will be sent absolutely free upon request. This book should be in the home of every family. Address Actina Appliance Company, Dept. 312R, 811 Walnut Street, Kansas City, Mo.

The Psychic Riddle.

By I. K. Funk, D.D., LL.D., Editor-in-Chief of "The Standard Dictionary"; Author of "The Widow's Mite, and Other Psychic Phenomena," "The Next Step in Evolution," etc.

A book full of psychic suggestions, supported by startling experiences, all told in a wonderfully conservative way. It harmonizes with the judgment pronounced by The Review of Reviews, New York, on the author's previous publication of this subject: "A very sensible, cautious, level-headed piece of work all through;" and also with the judgment on the same book pronounced by the Cleveland Record: "There has never been so fair and painstaking a book put forth on this subject as this one." Price, $1.00.

THE LEADING WORKS OF E. D. BABBITT, M. D.

The Principles of Light and Color.

Superbly issued, royal 8vo, with over 200 engravings and colored plates. Price, $5.00; in massive binding, imitating half Russia, 50c. extra. "An imposing volume of nearly 600 pages. Shows a great amount of research on the part of the author. Will prove a great acquisition to Scientific Libraries."—N. Y. Herald.

Human Culture and Cure.

In six parts, five parts being already issued.

PART I. The Philosophy of Cure, including Methods and Instruments: 75 cents.

PARTS III and IV in one volume; $1.00. Part III treats of Mental and Psychological forces; Part IV of the Nervous System and Insanity. "This work discloses for the first time the chemical mystery of mental phenomena, throws the first clear light upon the nature and processes of hypnotism and all kindred psychological phenomena which have never before been explained or understood. Dr. Babbitt has here not only given the rationale of hypnotism, psychometry, clairvoyance and mental science, including the mysterious subject of memory, but has furnished abundant illustrations of their working. The subject of Pheno-physiognomy alone is of priceless value as enabling us to understand our fellow beings around us."—Prof. W. C. Bowman.

PART V. "The Bodily Organs, their Diseases and the Great Natural Methods for Their Cure," aims to be the most practical work on healing thus far given to the public. Price, $1.

Health and Power.

Brief Natura' Treatment for 110 Diseases. Price, 3 cents. "Worth its weight in diamonds."

SOCIAL UPBUILDING. Paper, 15 cents.

RELIGION.—A most thoughtful and excellent work. Price, cloth, $1.10; paper, 60 cents.

ANTIQUITY UNVEILED.

The most important revelations concerning the true origin of Christianity. Reader, in bringing to your notice "Antiquity Unveiled," it is with the sincere hope that you are earnestly looking for the truth, regardless of any other consideration. If such is the case, this advertisement will deeply interest you, and after reading this brief description you will doubtless wish to give the work a careful perusal. Price, $1.50.

A MASTERLY WORK.

Continuity of Life a Cosmic Truth

By Prof. W. M. Lockwood.

A masterly presentation of an important subject. A powerful argument along new and scientific lines, establishing on a scientific basis the fact of the continuity of personal individual conscious selfhood after laying aside the physical body. A book of rare value. With several fine illustrations. Cloth, $1.00.

For sale at this office.

Price, cloth, $1.00. Paper 50c.

ASTRAL WORSHIP By J. H. Hill, M.D. A valuable contribution to the current discussion of religious problems. The author by illustrations and a planisphere (a representation of the celestial sphere upon a plane with adjustable circles), traces most of the myths which lie at the base of Christianity to their origin in sun and star worship. The astronomical facts given possess great value, the illustrations rare and curious. The book is bound in only one style—heavy boards. Price $1.

HEROES AND HERO WORSHIP, AND THE HEROIC IN HISTORY.

By Thomas Carlyle.

A remarkable book by a remarkable man. Marked by terse strength and vigor, deep thought, philosophy and dramatic tensity of earnestness. A notable literary effort. A fine edition in cloth. Price 50 cents.

General Survey.

The Spiritualistic Field—Its Workers, Its Work, and General Progress, the World Over.

THIS GENERAL SURVEY DEPARTMENT IS ONLY INTENDED TO CHRONICLE THE ENGAGEMENTS AND WORK OF SPEAKERS AND MEDIUMS. A REPORT OF WHAT THE VARIOUS SPEAKERS SAY WILL NOT BE PUBLISHED, AS WE HAVE NOT SPACE SUFFICIENT FOR THAT PURPOSE.

KEEP COPIES of your poems sent to this office, for they will not be returned if we have not space to use them.

The Song Cards for sale at this office at $4 per hundred, by mail $4.50, are the help you need in society work.

W. V. Nicum, prominent as lecturer, writes: "In this day of combines and through a culmination of circumstances I expect by the 1st of July, 1907, to withdraw from the commercial world, for a time, at least, in which I have been engaged for years; therefore I shall be open for engagements as lecturer, either for itinerant work or a permanent engagement of six months or a year. I hope the time will come ere long when associations will engage speakers or mediums of their choice, and keep them long enough to show their worth and give them a chance to build a Constructive Spiritual Church, which means in time a spiritual Spiritualism. Address me at my home, 631 River street, Dayton, Ohio."

There is prospect of Georgia Gladys Cooley spending a week or ten days at home pretty soon, to rest from her extremely strenuous labors in the field spiritual. Good reports come regarding her work. She will be a welcome member of the Elgin Picnic if she can be spared from those who love her at Meadville, Pa.

Brother Burgess handed the Secretary of the State Association $18.37 cents for the medium's Defense Fund of the State Association of , Illinois, last week, collections from Maggie Waite's meeting the Sunday before. Let the good work go on. There is need of a good fund of this kind. It will not be otherwise handled than for the good of good mediumship.

Frank T. Ripley has closed a successful two weeks' engagement at West Grove Hall, at Balbec, Ind. He has the last weeks of June open for engagements for lectures and tests. Address all letters to Oxford, O., 112 North Beech street.

J. W. Moyer of Boston, Mass., writes "J. M. Semple, one of our foremost and well known test mediums, has been doing exceptionally good work in Massichusetts this year. After serving the society in Worcester for a month, interesting large audiences, he has just concluded a two month's engagement at Ayers' Temple. He was greeted by large and enthusiastic audiences who listened with much interest to his lectures on the "Planets," and demonstrations of spirit return. His work here is of sterling worth and appreciated by all. Some of the most learned and scientific thinkers of the "Hub" were present. His method of giving readings through the planets is clear, concise and to the point, a phase peculiar to himself given through his ancient Persian Magi guide, who gives the astrological delineation. He has well been called the Prophet medium. None can deny or even distrust that his messages are spirit given."

Hattie W. Wood writes: "We are having good meetings and good success at Fall River, Mass. We have bought a little church, and hold meetings every Sunday under the name of the First Spiritual Church and Lyceum. May 6, our speaker was Mural F. Litch; June 2, Lizzie D. Butler; June 9, R. L. Bishop; June 16, Mrs. Call, of Salem, Mass.

Friends desiring to see Mrs. Gill for private readings will please note that she is at present out of the city, and is visiting her brother and his family, at Warsaw Ind. Mrs. Hamilton Gill will retuln to Chicago about June 26, for a few weeks before camp meeting opens. The usual Tuesday and Thursday circles have been discontinued till fall.

Secretary of Detroit, Michigan, writes: "On May 26, this First Church of the Soul closed its meetings for the summer, and instead of our regular meeting we let the Lyceum children have full sway. They gave a most delightfully interesting program to a large and enthusiastic audience. We have closed a progressive year, and feel that we have been of some good in bringing light into a good many homes in Detroit. Last Sunday, June 9, the children surprised their pastor and leader, Mrs. Crawford, with a beautiful gift and bouquet of flowers, it being her birthday. The pretty little presentation speech gotten up by a boy of twelve was worthy of a good deal of admiration. The pastor deserves all credit for the work done by these children, and they in turn deserve a great deal for their interest. Even now they are looking forward to opening up the class again in the Fall."

Etiennne Faukes writes: "The Progressive Spiritual Society held its regular Sunday evening meeting at N. W. Corner of North ave and Burling st. Once more we heard the voice of one of our greatest generals in the field of Spiritualism, Dr. Warne. He made it is clear to us all that it is necessary for Spiritualists to wake up and perceive our most dangerous enemy, the Church of Rome, whose leaders do their utmost to wipe out mediumship through the laws. I regret that so many Spiritualists and societies are not awakened to perceive the danger. The State Association and the N. S. A. need the help so badly and how easy could every member of every society give 25 cents a year for their assistance. What a great help it would be for our generals who have to be on all ends and cornrs to fight for our rights against our most dishonest and cunning enemy, the AntiChrist of Rome."

Mrs. Kate Hooker writes from Los Angeles, Cal.: "I have taken Spiritualist papers for 50 years, and I consider The Progressive Thinker the best of all."

The Nature Cure Series. Dr. Henry Lindtahr, an eminent physician, has just published volume One of "The Nature Cure Series." It is most excellent, and valuable to the sick and well alike. Price 25cents. Direct to the author, 308 Ashland Boul., Chicago, Ill.

BEAR IN MIND that the editor of The Progressive Thinker is in no wise responsible for the views expressed by contributors. He may, or may not, agree with their respective views.

Mrs. Susie L. Thompson, one of our well known West Side mediums, has given $5.00 to help the State Association in its grand work in defense of mediums. Many of the mediums have responded well to the call for help, but should we look only to the hard working mediums? Should not every Spiritualist that has ever received a message feel that it is not only a duty, but a pleasure to help in this work for freedom and independence from obnoxious laws. The State Association must be sustained; it has done a glorious work.

Samuel A. Huntington writes from Malden, Mass.: "At the evening service June 9, a fine audience gathered to meet and hear again our ex-president, Mrs. Alice M. Whall of Everett, Mass., who was the speaker and message bearer. She prefaced her work by reading a beautiful poem entitled "Beyond," by Ella Wheerer Wilcox, after which, she devoted over an hour to giving many interesting messages. Mrs M. A. George of Boston, will be the speaker and message bearer on June 16, and Oliver Thomas Newcomb of said city on June 23. We will have a social with refreshments on the 3rd Thursday evening, and an apron and bag sale on the 4th Thursday evening. Contributions respectfully solicited. Circles every Thursday evening, and 11 a. m. and 3:30 p. m., Sundays."

Correspondent writes: "The New York State Association met for their annual convention in Plymouth Spiritual Church, Rochester, N. Y., President Richardson in the chair. Mrs. May A. Price of Washington, gave the opening invocation. Friday evening the large and beautiful church was crowded. Dr. Austin gave a very beautiful welcome to the convention, to which Mrs. Reynolds responded. Mrs. May A. Price gave the lecture of the evening, setting forth the truths of Spiritualism as scientifically demonstrating the immortality of man and the progressive life as the condition in the hereafter. The lecture contained much food for thought, proving Mrs. Price's ability to interest and instruct her audience. She was ordained to the ministry Sunday at the afternoon session, Mrs. Reynolds conducting the ordination service, and Dr. Austin gave the charge. Mrs Price will remain in Rochester for a time, working in connection with the Plymouth Church. But is open for engagements with societies for the coming season."

M. Lizzie Beals writes of the Worcester Association of Spiritualists, G. A. R. Hall, 35 Pearl street: "For the first two Sundays in May, Mrs. Carrie F. Loring of East Braintree occupied our platform. May 19 and 26, Miss Kate R. Stiles of Onset, served our society The Massachusetts State Association held a mass meeting in G. A. R. Hall Friday, May 24, and was greeted by a large and appreciative audience at both services. The members and friends of the Worcester society look forward to these annual occasions with pleasant anticipations. Oscar A. Edgerly will serve our society for the first two Sundays in June, which closes our meetings for the season of 1906-'07."

Mrs. A. J. Pettengill writes from Cleveland, Ohio: "I closed a very successful engagement with the Progressive Society of Spiritualists in Elyria, Ohio, for the entire month of May. This month, June, I am serving the socitey at the First Spiritualists' Temple, Fullerton street, Cleveland, Ohio, I am gratified to find so many of the young people who seem to be interested, many of them young men."

Mrs. Mattie Burnham, Secretary, writes from Macomb, Ill.: "Mrs. Henrietta L. Lichtig is serving our society during the month of June. She is creating a great interest. The attendance has been good. The people are beginning to realize that there are truths in Spiritualism. Her message work is of the best, and the materialist, along with the prejudiced mind cannot fail to recognize the messages given. A part of the time we have message seances, at which we charge an admission of ten cents. In that way we have for our audiences earnest, thoughtful people. Societies near here desiring a good worker will do well to write Mrs. Lichtig while she is in this part of the State. I am anxious to see the cause grow."

The noted medium, May S. Pepper, and Edward Ward Vanderbilt, a very wealthy man, have been united in marriage. They are now on their way to Europe. We congratulate them most heartily.

R. Cowell writes from Oakland, Cal.: "Services have been held at the Trinity Spiritual Church, No.521 12th street, during the last 4 years by Mrs. Dr. Stewart Ellis, with an occasional visitor from the East. Mrs. Mattie Hull was with us one Sunday. Her engagement was such she could not be with us any longer. We expected John W. Ring, but as yet he has not gotten this far, having devoted the most of his time in the southern part of the state. We have had the pleasure of hearing Dr. N. F. Ravlin, the two months past."
OBIT

Mrs. Turk writes from Hinsdale, Ill.: "Mrs. L. A.Griffin the renowned English speaker and medium, is now residing in Shisdale, Ill. She will be pleased to accept engagements with societies, camps, etc."

Mrs. Clara Wagner, Defiance, O., writes: "The First Spiritual Society had a business meeting June 6, and elected officers. The society has held very few meetings in the past year. The cause of it was, the writer was the speaker for the society and in the meantime had moved to Bowling Green, Ohio, and that made it very difficult to hold meetings. Now I have moved to Defiance again, and I am glad to say the members are making arrangements to have meetings at their homes. Our worthy president added to the officers two young ladies that are of a very sweet disposition. We feel that they will be a great help to our meetings. One is Pearl Abele, our correspondent for The Progressive Thinker, and the other is Mary Kline, for organist. The names of our officers are as follows: President, Bert Ide; vice-president, J. W. Stewart; secretary, Mrs. Minnie Smith; cashier, Mrs. Hettie Abele; trustees, H. W. Kline, Mrs. Story, Mrs. Ide; Mrs. Clara Wagner, speaker, 720 Francis street, Defiance, Ohio.

TAKE NOTICE.— Correspondents are requested when writing for this paper to use either a typewriter or a pen, with black ink. Write on only one side of the paper, and in a plain, legible hand, and thus avoid the necessity of preparing your copy for the printer. Please bear this in mind.

Boston Meetings.

The First Spiritualist Ladies' Aid Society meets in Appleton Hall,9 Appleton street, Boston, Mass., every Friday.

The Ladies' Lyceum Union meets in Dwight Hall, 514 Tremont street, Boston , Mass., every Wednesday.

The Ladies' Industrial Union meets in Dwight Hall, 514 Tremont street, every Thursday.

The Illinois Sunflower Club will have an excursion and picnic to Michigan City, on Saturday, July 13, on the famous new steamship, Theodore Roosevelt, Chicago's greatest ship. It leaves Chicago 10 a. m. and 2:30 p. m. Leaves Michigan City 4:20 p. m. and 7:45 p. m. Tickets, only 75 cts. round trip. Children, 5 and under 12 years, 40 cents. Get your tickets early. Docks: South end Clark St. Bridge. Tickets can be purchased of Mrs, Belle Curtis, 615 Otto street; Mrs. A. W. Bloom, 1113 Lincoln avenue, on the North Side; Mrs. Dr. Cross, 560 E. 55th street, and Mrs. O. B. Wilson, No. 6 East 47th street, on the South Side; Mrs. Peet, 874 W. Madison street, and Mrs. E. J. Bloom, 896 Turner avenue., and Mrs. J. R. Francis, 40 Loomis street, on the West Side, and also at the boat landing. We expect a delightful time, and invite everyone to come and join us. Remember the date, July 13; in the sultry summer time, for what is so healthful and invigorating as a day spent on beautiful Lake Michigan.

Geo. A. Letford, Drummer, goes to St. Louis, Des Moines, Ia., then to Minneapolis, Minn, then to Beardley, Minn., where he has a cottage; goes there for a rest. Will attend the camps in Michigan the last of July.

R. N. Crane writes: "Inclosed you will find an order for $1.00 for the Morris Pratt Institute. Who would not contribute one dollar to the Morris Pratt Institute, which, at the same time is a tribute to the memory of Moses Hull? When a proposition was made to Mattie that the Spiritualists should erect a monument in memory of her husband, she nobly said: "No!" Mr. Hull would feel the greatest injustice had been done his work were money to be contributed for such a purpose and the school to which he gave his life were to fail, for lack of financial support."

Peter J. Loeb whites from Brooklyn, N. Y.: "I want to tell you that with all the darkness made by Mooreism in New York City, and many other so-called mediums coming into our field of labor, our Rev. Emma C. Resch has done splendid work and has made a foundation for the Church of Divine Light. I also want to thank you for the interest you have taken in our Church through your worthy paper.'

The well-known young worker, H. F. Arnold, will serve the Hyde Park Occult Society on Sunday, June 23rd. The society holds its meetings at 319 East 55th street.

Mrs. Sayers writes from Smithville, Texas:—Mrs. Isa Wilson Kaynor, pastor of the Truthseekers' Society of Dallas, spent a week on her semi-annual visit, as is her custom, with the First Progressive Spiritualist Society of Smithville, which she organized three years ago. Since then she has organized the First Bohemia Church of Spiritualists at Koaver, and on this trip received the application for a society at Taylor, Texas. Friends from Koaver and Taylor, as well as Smithville, were made happy through the instructions received through Mrs. Kayner from their spirit friends, and will always welcome her, because of the thorough and convincing work she has done in Texas, where she has spent four years in the service of the cause of love and truth.

Mrs. J. O. Ellis writes:—Rev. W. F. Peck was with the Spirit of Truth Society of Springfield, Mo., during the month of May, and notwithstanding the inclement weather, entertained quite a few besides the faithful. We were very much pleased with his work, and think he has no superiors. He could only stay with us one month and left just as he was getting well acquainted. We hope that he will find it in his line of duty to return to us in the near future. We will welcome him gladly, as Brother Peck is certainly able to lend the light. All honor to our State president, Bro. McArthur, for the good work he is doing to make our cause beyond reproach, and also thanks to him for using his influence to bring Brother Peck amongst us. May the good work go on.

The Illinois Sunflower Club will serve tea on June 25th from 2 to 5 p. m. in Lincoln Hall, 70 East Adams Street. Each cup of tea entitles the holder to a reading by one of our mediums. Come and bring your friends.

Mrs. Cora Wagner has returned to Defiance, Ohio, and will resume meetings there at the homes of the members. The officers elected are as follows: President, Mr. Best Ide; vice-president, J. W. Stewart; secretary, Mrs. Minnie Smith; cashier, Mrs. Hettie Abele; trustees, H. W. Kline, Mrs. Story and Mrs. Ide; Mrs. Clara Wagner, speaker.

Geo. A. Letford, the noted Drummer Medium, was in the city last week. He will visit St. Louis, Mo., Des Moines, Ia., Minneapolis, Minn., and then to his summer cottage at Beardsley, Minn., where he goes to rest a while. He will attend the camps in Michigan the last of July.

Ferd. C. Suhrer writes "The Fraternal Order of Spiritualists has secured the services of Mr. P. B. Hadley, who will organize and drill a choir for our services next season. We have some excellent talent, and this will be one of the new features. We are planning to present a number of theatrical entertainments which will also attract the younger element of histrionic ability. This will afford an excellent opportunity for those desiring voice culture, and those desiring to enlist should address Alex Caird, M. D., 598 W. Monroe street, as soon as convenient. Owing to the unfavorable weather on Tuesday, May 28, we did not have as many people out at the Chutes as was expected; however, the attendance was encouraging and next year we will secure a later date. It is encouraging to meet with friends who express regret at not having our meetings to attend on Sundays. They are all eager for our opening, as in transmitting messages our mediums are a credit to their guides and to the Fraternal Order. Mrs. Susie Dill, one of the most popular mediums of the West Side, having recovered from a recent illness, will be added to our efficient corps of workers."

LOOK OUT!

There will be a Committee of Elgin Spiritualists who will meet all trains to conduct the visitors to the Grove, where the Spiritualist meeting will be held Sunday, June 23. There will be a special train that will leave the 5th avenue Station at 11:50 for Elgin. BE ON TIME.

During the season of 1906 and 1907 Oscar A. Edgerly has filled engagements in the following named places: Newport, Ky.; Cincinnati, O.; Cleveland, O.; Boston, Mass.; Pittsburg, Pa.; Washington, D. C.; Baltimore, Md. and Worcester, Mass. His engagements as made for the Camps and lecture season of 1907, 1908, are as follows: Sunday, June 16, and 23, at Unity Camp, Lynn, Mass.; Sunday, July 14, he will speak at Lake Brady Camp, Ohio; from July 21st to August 16, he will act as chairman at Grand Ledge Camp, Mich.; from August 22 to 26 inclusive, he will fill an engagement at Lily Dale, N. Y. He still has the entire month of September open for engagements. During October, November and December he will fill an engagement with the First Spiritualist Association, of Columbus, O. For January, 1908, he is engaged with the Ladies' Spiritual Temple Fund Society of Cleveland, Ohio. During February and March, he will fill an engagement with the First Association of Spiritualists of Washington, D. C.; during April and May he will serve the Spiritual Fraternity at Ayer's Temple, Boston, Mass. Mr. Edgerly will be pleased to hear from societies desiring to employ trance speaker for September, 1907. Permanent address, 442 Smith street, Lynn, Mass.

W. B. Dixon, of Cache, Okla., says that in spirit he saw the transition of Mrs. McKinley to spirit life. Mr. McKinley was present and conducted her to their future home.

The Grand Ledge Camp, Michigan.

Grand Ledge, Michigan, Spiritualist camp meeting opens July 21. The speakers and mediums engaged this year are among the best known on the Spiritualist platform.

The programme for the forenoons, Sundays and Mondays excepted, will be varied and interesting, consisting of mediums' meetings, conferences, etc. Mediums who are developing, as well as others, will have an opportunity to participate. These exercises are a great aid to those expecting to take up the work.

The fact that Oscar A. Edgerly is being engaged for the fourth season as speaker and chairman of our camp is sufficient warrant of his congenial and affable manner as chairman and entertaining and instructive as a speaker, to insure the successful direction of our present camp.

Mrs. A. E. Sheets, our former president and chairwoman for many years, is so thoroughly established in the hearts of the progressive and initiated public mind that the mere mention of her name as the first speaker upon the list is an agreeable insurance of intellectual eminence in spiritual ethics and oratorical pleasures for the opening session. Her homely welcome to each and all will be a cordial and sympathetic feature in the social environments of the camp.

Mrs. R. S. Lillie, known throughout the length and breadth of America as the "Queen of the Rostrum," is comparatively a new speaker with the patrons of Grand Ledge Camp, but who has been in the spiritual field since (nearly) the advent of modern Spiritualism, but because of the unremitting demand in other fields for her labors have we been unable heretofore to secure the services of this far-famed oratress. That her inspirational gems of thought will be a delightful treat is forecast in her presence with us.

Elizabeth Harlow, who was a new speaker with us last year, proved to be one of our best and will be with us again. She comes highly recommended to the management as having been long in her appointed vocation of saving souls to higher and brighter spiritual aspects of life here, while the future of eternity will take care of itself, and none should miss hearing her.

Mrs. A. Atcheson, of Buffalo, N. Y., with us last year for the first time, is a very good and true message medium, has acted as pastor of a Buffalo Society for several years and is highly recommended by them. She will give messages during the greater part of camp. They are always convincing and to the point.

Geo. A. Letford, known from North to South as the Drummer Medium, and one who has done some wonderful work in Georgia and Florida, where he travels, and has made the South more liberal toward Spiritualism, will also be in attendance and follow some of the lectures with messages.

Spiritualist, skeptic, and all friends are cordially invited to attend Grand Ledge Camp. Remember the date it opens, July 21st, lasting until August 18th. Don't fail to attend.

THE N. S. A.

The Fifteenth Annual Convention of of the National Spiritualists' Association Will Be Held in Masonic Temple, F and Ninth Streets, N. W., Washington, D. C., October 14, 15. 16, 17, and 18, 1907.

Day-sessions, at 10 a. m. and 2 p. m., will be devoted to business only. A cordial invitation is extended to the public to attend these business meetings, to which no admission fee is charged. Evening exercises will consist of grand programs of varied and entertaining numbers, including vocal and instrumental selections by talented artists; Lectures and Spirit messages at each meeting by many of the most noted and gifted platform workers of the country.

Among those who have been invited and who expect to be present and participate in the evening services are W. J. Colville, Mrs. H. P. Russegue, Mesdames Clara Watson, R. S. Lillie, Zadia B. Kates, Elizabeth Harlow, Elizabeth Lowe Watson, Messrs. Dr. Geo. A. Fuller, J. Clegg Wright, Oscar A. Edgerly, Albert P. Blinn, speakers.

Mediums, Mrs. C. D. Pruden, Katie Ham, Georgia Gladys Cooley, E. W. Sprague, Alice Sexsmith, M. T. Longley, and others.

Come One and All to This Great Convention of 5 Days.

Certificate tickets will not be arranged for this year, but special excursion rates at lower value can be secured from all points by visitors and delegates purchasing tickets for Jamestown Exposition with stop-over privileges of ten days at Washington. Call for these at your railroad offices and stations.

The Ebbitt House of Washington, 14th and F Streets N. W., will be the hotel for our people. The Ebbitt is well located within walking distance of Masonic Temple, and a handsome hotel; its usual rates, American plan, are from $4.00 a day up; our special rates there are $2.50 per day, two persons in a room. Write to the Manager and secure your rooms.

THE ANNUAL RECEPTION will be omitted this year, owing to five days' Convention. The sessions will begin Monday, October 14, at 10 a. m. All are invited.

AN EXCELLENT REPORT.

The Annual Meeting of the First Spiritual Union of Norwich. Ct.

The First Spiritual Union of Norwich, Ct., held its annual meeting in the Spiritual Academy on Park street, Thursday evening, June 6, at 8 o'clock.

An unusually large number were present and listened to the reports of the secretary and treasurer, which showed the society to have had a successful season, and various matters of interest to the Union were brought up for discussion. The old board of management was re-elected to serve the coming year.

Secretary, Mary P. Clapp; Treasurer, William F. Bogue; auditors, Henry Bellows and H. R. Hayes; speakers' committee, William F. Bogue, Mr. and Mrs. Nathan Brewster, Mrs. R. A. Jennings and Robert B. Parker; music committee, Mrs. M. E. Twist, Mrs. A. Gould, and Mrs. C. J. Edgerton.

Mr. Albert P. Blinn, whose services have proven so satisfactory to the Union during the past two seasons, remains the coming year as resident speaker; and to his untiring labors, as well as those of his good wife, the society owes much of its present success.

The regular service closed May 26, to be resumed the first Sunday of October, but through the kindness and efforts of our organist, Mr. Charles A. Dowsett, the special concert services which have ben held on the first Sunday evening of each month, will be continued through the vacation season, and we are pleased to have such an attraction to draw us together a few times through the summer.

The members of the Union Dramatic Club have issued tickets for a shirt waist dance to be given at Miller's Dancing Academy, June 19, and preparations are on foot for a lawn party to be held at the residence of Mr. William F. Bogue on June 24, with ice-cream, cake and candy for sale; a palmist in attendance, and some short dramatic sktches to be given by young people.

Much credit is due the members of both the Union and the Helping Hand for their earnest labors during the past season, and a cordial feeling of good fellowship prevails among us.

PASSED TO SPIRIT LIFE.

[Obituaries to the extent of ten lines only will be inserted free. All in excess of ten lines will be charged at the rate of fifteen cents per line. About 7 words constitute a line.]

Jas. R. Little, age 66 years, passed to spirit life at his gold mine in Calaveras Co., Cal., May 30. He was a resident of Oakland, Cal., and leaves a wife and sister who will greatly miss his material presence, counsel and loving ministrations. Brother Little was an old, earnest and effective worker in our spiritual cause, and made the closest friendships whenever, and wherever he appeared. His mortal remains were cremated at the Oakland Crematory, on the 3rd inst. The writer of this notice made a brief address and officiated at the chapel of the crematory. B. F. SLITER.

Passed to spirit life from Ottumwa, Iowa, May 25, Dr. J. W. Nichols, aged 77 years. He was a firm believer in Spiritualism and a Magnetic Healer of some note. The funeral services were in charge of the Masons, and Eastern Stars, of which orders he was an honored member.

LAURA KILBY.

Mrs. Alice Morris of Dallas, Texas, treasurer of the Truth Seekers' Society and wife of President, Geo. W. Morris, passed to spirit life June 8. A popular and useful member, loved by all who knew her. Our loss will be deeply and sincerely deplored. The funeral was largely attended, and the floral offerings and designs numerous and beautiful. The services at her home were conducted by Mrs. Carrie M. Hinsdale, president of the State Association, and Mrs. Isa Wilson Kayner, pastor. At the grounds the services were directed according to the ceremonies of the Knights and Ladies of Honor, of which society she was a prominent member.

MRS. ANNIE J. QUINN.

Montana State Association.

The Montana State Spiritualist Association convened in the City Hall, Billings, Montana, the 6th, 7th, 8th and 9th of June, with Rev. Wilson Fritch as speaker, and Mrs. Eva McCoy as test medium. We had large audiences and a very successful as well as a harmonious convention. Mr. Fritch being a powerful speaker impressed the people with his sincerity, eloquence and gentle manner throughout his many discourses in our city, and the members have prevailed on him to remain during the summer months. Mrs. McCoy, who has endeared herself to us so much as a good honest medium and friend, will soon depart for the Eastern Camps, to return in the fall to Montana. Officers elected for the ensuing year: Mrs. Lillian McCormick, president, Billings; Miss Ida Gustafson, vice-president, Anaconda; Mrs. Jennie Selbeede, secretary, Billings; Mrs. Carrie Smith, treasurer, Billings; trustees, Thomas Capp, Livingston; D. A. Stone, Billings; F. R. St. John, Billings; Mrs. Ella Edwards, Anaconda; Mr. Albert Sharp, Billings. The Fifth Annual Convention will be held in Anaconda the first Thursday, Friday and Saturday in June, 1908.

TWO IN ONE

A COMBINATION OF

"The Question Settled" and "The Contrast" Into one Volume.

BY MOSES HULL.

This highly instructive and interesting work is a combination into one volume of two of Mr. Hull's splendid works. By this arrangement the cost is such that the reader is enabled to secure the two books combined at the same price as was formerly asked for them separately. This volume contains 462 pages and is handsomely bound in cloth, and contains an excellent portrait of the author.

THE QUESTION SETTLED

is a careful comparison of Biblical and Modern Spiritualism. No book of the century has made so many converts to Modern Spiritualism as this. The author's aim, faithfully to compare the Bible with modern phenomena and philosophy, has been accomplished. The adaptation of Spiritualism to the wants of humanity; its moral tendency; the Bible Doctrine of angel ministry; the spiritual nature of man, and the objections offered to Spiritualism, are all considered in the light of the Bible, nature, history, reason and common sense, and expressed clearly and forcibly.

THE CONTRAST

consists of a critical comparison of Evangelicalism and Spiritualism. It is a most able production, and is a perfect storehouse of facts for those who wish to defend Spiritualism, or find arguments against the assumptions of Orthodoxy.

HO! FOR ELGIN!

Sunday, June 23, there will be held at Elgin, Ill., a Union Meeting and Basket Picnic of Spiritualists, and the principal object of this notice is to the effect that by clubbing together in clubs of 6 and buying 6 ride commutation tickets (round trip rides), they can be had for $5 each, making the fare but 85 cents for the round trip, with a few cents over for the "bunch," instead of paying $1 for the round trip. This is worth remembering. Tickets can be had at the 5th Avenue terminus of the Aurora & Elgin electric line.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

This department is under the management of

HUDSON TUTTLE.

Address him at Berlin Heights, Ohio.

NOTE—The Questions and Answers have called forth such a host of respondents, that to give all equal hearing compels the answers to be made in the most condensed form, and often clearness is perhaps sacrificed to this forced brevity. Proofs have to be omitted, and the style becomes thereby assertive, which of all things is to be deprecated. Correspondents often weary with waiting for the appearance of their questions and write letters of inquiry. The supply of matter is always several weeks ahead of space given, and hence there is unavoidable delay. Every one has to wait his time and place, and all are treated with equal favor.

NOTICE.—No attention will be given anonymous letters. Full name and address must be given, or the letters will not be read. If the request be made the name will not be published. The correspondence of this department has become excessively large, especially letters of inquiry requesting private answers, and while I freely give whatever information I am able, the ordinary courtesy of correspondents is expected.

HUDSON TUTTLE.

Phillip Brown.—Q. So much has been said lately about the experiments of Dr. Macdougall, whereby he claims to weigh the soul or spirit as it departs from the body at death, I ask for further information.

A. Dr. Macdougall of Haverhill, Mass., has sprung into sudden notoriety by taking the reporters into his confidence, like many another aspirant itching for fame. He prepared a bed in a hospital, on a delicately adjusted weighing apparatus, and when a patient was approaching death, he had him removed to this bed. Then he stationed himself at the indicator and found that immediately after death the body lost about an ounce in weight. He concludes that this is caused by the departure of the spirit, which therefore weighs an ounce.

If notoriety was what he wanted, he has it to his heart's content. A poppy's bloom is as lasting, for after the shouting he will sink into obscurity with the host of those who have rushed before the public with crude conclusions from illy observed facts.

Scarcely a newspaper or magazine that has not mentioned these remarkable experiments, either with ridicule or as worthy of scientific notice. Even more attention has been given them than was called forth by the claims of another doctor who, with special apparatus, was able to observe the life or spirit of a rat leave its body as a shadow.

Hudor Genone, a writer for the Truthseeker, seems to be highly displeased at the breach of trust made by Dr. Macdougall, for they were working along the same lines together, and had promised each other to keep the matter from the public until both were ready. The Doctor, like General Custer, wanted credit for the whole affair, rushed ahead and gave the reporters an interview, which Custer was unable to do.

Mr. Genone confesses that he had not the nerve, or facilities, to weigh dying human beings who were helpless in a hospital. He confined his observations to animals, and found that they all lost weight at the moment of death! He made an attempt to weigh a dying elephant, but its owner would not allow him to do so. He wanted to confirm preceding experiments which seemed to show that the loss was in proportion to size. He had found that a horse lost more than a rat, and he was anxious to know if the rule would hold good with an elephant, which, if weighing ten tons, should lose nine pounds! If a man's spirit weighs an ounce, an elephant's would weigh that much more. For he logically concludes that the loss in dying animals proves that they also have spirits.

Perhaps the most curious portion of of Mr. Genone's argument is his calculation of the amount of matter departing spirits would remove, and that such a constant elimination would result in physical disturbances, as earthquakes, volcanic eruptions, etc. From the beginning of human beings on the earth, he says: "Up to January 7, 1907, at 12 midnight, there had been abstracted from the earth's mass 6,564,956,872,017 tons" for the creation of these spirits!

If, however, the theory includes animals as well as man, then the sum becomes equivalent to 78,675,000 square miles of earth's surface reaching down as a wedge to its center. Yet he assures us that the material is by no means exhausted, and will last for 90,000,000 years!

Mr. Genone does not indulge in round numbers. His calculations are accurate to the hour and decimal—very good if he had any reliable data from which to calcualte. Unfortunately this he has not. He starts from erroneous conclusions and his apparently ingenious calculations have no more value than figures made at random.

The spirit body, formed of substance, as distinct from matter, is not subject to the laws of gravitation, and hence has no weight. The immortality of man cannot be proven by the steelyards. If this were possible, philosophy taught by spirits since the advent of modern Spiritualism would have to be fundamentally revised.

Mr. Genone should have pity for the ambitious doctor, instead of envy, for the whole business shows the pitiable results when material scientists attempt spiritual investigation.

If there is loss at death, it must be explained on material grounds, for it is purely physical.

Geo. A. Williams.—Q. Where can I obtain a list of names of those who have died intestate, and whose money is now in chancery in England?

A. Perhaps no delusion was ever fostered more profitable to a set of shysters and sharks than that there are fabulous fortunes awaiting claimant heirs in England. The lists furnished by the rascals are made for their own use and have no reliability. Every dollar that has been given them by their dupes, and the sum has been millions, might as well have been thrown into the sea, for any benefit received by the givers. The whole scheme has been repeatedly exposed as a fraud.

Even admitting that such money was held, the long removed heirs would find in the conservative and jealous courts of England one of the most difficult undertakings to prove their heirship.

Jas. Mettler.—Q. What is the name of the specimen I send you? How formed?

A. It is a form of calcite occurring as a pseudomorph of feldspar. The perfect crystalline form, with crystalline transparency, is characteristic of pseudomorphs, which usually—not always—have a waxy, non-transparent texture. Calcite is carbonate of lime, and occurring, as it is said to do in this instance, has no signification as to the presence of the precious metals, although it may accompany them.

How any crystal found in the rocks was formed, requires, for explanation, almost the entire history of the evolution of the globe. The melted mass of rock, injected into a crevice or pushed between strata subject to enormous pressure, may have remained at high heat for ages and thus the forces of crystallization allowed to bring the particles into form. Man cannot imitate, because he cannot command the titanic forces of heat and pressure, nor the vast periods of time. With Nature a day and a thousand years are the same.

C. C.—Q. What is meant by "astral colors" in one's horoscope?

A. Of the phraseology of astrology I confess to not having a very clear understanding, and of the theosophical ideas of the "astral body" I am equally at loss. I have never met a clearly expressed definition, but, as I understand, I can see no difference between the astral and spiritual body. Some writers seem to hold to a difference between a spirit recently departed from its body and one long time removed. The first retains more or less material of its earthly form, as an "astral shell," and by this means is brought in closer relations to earthly things. And others hold that when spiritual beings claim to communicate it is only these "astral shells," which have retained for a time their individuality. These are opinions, and opinions only.

Clairvoyants always perceive colors of the aura or atmosphere surrounding persons and spirits, and these vary from pure white to black. The colors depend on the mind, for every thought is correlated with a color vibration. The lower depths are represented by darkness, murkiness and opacity; the higher by opalescence, clearness and brightness. A spirit of the higher order is clothed as with light, and brilliancy. The passions are red; the pure and unselfish are surrounded by a halo of azure pearl. So through infinite blending and shading. Every spirit carries the unmistakable badge of its position, attainments and character, and to spiritual sight there can be no deception or misrepresentation.

RESOLUTIONS.

Adopted by the New York State Association of Spiritualists, Rochester, N. Y., June 8, 1907.

To the Officers and Delegates of the New York State Association of Spiritualists in Convention Assembled:

We, your Committee on Resolutions, beg leave to report as follows:

Resolved, That we extend our cordial and fraternal greetings to the various Associations of the State and to the large body of Spiritualists who are not identified with our State Association, and many of them not connected with any Spiritualist organizations. We congratulate them upon the rapid extension of liberal thought in our day, and the many hopeful signs of the speedy adoption of the Spiritual Philosophy on the part of the general public.

We extend our kindest sympathy and good will to our beloved Vice-President of this Association, Sister Carrie E. S. Twing, in the indisposition which has prevented her from attending all the sessions of this convention, and hope she may be restored speedily and fully to wonted health and usefulness.

As the alphabet is to the English language, mediumship is to Spiritualism. Without mediumship for a base we could not build the temple of Spiritualism. Therefore, with full recognition of its importance, be it

Resolved, That it is our duty to provide and foster the conditions necessary to the proper unfoldment of this gift; to become the supporters and counselors of mediums chosen by the spirit world to bring to humanity the knowledge, aid, and guidance of their arisen friends and guides; and in every way possible to strengthen the cause of Spiritualism through mediumship.

In view of the wide-spread devastation of crime and disaster, of ill-born children who grow into deplorable manhood and womanhood, all due largely to intemperance, no thoughtful, conscientious person can ignore duty in the field of temperance reform; therefore be it

Resolved, That we as a representative body of Spiritualists, will seek not only to know our duty, but to fulfill it. By united effort and personal endeavor we can, in union with other organizations and masses of individuals, do much to stem the tide of intemperance with its train of results, by promoting the principles inherent in temperance of all kinds.

We extend to the trustees of the Plymouth Spiritual Church our heartiest congratulations on the magnificent and valuable property now in their possession, and on the courage and liberality displayed by them in providing for Spiritualism so fine and imposing a structure in its historic birthplace. We believe that Spiritualists the world over should respond to the appeal made in behalf of the Purchase Fund of this church, and we commend it in particular to the generous liberality of the Associations and individual members in this State.

Resolved, That we recommend our local Association to ask from the public press the same measure of liberality in announcing the services of Spiritualism and in reporting the same in their columns which is accorded to orthodox churches

We sympathize deeply with the Lake Pleasant Camp Meeting Association in its great loss which came to them in the recent destruction by fire of so many beautiful cottages and buildings upon their grounds, and hope that the generous liberality of Spiritualists in New England will soon enable them to restore their camp to its wonted capacity and usefulness.

We rejoice to know that Spiritualism is to be represented so fittingly and ably at the Hague Peace Conference by Cora L. V. Richmond, whom we bid a hearty God-speed on her noble mission—who will doubtless voice in that august assembly the teachings of the spiritual philosophy and of the spirit world in favor of universal peace.

We place on record our deep sense of loss in the removal from our midst during the past year, of the gifted and eloquent Sarah A. Byrnes, of Dorchester, Mass.; of that scholarly and powerful advocate of our philosophy, Moses Hull, whose works remain as a lasting benediction to Spiritualism and the world; of that wonderful psychic and devoted advocate of Spiritualism, Mrs. Jennie B. Hagan Brown; and of that noble philanthropist and loyal and devoted friend of mediumship and our cause, Theodore J. Mayer, whose munificent generosity to education and philanthropy have placed his name among the benefactors of the world.

We affirm our conviction that it should be considered the duty as well as the privilege of all Spiritualists who are not so situated that they can become active members of a local association, to become identified in some practical way with our cause, either in joining the State Association or becoming non-resident members of some Spiritual Association at a distance. We recommend the practice of the First Spiritual Church of Rochester, in having a non-resident membership roll, and hope that all the Spiritualists of this State will soon become members of some Spiritual organization.

Recognizing the fact that woman's influence is needed on all lines, and in all affairs of life, governmental, educational, social, and in the home, be it

Resolved, That this Convention endorses the movement seeking to place woman on the same plane with her brother man, equal in rights of all kinds including that great weapon of power, the ballot.

Rejoicing over the enactment of law in favor of the abolishment of child labor as heretofore permitted and cruelly practiced:

Resolved, That it is the duty of every citizen to see to the enforcement of the successful legislation, and to work for further conquests in the line of consideration, relief and protection of the future men and women of our country.

We believe the Morris Pratt Institute is deserving of and should receive the moral and financial support of all Spiritualists in America, and we commend it to the liberality of men of wealth and of Spiritualists generally.

We believe every Spiritualist Association should wherever practicable organize a Children's Progressive Lyceum and faithfully instruct the children in the truths of our philosophy, that in this way we may hope to save the youth of our people from the pernicious effects of the old theology and inspire in them a noble devotion to our cause.

We recognize the value of, and most heartily endorse the missionary work of this Association under the efficient labors of our State Missionary, Mrs. Tillie U. Reynolds, and believe the work should be continued and extended as rapidly as the resources of this Association will permit.

We extend our grateful thanks to the Pastor and Trustees of this church for the use of this edifice and for expenditures incurred in connection therewith, thus relieving us from the cost of rental; to the choir of Plymouth Church for the charming and harmonious music discoursed at the public meetings; to the press of Rochester for their full and fair reports of the sessions of this Convention; to the Managers of the Osborn House for many courtesies received by Trustees and Committees in the use of their house as Convention Headquarters; and to the citizens of Rochester who, in such large numbers, by their presence and patronage, have cheered and supported us in the work.

Press Points About Women.

Rev. Anna H. Shaw, noted woman lecturer and president of the National Woman Suffrage Association, is building a handsome home for herself at Moylan, Pa.

St. Louis boasts of a girl blacksmith, Minnie Hagmann, aged 16, who shoes horses as quickly and neatly as as does her experienced blacksmith father.

The Finnish Legislature, which will be composed hereafter of one house only, will convene on May 22. Of the 199 members 19 are women.

J. Y. Callahan, candidate for Railroad Commissioner in Oklahoma, said the other day in an address before the Democratic Nominating Convention of the First Congressional District, "We have given the right of suffrage to the illiterate, the bum and the hobo, and I think it is time to give it to our cultvated, ntelligent women. The women of Oklahoma helped to build this commonwealth and they ought to have the right to vote."

Mrs. Laura Howie, secretary of the State Library Board in Helena, Mont., is experiencing the practical disadvantages of being without the ballot. The Attorney General has given as his opinion that she is not legally qualified to hold a State office because she is not a voter. Mrs. Howie has been secretary of the board for years and has given satisfaction. Now she and all the other women serving on State Boards find their positions endangered. A test case will be made and taken to the Supreme Court as soon as possible.

FATE MASTERED

And Destiny Fulfilled. By W. J. Colville.

The Fulfillment of Prophecy.

In a seance of the Circle of Light in February, after the Sanskrit Tablet had been received and translated, the Swami Vivegananda, a spirit guide of one of the mediums speaking relative thereto, said that greater things would be seen in the way of spirit manifestations than had yet been observed in this city, a prophecy which has most emphatically been fulfilled.

Kindly reprint the following enclosure from the Eagle, of Wichita, Kan., as it is another living proof of the truth of the Spiritual Philosophy. Great and mighty truths are never without an abundance of evidence which is self-sustaining, and the central postulate of our faith is again vindicated by the experience of this young lady.

The writer called at the home of Miss Wilson and obtained in substance the details of her wonderful experience from her own lips.

Not being versed in the sacred writings of the Hindoos, she mistook the spirit of a Mahatma for God. This fact is not to be wondered at when it is known that she knew absolutely nothing of Oriental philosophy.

She expects to remain in the Orthodox church, where she will introduce and promulgate the fundamental truth on which Spiritualism is based—that THERE IS NO DEATH, and that we when given conditions, can behold and converse with the spirits of our departed friends and relatives. In this capacity she will render substantial support to our cause in a way that will be productive of the greatest good where it is the most needed.

Says She Saw God—Remarkable Experience of Eula Wilson — Dead, Yet She Lived—Preparations Were Made to Bury Her—Tells About Heaven — Her Doctor Is Puzzled Over the Case.

To die and return to life and graphically relate her experiences in another world is the interesting and almost uncanny tale told by Eula Wilson, the fifteen-year-old daughter of Bailey Wilson, 1226 Cleveland avenue.

For the past three years she has been an invalid, treated by many local doctors, with varying diagnoses. Last Friday she was given up by friends, emerged from her death-like state and for the first time in several months was able to walk and to take nourishment. It was reported she had been raised from the dead. An Eagle representative called at the residence last night and the girl made the following statement:

"I had been very sick since the middle of December. Nine different doctors treated me during that time, but none could give relief or even tell what was the matter. Last Wednesday I became much worse; my head ached and it seemed decomposition was setting in. The doctor said I could not possibly live until sundown.

"I died at 8 o'clock Wednesday night. I was thoroughly conscious of an ascending motion and was borne to heaven in a white cloud, attended by two angels and my dead brother. The Lord opened the gates. Inside was a running stream, from which the Lord bade me drink. I ate of the fruit, but there were no pits in them. All heaven was a dazzling sight. There was no earth there and the ground was of gold. The angels were all white and wore wings [probably she mistook the dress for wings] and went barefooted. No, I can't describe the Lord. He was too grand. He had the most beautiful blue eyes and the noblest expression conceivable. He had long hair, but differed from the angels in that he had no wings. I met and talked with people who had died when we lived in Missouri.

"Most of the angels are children, and there is lots of room for more."

When asked the reason she was returned to the earth, the girl replied that the Lord sent her back to save souls.

At this point Mrs. Wilson said: "Eula died at 8 p. m. Wednesday. She had been having violent convulsions all day and the doctor predicted she would not live through the night. She was actually dead. It was impossible to detect the pulse or breathing, and all death tests we knew confirmed the fact. We set about at once preparing for the funeral, as the condition of her body demanded speedy interment. To our great astonishment at 2 o'clock Thursday morning life returned, and she remained in a semi-conscious condition, dying again Friday night. Saturday about 10 a. m. she revived and called to me. I gave her a drink and she arose from the bed and walked across the room, cured of all disease."

The neighborhood is astounded at the incident. They have known the girl to have been an invalid whom they expected to die at any time for the past six months, and to see the transformation of three days and to hear her story is most miraculous to them. Her parents further vouch for the fact that she was totally blind in her left eye a week ago, but to-day her seeing is perfect.

Bailey Wilson, the girl's father, is a sidewalk finisher, and is employed in this city. The family moved to Wichita three years ago from Butler, Mo. They are members of the Christian church and are well spoken of by their neighbors. Previous to her illness the girl was a pupil at the Kellogg school. Tonight she will relate her experiences at the Nazarene Mission on Murdock avenue.

Saturday she visited the graveyard on College Hill and decorated the grave of her brother, who, she claims, was with her during her ascension to heaven.

Dr. A. O. Burton, who treated the young girl, stated to the Eagle last night that the case was the most unusual he ever had occasion to attend during his practice.

"It beat my time. I never saw anything like it in my practice," he declared. "I do not understand how she revived Saturday, as when I saw her Friday she appeared to be near death. In fact her friends had begged me to give her opiates so that she might die while asleep and out of pain. Her eyesight was affected and, in fact, I have been told by reliable authority that she was almost totally blind in one eye. She is now able to see clearly with either eye. Another thing I do not fully comprehend is the great rally of her nervous system. She still has a little fever, or did the last time I visited her."

A MEDIUM RESPONDS.

Georgia Gladys Cooley Gives Tangible Proof of Gratitude to the Illinois State Association.

Dr. T. Wilkins, Secretary of the Illinois State Spiritualists' Association:

Having just read your words of ringing praise and appreciation regarding the good work done at Springfield by President Warne and his associate, Dr. Burgess, in behalf of the mediums, I take this opportunity of saying it was a noble effort put forth in the right direction, and we owe the State Association and these noble workers a lasting debt of gratitude.

Inclosed please find five dollars as a little mark of appreciation on my part.

I believe it was Pericles who said: "We are lovers of the beautiful, yet simple in our tastes, and we cultivate the mind without loss of manliness. Wealth we employ, not for talk and ostentation, but when there is real use for it. We regard a man who takes no interest in public affairs not as a harmless, but as a useless character."

I hope we will find no useless characters in our ranks, especially among our workers, and that all will do what they can to assist in this matter. The fight is not ended, although one battle is won, for no doubt some day our gallant fighters will have more work to do for us, in the city of Chicago and elsewhere, as there will be city ordinances to be defeated, etc.

Another ban has been put upon our mediums in the courts at Indianapolis, Ind., in its decision of the Albertsmeyer will case.

While the court declared that "It is right for the wife to consult her husband's wishes and that it is a well-known fact that many of the brightest and clearest intellects have sincerely believed in Spiritualism and other vagaries, and that it cannot be said as a matter of law that such belief is evidence of unsoundness of mind," it declared "when such pretended counsel comes through the delusive channel of a medium as an oracle from one possessing knowledge of the hereafter, under the solemn surroundings of the seance, its influence on a credulous mind can hardly be measured. The indulgence of such belief and practices may be so long continued, and of such a character as to affect the mental status."

It seems they are bound to class us a rather uncertain character and are determined to place mediumship on the scale of ridicule.

It behooves mediums to be careful and cautious in giving advice on such affairs, and should be an incentive toward awakening the determination of the Spiritualists to do something for the Cause while they live here instead of waiting until they have passed on. A bird in the hand is worth two in the bush," and one-half of the amount given while the donor is with us, to my mind, will prove more satisfactory than twice the amount left after death, to be wrangled over in court, as a greater part of the sum left is used for lawyer fees, court expenses, etc,

There are many Spiritualists who can aid the cause. Be up and do it now, Brothers and Sisters, and the joy you receive therefrom will be lasting. The National Association, Morris Pratt Institute, Temple and Mediums' funds all need your help and you will become a benefactor to the grandest cause our earth has ever known.

The world is looking for a new religion and such could be created from the beautiful teachings embraced in our philosophy, if we as Spiritualists could work together as one harmonious band. Then could we say with Emerson:

"The new church will be founded on moral science. Poets, artists, musicians, philosophers, will be its prophet teachers. The noblest literature of the world will be its bible. Love and labor its holy sacraments. Truth its supreme being—and instead of worshiping one savior, it will gladly build an altar in the heart for everyone who has suffered for humanity.

Yours for Truth and Progress,
GEORGIA GLADYS COOLEY.

My Castles.

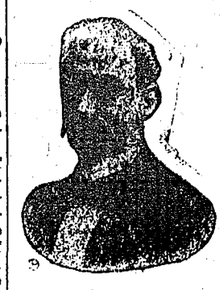
Oh! the beautiful castles I've builded,
And they reached from my heart to the sky.
Though noiseless and void of confusion,
And measured by no human eye.

From no chart or design were they builded
Ever known to humanity's art,
But the turrets and domes were unnumbered,
As they rose in the air from my heart.

I have planned them in rain and in sunshine,
At morn, and at noon, and at night;
When the daylight was lost in the darkness,
And the clock tolled the hour of midnight.

I have planned till my heart is near breaking
With pain and unrest and despair,
And my soul has grown weary with building
These beautiful castles in air.

Sometimes when I thought they were finished,
My heart would rejoice free from pain;
But the storms would sweep down on my castle
And in sorrow I'd build it again.



But sometime it will be all completed,
Each alcove, each hall and each stair;
In the beautiful realm of the spirit
I will find all my castles in air.

THE CATHOLIC INCUBUS.

The French government, not content with getting rid of the Catholic incubus, has yet distinguished itself further by appropriating nearly one million dollars for the establishment of The Institut General Psychologique. The directors have called Prof. Julian Ochorówicz, of the University of Lemburg, to take general charge of the work. Prof. Ochorowicz is known as a deep student in psychic matter, and is specially noted as an authority on hypnotism. Much is expected from this institution, as the work that it will accomplish will bear weight and authority. Perhaps the organization and support of this Institute by the French government, coupled with the work of the late Dr. Laponi, the Vatican physician, the pope is taking interest in Spiritualistic matters.

The Warfare of Science With Theology.

A History of the Warfare of Science with Theology in Christendom. By ANDREW D. WHITE, LL. D., late President and Professor of History at Cornell University. In Two Volumes. 8vo. Cloth, Five Dollars. For Sale at This Office.

In these two large volumes are combined information that the reader could not find in the libraries of the world in fifty years. It shows the constant and determined opposition of Theology to the advancement that has been made in every branch of Science. To the Student it is indispensible. Every Free Thought Speaker should have it. It should circulate in every community. It goes into minute details, citing in all cases the authority, showing the persistency of Theology in fighting new and advanced ideas in Science.

"THE WARFARE OF SCIENCE WITH THEOLOGY" is undoubtedly the most complete, careful, conscientious, able and bravely impartial history of the subject ever written. The exactness and reliability of its facts and citations are unquestioned. Its vast scholarly research is amazing. It contains just the information the student and thinker needs, and so indexed and tabulated that it is handy as a dictionary when one wishes to refer to some special point or topic.

These two large volumes, containing about 900 pages, will be sent to any address on receipt of the price, $5.00.

LIFE BEYOND DEATH

Being a Review of

The World's Beliefs on the Subject, a Consideration of Present Conditions of Thought and Feeling,

Leading to the Question as to Whether It Can Be Demonstrated as a Fact.—To Which Is Added an Appendix Containing Some Hints as to Personal Experiences and Opinions.

BY MINOT J. SAVAGE, D. D.

8vo. Cloth, 342 Pages.

After a review of the beliefs held in the past concerning life beyond death, Dr. Savage takes up the present conditions of belief and considers the agnostic reaction from the extreme "otherworldliness" which it replaced, which was in turn followed by the Spiritualistic reaction against agnosticism. He points out the doubts concerning the doctrine of immortality held by the churches and the weakness of the traditional creeds and the loosening of their hold upon the people. He then considers the probabilities of a future life, probabilities which, as he admits, fall short of demonstration. The volume includes a consideration of the work of the Society for Psychical Research and also an appendix giving some of the author's own personal experiences in this line. Dr. Savage holds, as a provisional hypothesis, that continued existence is demonstrated, and that there have been at least some well authenticated communications from persons in the other life. The chief contents of the volume are as follows:

Primitive Ideas—Ethnic Beliefs—The Old Testament and Immortality—Paul's Doctrine of Death and the Other Life—Jesus and Immortality—The Other World and the Middle Ages—Protestant Belief Concerning Death and the Life Beyond—The Agnostic Reaction—The Spiritualistic Reaction—The World's Condition and Needs as to Belief in Immortality—Probabilities Which Fall Short of Demonstration—The Society for Psychical Research and the Immortal Life—Possible Condition of Another Life—Some Hints as to Personal Experiences and Opinions.

A Work of Immense Importance.

FUTURE LIFE

In the Light of Ancient Wisdom and Modern Science.

BY LOUIS ELBE.

This is the authorized translation of the famous book which has been creating so wide a stir in scientific and religious circles throughout France, under the title "La Vie Future." It will be received with equal interest here, and will arouse very general discussion, as the subject is one engaging not only scientists but laymen in ever-increasing numbers.

The fundamental question of the "Immortality of the Soul" has disturbed the great thinkers of all ages, and for the solution of this eternal enigma humanity still seeks in vain.

This volume offers for the first time a complete presentation of all the available evidence hitherto to be found only in the most scattered and inaccessible forms. With great care and exactness M. Elbe has arranged a plain statement of the discoveries, theories, and ideas of the greatest investigators together with his own illuminating views and comments, and a mass of authentic information regarding the beliefs of the primitive races.

The book is divided into two parts, the first part being devoted to the Ideas of the Survival as considered by the Primitive races, and the second to Deductions drawn from the Fundamental sciences. With Portrait of the author. Price $1.20; postage 10c.

The Ohio State Association.

The Convention at Sherwood was a Grand Success—The Sherwood Chronicle Gives a Delightful View of the Convention. Its Speeches and Deliberations.

The big convention has arrived and departed.

Commencing Thursday afternoon, when delegates began to arrive and from then on to Monday afternoon, when the last of them left, Sherwood had the honor and the pleasure, at least to those who had an opportunity of getting acquainted with any of them, of entertaining the brainiest, pleasantest and jolliest lot of folks that ever visited our town, and we have entertained conventions before.

Nor were they hard to get acquainted with. With every excuse for being big feeling or haughty, that will make many people proud, by reason of wealth to some, the high educational attainments of others, and the high positions occupied in their organization by others, there was no way of telling one from the other in their manners, they were all nice, well-bred people.

They had no hobbies; attacked no creed or philosophy; were tolerant of everything and everybody.

The awful weather seemed to make them more cheerful if anything. They laughed over missing the trains or bad connections; they laughed if things did not go to suit them in the convention; their deliberations and debates, while, at times sharp, had the spirit of good humor when it was all done. Everything looked good to them, now and hereafter, and they carried that spirit of optimism with them. It was in their lectures, in their conversation, in their deportment.

And they liked Sherwood. In fact such an optimistic crowd could be entertained any place and be satisfied, for they simply refuse to see any but the bright side, but just the same they persistently told the Sherwood people that they had never been treated more nicely and in calling our town a little city because of our pretty hall, our pavements, our handsome stores, and the way we did things, and the praise of a bunch of people like they were, coming from every city in the state, and having been entertained in every city, is something to be proud of.

They liked the places where they stopped, the reception and welcome they got; what was done to make it pleasant for them. They spoke of it on the platform that Sherwood must have a class of people, preachers and all, extremely and nobly tolerant of every other belief.

And Sherwood, and all the country around, has and will profit by their having visited us. They set us a pace in seeing the bright side of life, in being hopeful, in being tolerant of the othr fellow's opinion, and especially in showing what can be accomplished by a person in the acquisition of knowledge and culture by work and study, without at the same time throwing away any of the legitimate pleasures of life, for they all are people who thoroughly enjoy living. Nearly all of them had worked their own way by self-study and by co-operation with their fellows. Sherwood and vicinity will benefit by this and by the lectures which told of a BROAD PHILOSOPHY, OF A BROAD VIEW OF LIFE. And we profit by learning that there are nice, very nice people in the world who do not believe as we do. That there are people equally intelligent; equally honest, who have read as much sacred literature and yet who are not living in fear and trembling of some wrath to come. We profit because it all sticks to us more or less, and because we are a growing, progressive people, and good things fall on good ground.

And that was the message they brought us and they send out in the world—progress, self-culture, and brotherhood. They are more concerned with the present times, with what is going on on earth than they are with what is occurring in heaven. Individually, we make our own future; according to their theory, and we make or mar it as we work for the betterment of our fellowmen now and those to follow us, instead of by what we believe or what rites we practice. They do not believe in "tying to a stake" and refusing to try to learn further. In their ranks they number as many opinions almost as there are members and its right with them. THERE CAN BE NO HERETICS AMONG THEM, for every person is encouraged to pursue his own way of thinking and do as he pleases, so long as he obeys the law and rules of society.

They have no quarrel with the Christian, the Hottentot, the Jew or the Buddhist. They believe that communication can be had with spirits because they believe the spirit lives on after the death of the body, and say that as the spirit is spirit, whether bound in the body or free from it, they see no reason why the bound spirit and free spirit should not communicate, and that they have proof that they do. But they do not quarrel with those who do not believe it.

They say that this meeting was the most harmonious and enthusiastic they ever had and that the organization is in the best shape. They re-elected all the old officers, and arranged to put some missionaries on the road to organize new societies.

The convention was formally opened on Friday by an address of welcome by Johnson Miller instead of A. G. McCord, who was obliged to go out of town, and Johnson made a very nice talk, which was highly appreciated by the visitors, and did much to make them feel that the people of Sherwood were heartily glad to have them here. The response was made by F. D. Dunakin, president of the association, and Fred did it in his usual eloquent way. The program was carried out almost to the letter as printed in his paper a few weeks ago, and we can only say that all the speakers were simply excellent. The music was furnished by a quartett composed of Mrs. H. C. Lindersmith, Miss Belle Reyff, J. B. Overholt and C. E. Dickey, and Miss Lyel Etchie, pianist. There were also solos by Mrs. D. A. Herrick, of Akron, Ohio; Mrs. Carl A. Sollinger, of Columbus, Ohio, and Mrs. H. C. Lindersmith.

Below we append the resolutions passed:

Resolutions.

Resolutions adopted at the 10th annual convention of the Ohio Spiritualists' Association:

Whereas: We recognize that in union there is strength and that the concerted action lies the power of success; therefore be it

Resolved, We reaffirm our loyal co-operation to our national association and to all spiritual workers everywhere;

Resolved, That discrimination against American citizens because of sex is tyranny, and we extend our hearty co-operation and moral support to the men and women who labor to secure political equality;

Resolved, That we maintain our attitude of co-operation toward all reformatory movements in operation for the betterment of humanity.

Resolved, That we remember with gratitude the efforts of all of our workers, both local and at large, we tenderly remember those who during the year, have passed on to the higher activities, among them, Carrie Firth Curran, of Toledo, Ohio, our former state president; Moses Hull, better known as "Our Moses;" Jennie Hagan Brown, Theodore J. Mayer and others:

Resolved that our heartfelt gratitude is herewith extended to the citizens of Sherwood, O., for the use of this hall for the deliberations of our 10th annual convention and also for the kind and bountiful entertainment they have provided for us; to the Sherwood quartette for their sweet songs; to Mr. Johnson Miller for flags and bunting with which to decorate this hall; to Mr. Carl E. Dickey for space in the columns of the Sherwood Chronicle to report the proceedings of this convention; to both of these gentleman for their valued assistance generally;

Resolved, That due consideration be given to the resolution offered by our state treasurer, in his report as follows: "That the president appoint a committee of no less than five to draft a form of resolutions embodying a declaration of principles of the Ohio State Spiritualists' Association."

A resolution offered by Mrs L. A. Wilson, but which, by previous vote of this convention, had been covered, need not be repeated.

O. B. CLARK, Chairman,
ELIZABETH SCHAUSS,
Secretary of Com.,
HATTIE G. WEBSTER.

The Meeting as Viewed by the Secretary.

The 10th Annual Convention of the Ohio Spiritualists' Association convened at 10:30 a. m., at the Opera House, Sherwood, Ohio. All officers present except 2nd. vice-president., Thomas D. Bellis.

The people are hospitable. Not being Spiritualists they turned the town over to our people. The mayor and council called off a Base Ball Game which was to be played on Sunday, May 26th, out of respect to the convention. The best of harmony prevailed throughout and a great deal of good was accomplished.

At the evening services, standing room was at a premium. Sunday evening we had a severe thunder storm with terrible rain, but the place could not half hold the people desiring admission. Another good feature, the first Basket Collection taken, found only 3 pennies—the smallest amount of pennies I have ever counted at a Spiritualists' meeting.

I can only account for this because the people were not Spiritualists, they enjoyed first class lecturers. The speakers, Miss H. E. Boerstler, D. A. Herrick, Miss Elizabeth Harlow, Wm. V. Nicum and C. A. Sollinger, gave entire satisfaction and kept their audience spell-bound. This was especially noticed Saturday night, Miss Harlow, and Sunday night, Mr. Nicum.

We would challenge the world for anyone to deliver a more scientific or philosophical lecture. Miss Harlow's subject, "The foundation of Spiritualism, What Is It?" was handled in a way to force admiration from all.

Brother Nicum's subject, 'Progress Is An Eternal Law," was handled by the speaker with such force its effect will be felt for some time to come.

Mrs. H. G. Webster gave several inspirational poems.

Between the reporting of different committees, the time was filled in with short talks by D. A. Herrick, H. E. Boerstler, Sam. Mahaffy, F. D. Dunakin, Mrs. E. Schauss and Mrs. L. A. Wilson.

Mrs. S. Herrick and Mrs. C. A. Sollinger with the Sherwood Quartette furnished the vocal music.

The Mayor of Sherwood sent Mr. Johnson Miller to bid the O. S. A. welcome. He called the Spiritualism the great Van Guard of civilization.

The president responded. The Convention unanimously extended a vote of thanks to The Progressive Thinker, The Sunflower, also the Sherwood Chronicle and all others who assisted in making this the most harmonious Convention ever held. Financially it turned out better than we expected, and spiritually, a great deal of good has been accomplished.

This Convention indorsed the ordination of D. A. Herrick of Akron, W. V. Nicum of Dayton, and Mrs. E. G. Reed of Toledo. Mrs. S. Harris of Columbus was ordained to the ministry of Spiritualism; one licentiate, B. F. Wallingford of Kenton, O., Eighteen auxiliaries sent delegates. All officers were re-elected except second vice-president, Mrs. L. A. Wilson of Martin's Ferry being the new incumbent.

Mr. H. E. Boerstler of Columbus, was elected delegate to the National Convention: F. D. Dunakin alternate. Brother F. D. Dunakin was appointed State Missionary.

Columbus was selected for the next convention meeting.

Secretary's Report.

To the Officers and Members of the Ohio State Association in Convention assembled:

Another milestone passed in the path of life, another year with its pain and pleasures, hopes and ambitions, struggles and victories never to return. We are commencing another year in hope its ending can only be forecast by a higher power than mankind.

For us in the long and hard struggle for the emancipation of truths we have the world ahead of us. Our defeated efforts are a thing of the past; our ambitions unsatisfied are a thing of yesterday which can never come again. Worry cannot bring it back, nor can its work be undone. It is gone beyond the call of man for all time to come. Our plans can be made, and by careful forethought can be made a success.

As an organization we have had some success, but more would have come had unitedly done his part. Ceaseless effort is the price of success. Strict adherence to the principles of Spiritualism will make success a fact.

Now if the members of the auxiliary societies of the Ohio State Association feel that simple affiliation with our organization is all that is necessary for success, if they feel that their membership is all that is required of them and that the Ohio State Association will run itself without their assistance, far better would it have been for them if they had never organized, as they would save themselves the disappointment which is inevitable with that kind of societies.

For those societies which have fallen by the wayside, we have positive sympathy in severing their relations with the Ohio State Association. They have hurt themselves. If their paths are lined with rocks, they must be overcome sooner or later. Their withdrawal is by no means final, and we expect for all and many more to come into the fold. We are only the pioneers who are blazing the way for those who are to follow, and that our work is just begun, is patent.

The thoughtless, purposeless and ignorant who think only of themselves with never a thought for their fellow-creatures or their future, will in time find the truth in our glorious Cause. If our association is conducted correctly its history shows irrefutable evidence that the benefits which accrue are so vast that even the most careless and thoughtless must realize the salutary effect it is having on their very existence.

To our present and prospective members we urge that the coming year shall be made the banner one in our history. I can see a great leap forward in intelligence. The respect we have forced for Spiritualism from the general public and the secular press is very satisfactory. We can make the coming year the banner one easily, and thereby enjoy the benefits which must of necessity accrue. Say but two words: "Be Spiritualists."

To the officers of the Ohio State Association I extend sympathy. At times a man feels like giving up the struggle, but cowards only let that feeling gain the mastery. If you have and petty spite against anyone, or if you feel a rankling for some fancied slight, or if your ambition was thwarted by another, forget it; consider yourself a guide the members look to for inspiration and advice. You can make or mar success by your action.

Teach others to be Spiritualists by being one yourself, and you will have done your duty. We want bigger hearts, bigger and broader minds, and a truer conception of our duty toward one another. The ethics of our movement, we regret to say, are very often overlooked. Teach higher principles. We are under a moral obligation to secure for ourselves and posterity the greatest of blessings and happiness that it is possible to obtain in this world.

We should be kinder and more tolerant of one another; to agree and disagree, and to recognize and support even those whom we consider our enemies in the views they may present for the advancement of our cause, when we can clearly see merit in them—in place of that blind selfish spirit that knocks just for the sake of knocking, and for fear the other fellow will reap some advantage or glory. If we must be up and doing, we must get rid of our personal prejudices and keep down that ever overabundance of selfishness with which we are all more or less endowed.

Now, my personal work for the year has been strenuous but pleasant to me. Having no corresponding secretary appointed to assist me, I have my daughters help. I have tried to comply with all the wishes of the convention. I have kept in touch with all auxiliary societies, also the N. S. A., with the spiritual papers.

I have held regular services at the First Spiritualists' Temple in Cleveland every Sunday during the month of July and August, and assisted in memorial and anniversary services. I attended board meetings and mass meetings.

During the last year the Ohio State Association has chartered two new societies; one at Columbus and the other at Chillicothe; the latter by Mrs. E. Schauss. One more application for charter from Loraine by Mrs. E. Schauss received. The society from Clyde, Ohio, returned its charter.

No ordinations for the ministry of Spiritualism were granted up to date, there being one application before the Board.

The courtesies extended to the secretary by individuals and societies in general have been helpful and well appreciated.

In conclusion your secretary wishes to express his sincere thanks to all the secretaries of the auxiliaries, to the officers of the Ohio State Association, and every other individual member who aided and co-operated with him in the discharge of his duties.

Up to date, 12 Societies have sent in their per capita tax, also one Ladies' Aid. $156.90 have been received at this office. C. A. SOLLINGER, Secretary Ohio State Spiritualists' Association.

DECLARATION OF PRINCIPLES.

Of the Ohio State Spiritualists' Association.

We affirm the existence of a Supreme Intelligence or Soul Force in the Universe.

We affirm that this Soul Force is omnipresent and the source of all life visible and invisible.

We affirm that the incarnation of this Soul Force incites the truest love and service to humanity.

We affirm the moral responsibility of the individual that no one can escape the just penalty of wrong doing, and that in the development of the spiritual nature lies the only hope for the upliftment of the human race.

We believe that progression is the law of life, and the door to reformation is never closed.

We affirm that continuity of life is a fact; also the continued identity of the individual after the change called death.

We affirm that the phenomena of the Bible and Modern Spiritualism are produced by the operation of natural law, and that the exchange of intelligent thought between the excarnate spirits and people in earth life, is scientifically proven.

To the Editor:—A few words from our Spiritual Science Society may interest you.

We are not flourishing as well as our beautiful religion should We have set-backs frequently. Grafting mediums, traveling fakirs, etc., are a greater detriment to our cause than any outside element that we have to contend with.

We celebrated the 59th anniversary with appropriate songs and exercises. The writer spoke to them upon "What Has Modern Spiritualism Done In 59 Years?"

Miss Hooganboozum and Mr. Will Curtis gave some fine instrumental music.

At a conference in the afternoon, Mr. Davis, Mrs. Cox, Mrs. Ankerson, Mrs. Brown, Mrs. Shere, and Mr. Hooganboozum, all told why they were Spiritualists.

The writer spoke at some length on the "Beauties of Our Philosophy, Science and Religion," emphasizing the great good that spirit communion brings to the pople.

We had a quiet little wedding in our own society, both parties being members: Prof. H. O. Crocker, the healer, and Mrs. Anna Koontz, were married by the writer, May 15. It was a somewhat romantic affair, with a wedding to close the tale. Some eight years ago the writer healed the bride, and from a pale, sickly woman she was slowly transformed into one beautiful and healthy, whose sweet disposition attracts friends to her wherever she goes, and through the writer's persuasive powers the groom, Prof. Crocker was put to his work of healing, and I have no hesitancy in saying that he has very few equals as a healer. They were received into our society by the writer, and married by her. May they live long to enjoy the beauties of a truly spiritual home.

We wait every week for The Progressive Thinker, because from it we receive spiritual inspiration and instruction. We enjoy the poems and lectures especially.

DESIRES AND DUTIES.

I would come in rapport with friends afar,
I would talk with them wherever they are;
I would traverse the continents o'er and o'er,
And various far-famed regions explore.

I would travel with speed like the lightning's flash,
I would hear the response as the waves that dash—
The waves, which are never restrained in force,
Nor turned aside from their regular course.

O, the bliss that comes in the chariot of love,
As a messenger that came from realms above,
United our souls may be on this earth;
Surely this may be deemed a glad new birth.

Quietly to sit in our own pleasant homes,
Accepting the spirit whenever it comes,
We may learn what may never be found in books,
But is sometimes conveyed in Nature's nooks!

Nor is this all we are required to do.
The wealth of experience we may woo;
To give it forth is a duty made plain—
Naught for self alone can a soul retain!

UNIVERSAL SPIRITUALISM

Spirit Communion in All Ages, Among All People—by W. J. Colville.

This work has two distinctive features: (1st) A resume of the Spiritual faith and practice of Egypt, India, Persia, Greece, Rome, China, Japan, and other ancient nations, not excepting Europe during Christian centuries. (2) A summary of recent experiences in America, Great Britain, Australia, France, Germany, Italy, and other modern lands, all tending to show the persistent continuity of spiritual revelation. Clairvoyance, Telepathy, and Psychic Phenomena in general is dealt with in separate chapters at the end of the volume, making it a highly useful textbook for all who are interested in the great question of human immortality. The Author says: "The libraries contain a large number of extremely valuable works dealing with every imaginable phase of Spiritualism and occultism, but I have searched in vain for a single portable volume, issued at a popular price, which gives a brief and lucid statement of the claims made in all ages and in all countries on behalf of the mighty truth of communion between inhabitants of earth and dwellers disrobed of flesh in the one vast spiritual universe. The enormous and ever increasing interest in "Psychic" problems and the eager, constant demand for historic information coupled with a rational setting forth of intelligible spiritual philosophy, has led me to appear once again before the public with a book." Price $1.00.

OUR CHILDREN.

Hints From Practical Experience for Parents and Teachers.—By Paul Carus.

In this little book "Our Children," Paul Carus offers a unique contribution to pedagogical literature. Without any theoretical pretensions it is a strong defense for the rights of the child, dealing with the responsibilities of parenthood, and with the first inculcation of fundamental ethics in the child mind and the true principles of correction and guidance. Each detail is forcefully illustrated by informal incidents from the author's experience with his own children, and his suggestions will prove of the greatest possible value to young mothers and kindergartners. Hints as to the first acquaintance with all branches of knowledge are touched upon—mathematics, natural sciences, foreign languages, etc.—and practical wisdom in regard to the treatment of money, hygiene and similar problems. 207 Pages. Price, cloth, $1.00.

Discovery of a Lost Trail

BY CHARLES B. NEWCOMB,

Author of "All's Right with the World." Cloth 208 pages. Mr. Newcomb made a distinct success with "All's Right with the World," which continues in the front rank of the Metaphysical books that are now so popular. The great number who have been cheered and strengthened by him will welcome another book by the wise teacher whose words of help are doing so much to make the world better by making men and women better able to understand and enjoy it.

"Discovery of a Lost Trail"

is a simple study of that strange and beautiful thing called life, but grand in its scholarly simplicity. It will be in demand by many who have not previously read metaphysical writings. Price $1.50. For sale at this office.

The Progressive Thinker.

SPIRITUALISM—Progress, the Universal Law of Nature; Thought, the Solvent of Her Problems.—SPIRITUALISM

VOL. 36 CHICAGO, ILL., JUNE 29, 1907 NO. 918

THE IMP OF DARKNESS.

"God Bless the Theological Devil," Says J. C. Dryer.

He is our best friend. We owe him many thanks. Through his agency we had the rap that opened to the world the truth. That rap gave us the first message from our spirit friends—the rap that conquered death.

The theological devil holds the balance of power in this world. He is a better friend to mankind than all the religions combined. The churches hate him. He has removed the clouds of ignorance and brought joy to the world. He has eliminated superstition, and eradicated the teachings of a place of eternal torment.

He is not roaming the world seeking whom he may devour, but whom he may save. He takes issue with the ministering spirits for our good. He has proved to us that our spirit friends often visit us, and join in our sorrows and pleasures, and through this evidence the churches are tottering on their foundations, their ministers are trembling in the pulpits, and there is war among the congregations which, instead of seeing an army of devils, behold an army of white-robed angels marching toward them.

Through his discovery the world is becoming more spiritualized; the human family is turning toward his benevolent teaching, and there learn the true philosophy of life. The devil's rap became the herald of glad tidings that the dead are alive, the lost found, and the Star of Knowledge will henceforth beam with no uncertain light.

His Satanic Majesty is being sought by scientific men and professors in colleges. He is attracting the attention of the highest intellects of the present day. He is gaining followers by his noble work, and is destined to become the god of the universe in the understanding of human life. He has incited an interest in all the channels of knowledge since the advent of man upon this planet. Spiritualists can congratulate themselves that they have no fear of him, if they cultivate peace — not war — within themselves.

This devil is following the footsteps of Jesus of Nazareth and curing all manner of disease by the laying on of hands and hypnotic power, that has baffled the most eminent physicians of the world, they having restored to a healthy condition the minds of many that became insane over the false teachings of the church. Professors of every branch of disease have sprung up to relieve the sufferers of pain by magnetic treatment.

There can be no greater crime than the so-called revival meetings, where many become hopeless lunatics.

Such horrible teaching as the following lines display is enough to drive anyone insane.

"Hell is crammed with infants damned,
Without a day of grace."

"There is a never-ending hell,
And never-dying pains,
Where children must with devils dwell,
In darkness, fire and chains."

With the Spiritualists the Devil of Darkness is changed into an Angel of Light—a light that illuminates the soul through a labyrinth of false teachings.

If the Spiritualists' Devil had his ruling of the world it would be changed from a liquor-and-lust element into one of lasting peace and love. Then we would walk and talk with those that have passed out of the material body.

Cincinnati, O. J. C. DRYER.

Satan.

Methinks I hear an angel's voice
Come whispering thro' the air;
It bids me write and then rejoice,
And to the world declare,
And if we wish to do our best
To Christianize the world,
We might commence on Satan first,
Who once from heaven was hurled.

If he was once an angel bright,
And God so loved him then,
It does not seem to be just right
To banish him like men,
And keep him out so long a time
To wander through the earth,
And charge him up with every crime
From eternity to birth.

And while we're at it let us pray
To God for his reprieve,
And show him our good will to-day,
That he no longer grieve.
God might relent and think a while,
Then send an order straight
To Peter, with a pleasant smile,
To unlock the golden gate.

Then order him a golden crown,
And "kill the fatted calf,"
Then all good spirits of renown
Could dance and sing and laugh;
For one poor sinner thus redeemed
Should cause us to rejoice,
And honor him as one esteemed—
He'd hardly know our voice.

Then when we meet him over there
He'll greet us with a smile,
And his best parlor we may share
And stay with him a while.
Perhaps he'll have some holy wine
And let us drink our fill,
And call us all his "Brother Mine,"
Which will be better still.

I don't think he is half so bad
As some professors claim;
He was never known to "sass" his dad,
Nor call him a bad name.
He needs our pity very much,
For see what he's went through;
The Russians cuss him, and the Dutch
Have cussed him till he's blue.

There would be more happiness in the world if we would rejoice more with others instead of feigning sympathy with their sorrows.—Max Bewer.

Spiritualism and Religion.

"Well, Scarcely Anybody Claims That Spiritualism is THE True Religion"—So says Light, of London, Eng., a Leading Spiritualist Paper.

Light, of London, Eng., says: "Nobody — well, scarcely anybody — claims that Spiritualism is THE 'true religion.' That would be absurdly narrow, and far too bigoted for any enlightened Spiritualist. Spiritualism may be one form of religion, one mode of its expression, one field of its unfolding. That is the utmost we can claim for it, so far as religion is concerned."

The Progressive Thinker lately published an address given by a Dr. C. W. Hidden, of Newburyport, on 'The True Religion: Is it Spiritualism?' That, by the way, is a misleading subject.

Nobody—well, scarcely anybody—claims that Spiritualism is THE 'true religion.' That would be absurdly narrow, and far too bigoted for any enlightened Spiritualist. Spiritualism may be one form of religion, one mode of expression, one field of its unfolding. That is the utmost we can claim for it, so far as religion is concerned.

This Dr. Hidden was for many years identified with Spiritualism, but is now a lay-evangelist in the Congregational Church, but he seems to be a remarkably just and fair-minded man. The lecture before us was given in a Boston (U. S.) Baptist Church. Spiritualism he defined as 'a religio-philosophical movement resting upon the central claim of proven immortality,' and this claim he indorses as valid, though he seems to have been excluded from the Spiritualist camp by contact with fraud and the misuse of Spiritualism for commercial ends. 'Darkness,' he says, 'is the bane of Spiritualism; it is the open doorway through which knavery has crept. The dark circle for pay represents in large measure cold-blooded, unblushing, open-handed deception; while professional full-form materialization is the most contemptible fraud ever perpetrated at the expense of a sorrowing heart.' To say the least of it, that is surely far too sweeping a statement.

Dr. Hidden thinks he sees the break-up of organized Spiritualism. 'The one-time desire to build up a Spiritualist Church is not regarded as a wise step to take by the bright minds of Spiritualism.' 'They say that Spiritualism has accomplished its mission in toning down harsh theology, making creeds elastic, re-awakening in the churches a recognition of the spirit; that there is now no good reason for another church organization. The division of Spiritualists into classes, and the growing disinclination to form a new church, is producing an unlooked-for yet natural result, viz.: Disintegration has begun, and close observers predict that modern Spiritualism will soon go to pieces.'

He speculates as to what will happen when this occurs. He thinks it is a mistake to conclude that Spiritualists will go to the liberal churches. Not many of them came from those churches, he says. The majority of them went out from the evangelical churches, and as these churches ,in his opinion, have more spiritual vitality than 'the liberal churches,' he thinks that the break-up will find many Spiritualists going back to the old home, and he says:—

"It is our opinion that if we meet them fairly and treat them kindly we shall be able to win over the bulk of the followers of Spiritualism's Upper World to the evangelical churches of this land. A little unbending here; the exercise of charity, of a prayerful and forgiving spirit, and the church will be quickened and strengthened.

"God's holy cause will glow triumphant; there will follow a spiritual awakening that will thrill the world with the power of Him who glorified Calvary."

We do not know how this is or might be in America, but we can speak for England, and we venture to say that the main body of Spiritualists show not the slightest signs of breaking up; and that if any breaking up occurred, the evangelical churches would profit very little by it. Spiritualism in this country is as much intellectual as emotional, probably more so, and as much rationalistic as Spiritualistic, and again probably more so. The organizations throughout the country are held together by very few and apparently very slender ties, but this is possibly an advantage, as it allows plenty of opportunity for adjustments, and gives the sense of freedom which intelligent Spiritualism so greatly needs.

But whatever Dr. Hidden may think about Spiritualist drawbacks and Spiritualist chances of life, he is deeply convinced of the reality of its testimony, and he bears manly witness to the virtues and abilities of the 'Upper World' Spiritualists. As to the reality of our testimony, he says:—

"While Spiritualism holds much that bears no special relation to the spirit, there yet remain substantial phenomena that transcend normal experiences as at present understood. This of itself does not constitute a religion, or furnish a substantial basis for one. On the contrary, it indicates the wisdom of rescuing the genuine phenomena from those who make them serve commercial ends, and giving them into the hands of men skilled in psychic lore, that we may know just what Spiritualism is and just what it stands for."

That might have been said by one who was still a good Spiritualist: for does not every good Spiritualist most earnestly desire to rescue the genuine phenomena from wrong hands, and so deal with them that we may know just what Spiritualism stands for?

Dr. Hidden knows that this is so, and he seriously warns the opposition to be careful—ministers in particular. 'The greatest mistake a minister can make,' he says, 'is preaching a sermon against Spiritualism without a full knowledge of the subject.' Why? Because Spiritualism is based upon facts, and the preachers against it will be discredited when people find that out: and they ARE finding it out. Besides, Spiritualism, in so far as it is based upon facts, is the very best corroboration the Bible can have. In fact, it is its only corroboration. Dr. Hidden sees this and gives his new evangelical friends some good advice. He says:—

"With reference to ancient happenings it may be said that Spiritualists, as a rule, do not deny that the Bible miracles may be true. They think that the prophets of old, by living close to Nature and to Nature's God, attained unto such a knowledge and mastery of natural law that they were able to accomplish the seemingly impossible by purely natural means. The modern psychic, by complying with natural conditions, is able to make use of the art employed by ancients, and this is the secret behind the Spiritualistic marvels. Spiritualistic phenomena, they hold, duplicate Bible phenomena, and by proving the latter to be true, they say they have revitalized the Bible and won for it an ever-increasing respect among critical thinkers both in and out of the church."

We are not sure whether our advocacy has won 'ever-increasing respect' for the Bible in the church, but we are very confident that our advocacy has made the Bible credible in some respects to critical thinkers out of it. One of the reasons why multitudes are losing respect for the Bible is the attempt that its adorers are always making to keep it and all that relates to it outside of the ordinary history and life of the world. If we put it into the common stock to take its chance with other portions of the world's literature new interest in it would be excited and the science of Comparative Religion would help us to understand it and to correlate even its wonders with other marvelous legends or happenings possibly to their elucidation and possibly, also, to an increase of faith in occult things that take us, for their credentials, behind the veil.

Dr. Hidden has a generous word for the main body of Spiritualists. He says, 'They may be found in every calling, every profession. In the business world, in art, science, literature, they rank with their fellows.' 'Spiritualism,' he says, 'is undergoing a process of sifting and separation':—

"Its followers are dividing into two classes, best described as Spiritualism's Upper and Under Worlds.

"Spiritualism's Under World is composed of the professional tricksters and their followers, i. e., the phenomena inebriates, the curious and the careless, who find delight and satiety among the wizards that peep and that mutter in manner like unto the sorceress in the long ago.

"In Spiritualism's Upper World they exalt the philosophy, and in phenomena give the mental or higher preference over the physical or lower grades. Their leaders are trained in manners, morals and books. Their lives are clean and wholesome. They believe in all that makes manhood great and womanhood noble. They recognize a supreme ruler of the universe; regard the Bible as the world's greatest spiritual text-book; point to Jesus, not as peculiarly divine, but as the peerless exemplar of the ages:"

We have called this 'generous,' but no thanks are needed for the simple telling of the truth. What makes the truth noticeable and refreshing is that it stands in such contrast to the too frequent outpouring of undiscriminating lies.—Light, London, England.

Men are often capable of greater things than they perform. They are sent into the world with bills of credit, and seldom draw to their full extent. —Horace Walpole.

The practice of self-restraint and renunciation is not happiness, though it may be something much better.—T. H. Huxley.

A good Christian should never go to law; rather should he give up his coat and his pants, and everything that he hath. Churchmen never go to law; they are the most docile and easy creatures in the world on matters of business.—Voltaire.

TRENCHANT THOUGHTS.

Influence of the Invisible—Supreme Need of Man's Life.

Of all foolish conceptions [as set forth in the Chicago Tribune] that is the most stupid that associates breadth and freedom with a life of sensual delight. Some men refuse to become Christians lest they no longer be free to enjoy whatsoever good appeals to the appetite and passion. Well, if a sensualist claims the freedom to eat blubber, I claim freedom not to eat it. Many an epicurean and a pleasure monger calls himself free to choose, not knowing that he is in a rut up to his stomach and that his pathway is as narrow as a wagon track.

Our world holds only one universal man—the man who has found liberty by obeying laws. Every new law man learns, and lifts as a yoke to his shoulder, is a wing that lifts him into liberty. The promise is that all things shall be placed under man's feet; that everything in fire and water and air shall serve him, and everything shall when man finds out its law and obeys it.

Just now we are hearing much about the return to nature. For some reason there is a revival of interest in Rousseau and his communistic ideas. Reporters through the public press, and his students in the class-room, not to mention his public writings, represent one of the men in Columbia as teaching socialistic basis of property, marriage as a contract that should terminate with love, even if children are in the home as hostages.

Cannot Return to Nature.

The sum of the professor's teaching is that Christianity pours the soul into certain molds, cramps the faculties; that there should be a return to nature, with spontaneous and free living. But what is nature? The man who gave us the Concord grape took it out of the forest, put it in a vineyard, cramped it by a garden wall, and gave juicy clusters to the world.

This man wants us to go back to sour grapes and bitter acid. Return to nature! From a seedless orange back to an orb of gall and bitterness; from golden wheat return to wild rice. From a steel plow back to a forked stick; from a house back to a hut and a cave; from the American family back to the herd.

Under the sublime impulse toward progress everything begins to climb. The crust of the earth ascends into flowers; rude animal men become intelligent and spiritual. The stars become pilots to guide man in his upward march. Nature is not a scrub oak; nature is a forest grown oak, covering half an acre. Nature is not the poor, starved, malformed Shetland pony; it is the Kentucky horse, brought by care and cultivation to the utmost excellence. Nature is not the average man, nor the half-witted: nature is the human intellect at its best, in Bacon; the imagination at its best in some Wordsworth or Tennyson; eloquence at its best in some Webster or John Bright; patriotism at its supreme point in some Phocion or Lincoln.

Science of Man Building.

The natural man is the extraordinary man. Not what man is in this poor, unfriendly world, but man as he shall be when unfolded and God and time and events in another life shall have wrought their full ministry upon this bundle of roots named the human soul. Not a return to nature and the savage from which our fathers climbed, but the watchword should be forward, toward intelligence, genius, beauty, health, happiness, and universal culture and character. For that reason Christianity is the science of man building. It is the art of right living. It teaches the youth how to make the most possible of himself. It shows us how to subordinate things that are low to faculties that are high. How to lend symmetry and harmony to the whole man.

Man needs many things. Man needs better tools, better medicine, better laws, but his supreme need is of moral life. The greatest influence that man knows is the influence of the invisible on the hidden springs of being. Great is the power of the invisible. The mightiest forces that touch our earth come silently and secretly over the battlements of heaven.

Loss of a Great Orchard.

A few weeks ago out near Grand Junction, Colo., I saw an orchard that had sold for a thousand dollars an acre. The man who bought it had fled from the great city to escape his appetites. Now, in the fervid days of August when the sun is pouring forth his heat to ripen the fruit, the trees and the roots must be watered as soon as the sun sets. Then when the tree has transformed the liquor into sap for the leaves, the sun rises and turns the water into the spiced juices for the fruit.

But one August night this husbandman deserted his orchard, and with riotous companions passed his days in drunkenness and his nights in stupor. The days came and went again. The fierce sun shone on, and still the nights passed. The earth was doing its part, the sun was doing his, the tree was working against heavy odds; the mountains yonder, snowclad, were sending down their life-giving streams from a heart of crystal, but the man would not bring life to the dying roots and boughs. Ten days passed. But when the prodigal returned it was too late.

Patient with your trees, you do not expect them to blossom one day and offer you ripe fruit the next. Be patient with yourself as you are with a plum and peach.

Show Creation of Beauty.

The soldier who wins his cross from the Legion of Honor buys it by heroism and bravery in the face of fiery perils. And you must buy the honor of that immortal company of martyrs and heroes into whose presence death will introduce you. See to it that when you come in you are not unknown, obscure, or looked upon as a guerilla. Be a leader of some heroic band, and fight even for a lost cause. If troubles break you down for a time, even as some storm beats the bulrush into the ground, lift up your head again when the sun shines out and take up your task anew. It is a great moment for society. Every man is being counted. Be sure that you are on the right side. —WELL DWIGHT HILLIS.

SUGGESTIVE THERAPEUTICS.

The Wonderful Potency of Suggestion in Curing Disease and Correcting Bad Habits.

That psychological treatment by suggestive therapeutics successfully cures many ailments that have failed to respond to other methods of healing is now a well recognized fact, and that, too, by the most ethical and conservative members of the medical profession. The study of psychological therapeutics is the most profound science to which the human mind has been called; it is founded upon a thorough knowledge of physiological and psychological facts—not untenable theories—and in its practical application patients who are suffering from genuine diseases and bad habits can be successfully restored to perfect health; this, too, after all other means of cure have failed, even to give relief. In the treatment of diseases by suggestion there is positively no guesswork, no religion, mysticism, spooks, ghosts or hob-goblins, but the whole treatment is founded upon strictly scientific principles. Physicians have for years studied the physiology and anatomy of the brain, but have failed to study its functions and the natural force of recuperation and resistance against disease which is inherent in every man. To-day, however, all this is changed and we find the science and practice of psychological therapeutics endorsed by such eminent men and scientists as Daniel Hark Tuke, of England; Albert Moll, of Germany; Liebenault, Luys, Bernheim, Ribot, and Dubois, of France; and in America by Osgood Mason, Robert Sheerin, J. Duncan Quackenbos, the late Thomson Jay Hudson, and by hundreds of other thinking men of this country and of Europe. Among the many ailments that have been and are daily being cured by suggestion, we will mention only a few: Chronic constipation, dyspepsia, rheumatism, insomnia, asthma, paralysis, aphonia, hysteria, nervous prostration, bad habits in young and old, liquor, morphine, cocaine, tobacco habits—in fact, nearly all nervous diseases and functional disorders can be successfully treated.

Prof. Alexander Wilder, A. M., M. D., in an issue of the American Medical Journal says of suggestion: "It goes farther than the healing of the diseases. Like the first ministry of the Christian religion, it pertains to the moral life itself. "We should never forget," says Wood, "to send pure thoughts to the lustful, a powerful thought to the revengeful, a thought of strength and self-respect to the slave of appetites, and each thought will return to us sooner or later with ten-fold its former burden." It is a matter beyond the stage of argument; it has already occupied the field of actual demonstration; it is based upon a sound philosophy; it is all the more real that it pertains to the psychological domain—'For soul is form and doth the body make.'"

Herbert A. Parkyn, M. D., A. M., editor of the magazine "Suggestion," in an editorial of his magazine, February, 1902, calls particular attention to the general misunderstanding of the terms used by qualified practitioners of suggestion—"Doctor of Psychology," or Doctor of Suggestive therapeutics." He says that very few people understand the methods of such practitioners, while nearly everyone is acquainted, to a greater or less extent, with the means employed by those practicing osteopathy, magnetic healing, and Christian Science. Few persons are aware that physical and mental ailments can be successfully treated by those practicing under the title of "Doctor of Psychology," or "Doctor of Suggestive Therapeutics," and only a limited number of patients can be made to recognize the wonderful value of this system of healing and to take a treatment from one who practices psychological treatment only." "The fault does not lie in the system of practice, for it is a demonstrable success when intelligently given, and is slowly but surely gaining recognition for itself on the strength of the success it is meeting with in relieving mental and physical troubles. Suggestive therapeutics is not materialistic enough to suit the masses who have not realized yet that the mind exerts great control over the functions of the organs of the body, and that it should be given an opportunity to aid in restoring health to the sick. On the other hand, there is too much science and common sense, and too little religion in the practice of suggestive therapeutics to appeal to that class of persons who flock to be treated by such absurd and unscientific methods as Christian Science. Within a very few years the intelligent practitioners of suggestive therapeutics will be held in high esteem; for the time is surely coming when the masses will be aroused to the fact that suggestion is the chief agent by which nearly all cures are made by all the different schools as methods of treatment in vogue at the present time. It is the one agent employed by every practitioner of the healing art, be he regular, homeopath, osteopath, or Christian Scientist. From the moment a practitioner of any method of treatment begins to employ suggestion intelligently and designedly, his percentage of successes increases. He may have made many cures without a knowledge of suggestion, but an analysis of the results he has obtained will demonstrate that the majority of the cures can be traced directly to the use of suggestion, although he may not have realized the fact at the time the cures were made. But when he begins to employ his suggestions intelligently, not only can he duplicate any of his previous cures, but he can increase the number of his successes by relieving many ailments on which his previous methods failed."

In this brief article the writer has merely endeavored to call the attention of the readers to the value of thoroughly understanding the science and practice of suggestive therapeutics. "Only fools scoff at something with which they are not familiar; the wise ever seek more wisdom."

TRENCHANT THOUGHTS.

As They Come From the Pen of J. L. Foster.

Let truth come from any quarter, and the truth-seeker will readily accept it, whether it comes from Catholicism, infidelity or atheism. Truth is all that will stand the test. It is as a house built upon a solid foundation.

We have heard much about the weight of the soul, but we cannot trust to any scientist for such information. We must know and think for ourselves. Others have given us messages and descriptions of those who have passed on to a more refined life. This has caused us to rejoice and be exceedingly glad; but when we can see and describe for ourselves, then nothing can turn us from the fact till our reason has been dethroned.

I am a Spiritualist, and I want all who may read this to know that I am not like the man whose son was asked if he were a Christian. His son said: "Y-e-ss; but I don't work much at the trade."

I want all my energies and powers to be vested in this great and noble cause.

Bro. Spinney expressed himself just to my liking in last week's paper. The idea is to help others, instead of others helping us. Now, while I am doing all in my power at the present time for the good of the cause and for the sake of humanity, I am striving with all the energy within me to earn a competency, that I may in the near future be able to go out and visit all the bowed-down and broken-hearted, and that I may be able, if possible, to banish some of the clouds of ignorance and superstition (the curse of the universe), and I feel that in a short time, in some way or manner, that such conditions will be brought about.

I have had glimpses of the unseen on several occasions, but last evening, when my wife and I were in a stranger's house on business, I became so so sleepy and drowsy that I could scarcely hold my eyes open. I saw a daughter of the lady, who had passed out when about twenty years old. I gave the description of eyes and hair, and what disease had called her hence, and I am sure I could pick out her photo from a hundred.

I feel that this is a reward that I have for being an earnest searcher after truth.

Through me it was made possible for people in this community to listen to two of the best lectures ever delivered in this city, by that gifted inspirational speaker, Sister Sarah A. Crossfield, of Muncie, Ind., who is well known in many States. She is a lady whose character is without reproach, and the cause is perfectly safe in her hands. She held her audiences spellbound from first to last.

There is a fine field for work here. I will try to get as many as possible here to subscribe for our Bible, The Progressive Thinker. There are many who go to camps, seances, etc., who are almost entirely ignorant of the philosophy of Spiritualism. Some are so filled with old theology, and claiming to be Spiritualists, that when they pass to the higher life they will be looking for God and the throne. The two things that do not exist, and oh! what will be their disappointment. It is the philosophy that furnishes food for our minds every moment.

The Quartet of Heaven.

Apart from earth and mortal form
My soul was wafted far away,
Upon the buoyant fairy wings
Of music's soft immortal lay,
Beyond the soul-encumb'ring sphere
Of sorrow, pain and mortal woe,
Into the joyous realm of light,
Where heaven's choicest flowers grow.

Bedecked with garlands purest white,
Beneath the vault of azure blue,
Were happy children caroling
The beauties of all nature true;
While from the flower-strewn bowers near,
And mingling with the joyous throng,
Came one grand chorus in accord,
From bright-hued birds of sweetest song.

Sweet music, children, birds and flowers
My heavenly quartet e'er shall be;
Enshrined within my heart for time,
To guide me through eternity.
I know that when my spirit's free,
And music calls me from afar,
My soul shall pass the flower-strewn way,
To where sweet birds and children are.

PREDICTED BY HINDOO SAGE.

Pundit Ram N. Yogshastri Says Five Nations Will Engage in Battle and Includes Japan and America.

London, June 15.—Pundit Ram Narain Yogshastri of Cawnpore, says a cable dispatch to the Inter Ocean, has issued a forecast of events for the next twelve months, drawn up, he states, in accordance with the rules of astrology and the science of Yogi.

The Pundit predicts, among other things, that "Honorable Mr. Campbel Bannerman will be pleased to submit his resignation," and will be "succeeded by an equally good and popular successor.

Lord Curzon, we are assured, will rise in position this year and the next; he will reap the benefit of his harvest of good deeds.

A six-year war, says the Pundit, will begin in Europe, in which France, Germany, Turkey, the United States, and Japan will take part, and England will suffer a heavy pecuniary loss.

The names of the "leading men of eminence" who are to "leave this unstable world during the current year" are not given;; and there is a disquieting vagueness in the prophecy that "some planets will leave their places and fall to the ground; consequential results likely to be famine, pestilence, epidemic diseases, and so on."

When any one of the prouder passions are hurt, it is much better philosophy to let a man slip into a good temper than to attack him in a bad one.—Thomas Paine, in Crisis.

Let none of you treat his brother in a way he himself would dislike to be treated.—Mahammedan.

IMPORTANT QUESTION.

What Is the Matter With Us?

Christ said that those who believed in him should be able to do the things that he did, and greater things.

Then what is the matter with us, that there cannot one of us—no, not one—do anything worth while to manifest the power of the spirit world over this material existence of ours?

We are tired; dreadfully tired, of theorizing. If we can not put these theories into practice, then of what avail are they?

The God that ruled in Moses' time is just the same to-day. Then the trouble must be traced directly to ourselves. And what is the matter with us? Evidently God or the spirit world cannot handle us because we are too tangled up with the affairs of this world.

Then again, we must be out of touch with God because of our unrighteousness in living.

Christ said; "Ye cannot serve two masters," and the majority of us are trying to do this very thing, seeking everything in a worldly way, and get disappointed because we cannot come so closely in touch with the spirit world as to receive special gifts from on high.

The Christian Scientists claim that sin, sickness, poverty and death should be unknown, yet the Christian Scientist has never demonstrated power to subdue these evils.

The so-called "Latter Day Saints" claim the power of divine healing through the elders of their church, and yet I have known members of that cult, and devoted members, to be ailing all their lives, enfeebled in body, and wearing glasses all the best years of their lives that they might be able to see clearly.

Dowie claimed also to heal the sick, yet he, his wife, son and daughter all wore glasses. He commanded others to lay aside their crutches and walk, yet his whole family was helpless without crutches for their eyes.

I heard "David," the Hindoo preacher speaking in "Willard Hall," some years ago, declare that no Christian who was right with God should suffer any physical affliction, and yet while speaking he took off his nose glasses, wiped off the lens with his silk pocket-handkerchief, and replaced the glasses over his nose.

"Consistency thou art a jewel," Charles Broadway Rouss, a multimillionaire of New York, offered a cool million a few years ago to anyone who could restore his eyesight, for he was totally blind. He even employed a substitute, who was also blind, for manipulation, and yet Charles Broadway Rouss passed away a few years ago, and was still totally blind, and his substitute did not regain his sight.

Some claim the world would not accept a miracle if it was wrought.

This is not true. The world was never, perhaps, so alert and so closely awaiting and watching the manifestation of Supreme power in the lives of men as now.

We are tired of life's miseries, so tired of its tragedies and sufferings, that we even drift into the way of evil doing because the evil-doer seems to flourish.

We lose faith—that's all, and it's a terrible thing to lose faith, faith in ourselves, faith in our fellowmen, but most of all, faith in God, the Supreme Intelligences.

And so we need, yes, absolutely need, some one to come so close in touch with God that through such an one the blind can be made to see, the deaf to hear, and the lame to walk, and even the dead raised from the tomb.

And the world will not be slow to recognize such a one, and new life and hope will spring up in the hearts of men, and they will turn their faces toward the unseen realms whence this great power comes, and all the world will be made better because of its recognition of the power of God and his ministering spirits toward mankind.

We need a new revelation. Who will bring it to us?

Taxation of Church Property.

To the Editor:—Harrison D. Barrett, the able, indefatigable and beloved president of the N. S. A., evidently believes that justice should rule the world, hence, in a recent letter to The Progressive Thinker, he declares there is no ranker injustice than that of unequal taxation, and especially that of exempting from taxation ecclesiastical properties.

He also bravely protests against such exemption, as not only being unjust, but unconstitutional.

For this protest, I, as a citizen and non-church-goer, am glad, knowing that if such protest could win glory in France, the same efficiency in the same direction could also win glory in America.

It is not the living, however, who are to blame for this injustice; it is the fault of the dead, who, in their ancient, child-like simplicity, and in their zeal for the church, made it unwarranted concessions, which concessions, being without solicitude for prosperity, were infamous and criminal.

But now, in this twentieth century, let us, a more enlightened humanity, try to undo these absurd concessions, and leave to posterity what our predecessors failed to leave us—a heritage of equal taxation.

President Barrett will in all probability, be the chosen leader in this new political campaign, and if he is he will have the financial and moral support of all the Spiritualist public and non-churchgoers, in our beloved America; and when the fight for right comes up in Congress, Altruists, as in France, will be there, and will, too, as in France, give the friends of progress happy surprises.

An Interesting Book.

"Broken Beams From the Summerland," by Many Authors—Published by Hon. A. Gaston, of Meadville, Pa., in Devoted Memory of Her who for Forty Years was his Companion, Counselor and Friend—A Book Beaming with Refined Spirituality.

We Come Not From Ethereal Homes.

We come not from ethereal homes
Which fancy shapeless rears;
But from the near unfading domes
In wisdom's shining spheres.

We come not from the silent mound
Beneath the marble urn;
But with immortal being crowned,
From realms of light return.

We come not at the trumpet note,
Nor deep-toned organ's high refrain,
But near the loving soul we float
Drawn by attraction's golden chain.

We come not 'neath the stately spire,
Where earth taught clergy con the page
O'er which they labor to confer
New life to truths grown dull with age.

But inspiration's child we seek
And whisper truths unknown before,
And kindle up the glowing cheek
With sparks from wisdom's untaught lore.

—Imogene Gaston.

There is a deep, unfathomable fountain of inspiration within every soul, whose pure and effulgent waters attract and reflect the divine rays of Truth and Wisdom and will, ultimately, flood the spirit in a halo of holy light.—Imogene.

Love and good will toward all men sweeten every bitter drop in the cup of human life. Cheerfulness promotes health, spiritually and physically. Smiles are the sunlight of Heaven. Heaven is not a place but a condition. It may be here as well as elsewhere. If not within your own souls it is not anywhere.

Query: Do not the surroundings have an influence upon the spirit?

Answer: In some degree, but the soul (or spirit) is the centre of all conditions, just as each sun forms the centre of its own solar system and gives light and coloring to the planets that revolve around it.—Imogene.

"Charity suffereth long and is kind." By this is meant that broad, universal Love which looks with pitying eye o'er all the unhappy passions of inharmonious man. Remembering then how much suffering must be borne before the wrong is overcome, strive to subdue all rebellious feelings.—I. G.

We are here, happy, joyful to greet you home again, yet do not forget to pity each sorrow and strive to soothe each separate sadness. There is a balm for all human weakness. The world is bright and beautiful. Jewels of love and kindness are scattered all around you. If you will open your spirits to the benign influence, all may be well with each and all of you.—I. G.

On the happy festal days when you meet in the social circle to enjoy the dear intercourse of kindred, remember there is another invisible circle hovering around rejoicing in your every joy, and sorrowing over every cloud that darken your spiritual horizon. That band is composed of the dear departed ones. A father, a mother, a daughter and sister would unite on this holy day and greet you with a renewal of love, thus drawing you nearer the realm of spirit, where we may all be united—an unbroken family in the beautiful home above.—Imogene.

There is no period of time when the spirit of man is so inaccessible to spiritual influx, as during the first bitterness of grief at the loss (by death) of a dearly loved friend. The spirit seems to sink, stultified for a season, within a gloomy void, where its own divine character in sacred, silent communion with the indwelling God of the universe, is forced to seek consolation from its own interior Being. It finally emerges from the darkness of sorrow, purified and resigned; thus fully prepared to receive intelligence from the higher world.

Thus, my friends, would I bring you joyful tidings in the morning which succeeds the night of darkness, from the dear spirit so recently released from the shores of Time. She is as happy a new-born spirit as ever I knew. Many of her little foibles sprang from a weak physical condition from which she is now entirely released. She has no regrets for her departure. Simply says had she been warned of the change that occurred, she would have visited you all. You will soon hear from her personally, good night.—Imogene.

My dear friends, the pleasure of the spirit are subtle and fill the entire being. In man's transitory life, easily thrown off the balance, a false word, thought, or idea, often mars the spirit's harmony. I would fain give you a precious pearl from the store-house of wisdom; but I can only point them out. It is for you to sow and garner and reap the reward of your own labor and diligence.

Do not get discouraged and faint by the wayside. The journey of life is often toilsome, but it is only through mortal life that the crown of immortality is attained—that boon to which all nature is aspiring. There is a rich reward for the lowliest laborer and the most ignorant, if honest in the bright scenes of immortal life. I speak of what I know by actual experience. "Straight is the gate and narrow the way, that leads to eternal life" and all mankind must walk therein.

Live more for the spiritual and less for the external and future generations will reward you.—Imogene.

Believe on! we will help you in every season of trial. We strive to strengthen the bonds of fraternal affection, that, united you may assist and save each other. Not from universal ruin, but simply from many of the little, petty ills that destroy so much of human happiness.

Heaven is not a haven of rest. Neither is it a place fitted up for pure spirits. It is simply a condition of harmonious love; of perfect trust in the Supreme Power that governs the universe; and a well grounded Principle that is entirely impervious to every artifice with which temptation may seek to stain the spotless robe of the spirit. This condition may be attained as well on earth as in spirit life. Strive for it, it is more precious than are earthly treasures. Yours in love.—Imogene.

The shifting scenes of time and circumstances bring me here again, to speak in behalf of your whilom little daughter now grown to full and complete stature—a tall, fair maiden with yellow curly hair, that winter winds or summer sun has never deepened to a darker shade. She sees many other bright-eyed maidens around you and is attracted here much by their songs and merry laughter and wishes very much to be one among you. At least she wants to be remembered. May her memory be a living, unfailing source of peace and joy to your trusting, believing souls; and make you tender and kind to the young and undeveloped around you. She retains only the color of the eyes; the fair, unsullied complexion and tint of hair. All else is changed. You would scarcely know her, unless aided by spiritual perception, which will certainly be yours, when released from the physical.—Imogene.

The happy meeting of friends long separated is a pure and fitting emblem of that higher and holier reunion of kindred spirits in the eternal home. Knowledge is the key that unlocks the human soul and fills it with the genial light of a warm and living faith. Then know that I, Ephraim H. Gaston, still live and enjoy a real individualized existence, entirely distinct from all earthly form. I can, and do visit and love you; still join in the family gathering with even more than my former interest; although unseen and unheard by your outward senses, yet my presence is tangible and felt by you all—Ephraim H. Gaston.

Dear Brother, I am anxious to impart some thoughts to you and through your means, to the rest of the dear loved ones on earth. I feel and appreciate your great desire to hear from me, and will respond as far as lies in my power, but I find this is more dificult than I anticipated. There are few mediums pure and unselfish enough to be reliable messengers for intercommunion; but thanks to the kind Father of Light, there are a few noble ones, and is not their work a glorious one?

Do you desire to know how I feel and am employed? I am much happier and better satisfied than when I lived on earth. I felt a void for some time because I missed my home society; but now I am employed in improving. I feel serene in the knowledge that we shall all be united soon, if we keep our affections warm and bright. Love is the only bond between spirit and spirit. All others are mortal and perish with the body; this alone is deathless.

I realized the whole process of dying as I had ever desired to do. It was without spiritual suffering, and the old body was so worn out by previous pain, that it gave way without a struggle.

When I found myself actually free and looking down silently upon my now deserted body, and saw my dear friends sorrowing so tenderly around it, oh, how I longed to speak to them, that they might know I was still near! But while I had reached the much-desired haven of repose, I found I could no longer speak to, or even be seen by, those dearest to me. It seemed so strangely unnatural to be so close to them and yet be wholly powerless and unable to communicate with them. There, before me, lay the silent form through which I had so lately spoken and acted considering it a part of myself almost. For a moment I felt a strong desire to return to it, with all its pains, for the sake of speaking to those I loved.

"This is the bitterness of death; Take me away, I cannot bear the scene!' I cried. In a moment the familiar room with its loved occupants had vanished, and for the first time, I realized the presence of spiritual beings like myself. One near me I knew immediately to be Aunt Lucinda by her resemblance to mother. I felt comforted by her presence, she seemed so good and loving. Then Grandmother Gaston met me with a smile of welcome that I seemed a child again, so fresh did the memory of my early days come back to me in her dear face.

Many others also came to welcome me. Among them our spirit sister, Imogene.

At last a bright, intelligent spirit, whom I felt at once to be a superior being, came forward and said: "Is there no one else you desire to see?" Then I thought of Alma, and there she stood sure enough, looking so natural, her head leaning on her little hand and a shy smile on her face. She was looking at me from the corner of her eyes, just as she used to do. She is a beautiful child and I could but wish that I had such a one to meet me here.

It was a number of days, nearly a week before I was permitted, or even desired to visit the scenes of my home life, the parting had indeed been so painful. I felt I had passed the boundary where I could no longer associate with them; and the thought of seeing them in sorrow, without the power of speaking, was dreadful. I derived much comfort and strength when I first visited Arthur and was able to draw nearer to him than to the others. Not that I loved him more, but the view he took of my death coincided with mine and there is spiritual harmony between us. Then, too, he felt my death to be good, rather than evil. My spirit derived strength from him and I felt comforted and happy within his influence.

When at last I visited my dear wife and mother—those two so closely united to my affections—I felt a real glow of tender emotion. When I saw their spirits clothed in the shining light of resignation, and yet their love as pure and deep as before, I felt a glow of love and joy in their presence which I cannot describe. Gustie, not even death can separate us, so long as you remain true to my love and memory. I am with you much and derive much comfort guarding your footsteps. I know of your sorrow and loneliness, and sympathize earnestly with you, but brighter days will dawn for you even while on earth. Will you remember me in joy the same as in sorrow? Our love is now the only tie which binds us, and let us keep it pure, unsullied and enduring.

Dear father and mother, I know you will remain unchanged. Though you love your other children ever so dearly, they will not occupy my place in your affections; and I am glad it is so. Trust me, I shall not forget to give you a warm return; and when you are done with the scenes of earth, I will meet you with joy, beyond the Valley of Death.—Ephraim.

Father, Mother, Arthur, Grover and all, I am here, just across the narrow way. So near that my impalpable touch may rest upon your unconscious brows; happy in your presence, yet not without alloy, for you see me not.

I have been learning many of those coveted lessons in wisdom, which my brief, broken, earthly life denied me. The spirit here revels in an infinite variety of means of improvement,—all he or she is capable of enjoying. You must know I am delighted with such a life. It exceeds my wildest flights of fancy.

Aunt Lucinda is one of my dearest friends and teachers of the Christian virtues, of which she is a shining example. Good night.—Ephraim.

Life has been called a vapor. I would say Physical Life is indeed a dark vapor swept away, vanquished by Death, leaving the real life free and untrammelled. Death is not entirely like the unfolding of a door to an interior compartment. To me it was more like the exit from a miserable, rayless old tenement into the free pure air of a fair spring morning, yet strange to say, I longed for a time to return to it, shattered as it was, for the sake of those I loved

Time and broader Light however, have purified my earthly loves, and freed me from all the shackles of the world, where my body was born, suffered and died without my volition or consent. All that is worthy in me and in my love, lives purified—Immortalized! The rest is swept away with the vapor.

Now do you believe this is Ephraim?? If so, it is well. If not it is no matter. I have but made a beginning, yet it must be my ending for this time. Immortal love to all. —Ephraim.

I love to communicate, yet what can I say that will profit you, beyond words of love and remembrance? You know such words grow stale and pointless. I have seen Alvin, he is not yet quite reconciled to the change. He clings to earthly things, but will soon be O. K.

Arthur, I am nearer and more dependent upon you for strength and comfort than any other earthly friend. Don't become entirely absorbed in business or family affections and fail your spirit brother, thus losing your influence in the upper world. Influence is what man strives for, you know.—Ephraim.

I am here brother, still rejoicing in your joys, and sorrowing in your sorrows, unless enabled by a broader faith to see real good in seeming evil. All wrong is right, not understood. The spiritual view is not a material one. The mind when free to act untrammelled, will work itself clear of all impurities. Be not absorbed in any temporal pursuit or pleasure. Strive at all times to follow your highest conceptions of Duty and Right and you will finally rise above all the shafts of malice and the clouds of Material Sense.

Welcome, good mother. Good night.—Ephraim Gaston.

My Brothers: As one I loved you. Love and appreciate each other while you may. Counsel and strengthen one another for the conflict. Life should be something more than a mere pleasant holiday, or a feverish grasping after worldly emolument. It should be the birthplace of noble, unselfish aspirations and struggle for spiritual growth.—Ephraim.

I am glad you seek me, Brother, Arthur. It helps to make me stronger to associate with my earthly friends. I may be more advanced spiritually than you are, yet you are attaining a strength, by your physical life, that my short, blighted earth life can never hope to bring. Strength and wisdom combined form powerful concomitant levers for pushing us upward and onward. So you see I am not so much ahead as you thought. If I can give you spiritual knowledge you may give back strength of character by longer contact and battling with the forces of the physical world.—E. H. G.

The river rolls rapidly onward toward the sea and the swift current of your earthly lives will soon bring you all with me into the free, open expanse of spirit life.

I await you still. Though I do not hover around my earthly idols so much as formerly, yet I love to visit and mark the progress of my old-time companions and earthly loves, none more earnest and steadfast than those formed in boyhood days. And I love to watch you pass the milestones that bear you nearer home to Heaven and me.

I see father and mother much and often.—E. H. G.

My children, I am here. A mother's presence still! Though the form I used to wear is yours (or mine), no longer, yet I am among you. Love one another as when you were my little children playing around my knee. Live worthily. Deal justly and kindly by each and all. Be pleasant and friendly to all your neighbors. Try to be happy yourselves and you will be sure to impart happiness to others.

If I can never manifest my presence satisfactorily during your natural life, it is a consolation that I may meet you all at the dawning of spiritual life, just as I met you all at the birth of physical life, with love and tenderness. That is all.

My language was broken and imperfect. I meant that my spirit was with you often, though my body is gone—Phylinda Gaston.

Yes, I am with you all and bless you with a mother's blessing. But my words are few; my words are weak; and incredulity is strong. False sophistry weaves its web of doubt and unbelief around nearly all I would reach. What can I do but watch and wait for the uplifting of the veil, thin though it is, and breathe a silent blessing?—Phylinda Gaston.

The shady side of life is past and all is clear and plain to me now. As I was satisfied with you there so am I better satisfied now—more full of joy here with all my old-time friends. I want to give you all the evidence I am able to cheer you along for we are together—your mother and I—parents to you all.—Edmund W. Gaston.

Thelston, we come to give you a little word of greeting, your father and I. Our home is now here, and our interests in life and its changes centers here in our new and broader sphere; yet we shall never forget the little nest of boys and the one girl we left in the life behind us—left to fulfill the duties and responsibilities of their first estate, then to join us in this higher, holier life, the glory of which is beyond comparison in earthly scenes or human language. So you see that while earth is fair to you, it is dark and uncomely to us, and love alone can attract us back over the thorny surface. Yet we do visit you often, I assure you, and love and care for you still.—Phylinda and Edmund Gaston.

My Daughter, my Children: I cannot express to you how happy we are to see you all together again. It will do you all good to meet on the journey of mortal life and renew your childish affections. Be united as children even when your hair is white with age. Try to unite the simple love and faith of a child with the wisdom of riper years. Be harmonious and loving; live faithful and true, and, when you are done with time, you may meet death in peace, and be happy in the light of Eternity. —Phylinda Gaston.

We come—a shining band from the approaching borders of the spirit land.

We do not change except as all "good folks" should change—and that is from good to better. (Now your mother smiles and says, "They will think we are growing self-satisfied!")

I do feel well satisfied with this side of life. When an old man wakes and finds himself suddenly made over—young again—he has good cause for praise. Don't you think so?

Love and kind remembrance for all.—Edmund and Phylinda.

The light of a beautiful faith, founded on a knowledge of continued, unbroken life beyond the dark Valley, gilds even the most painful scenes of earth life with a golden halo of hope and praise. As the brown earth contains within its dark, clammy mold, the promise of the every varying verdure of spring, so the crude, barren spiritual seance bears the germ of humanity's highest hope made a living, certain reality; the mingling of the upper and lower life in one.

Do not be discouraged for we are with you alway, and never tire. Our presence is unseen, our joy hidden from the physical sense, yet are our spirits filled with joy and love unspeakable.

Fathers and mothers are here, sisters, brothers and children, all smiling a happy welcome on some loved, earthly face. Why do you not meet oftener? I have not much to induce me to return to your muddy sphere. It is no longer a home to me, even in name, since my worthy progenitors have passed into the skies.—Ephraim.

MRS. GEORGIA GLADYS COOLEY CLOSES LOCAL ENGAGEMENT.

A Large Audience Heard Her Splendid Lecture and Spirit Messages were Satisfactorily Received.

Mrs. Georgia Gladys Cooley on Sunday evening delivered the last lecture of her engagement with the Spiritual society of Meadville. The Odd Fellows temple was filled to overflowing, the spirit messages were satisfactorily received, and all things considered it was one of the most successful meetings the society has held during the past year.

In the lecture for the evening the speaker showed the relation that the new conceptions of Spiritualism hold to the old notions of heaven, hell and purgatory. She said, in part, that no man was so wicked that he deserved to be tormented eternally, nor no person could be so exalted as to be ready at once for a transition into a state of heavenly bliss. No true mother, however great might be her spirituality, could become reconciled to the thought of her boy being consigned to eternal suffering. A mother who would thus dare to abandon her own son in his life would at once be called inhuman. Would she be any the less inhuman to thus harden her heart toward him while she enjoyed a state of heavenly bliss?

Spiritualists think of the future state more as a condition than as a location, and recognize three different states, which in some manner correspond to the old idea of hell, purgatory and heaven.

The lowest state is the hell of conscience—a state of unhappiness and remorse for wrongdoing. The second sphere is one of congeniality, where kindred souls meet and prepare themselves for entrance in the third or wisdom sphere. Here in the highest sphere selfishness is thrown aside and others in the lower spheres are visited, instructed and raised up.

Instead of the old idea of a devil, we believe that each one has a devil and an angel within. This devil within, instead of the one outside, is the cause of evil acting, and one of the greatest of evils is intemperance. There is not only the intemperance of drinking or eating to excess, but there is an intemperate speech which manifests as gossip.

If there was a Carrie Nation to break into places of intemperate speech, there would be many of our fine homes which would be broken into. We cannot love our neighbors as ourselves and at the same time gossip about them, unless the respect we have for ourselves is very small.

Angels come to bid us be kind and charitable to one another, to live and let live, and thus learn to know the meaning of true happiness.

Mrs. Cooley leaves in October for a six-months engagement in New Zealand.—The Messenger, Meadville, Pa.

HAECKEL'S LAST WORDS ON EVOLUTION.

A popular retrospect and summary. By Ernst Haeckel, Professor at Jena University. Translated from the second edition by Joseph McCabe. With three plates and Haeckel's latest portrait. Price, cloth, $1.00 net.

CONTENTS:—Introduction. Preface. Chapter I.—The Controversy about Creation; Evolution and Dogma; Plate I; Genealogical Tree of the Vertebrates. Chapter II.—The Struggle over our Genealogical Tree; Our Ape Relatives and the Vertebrate-Stem; Plate II.; Skeletons of Five Anthropoid Apes. Chapter III.—The Controversy over the Soul; The Ideas of Immortality and God; Plate III.; Embryos of Three Mammals. Appendix.—Evolutionary Tables; Geological Ages and Periods; Man's Genealogical Tree—First Half; Man's Genealogical Tree—Second Half; Classification of the Primates; Genealogical Tree of the Primates; Explanation of Genealogical Table I. Postscript.—Evolution and Jesuitism.

Prayer; Its Uselessness and Unbiblical Assumption. By Henry M. Tabor. Price 10 cents.

Intensely Interesting.

Prof. Edgar Larkin of Lowe Observatory, Echo Mountain, Cal., Has Something Intensely Interesting to Say about "The Corpuscular Base of Nature."

For here comes Brother B. F. Loomis up out of Viola, Cal., on page one of The Progressive Thinker, No. 907, in the vain hope of overthrowing my article of March 9, '07 in The Progressive Thinker, No. 902. Speaking of planetary positions at the winter solstice at the beginning of the Christian era, he says: "I have computed the planetary positions for the date myself, the date handed down to us by the early fathers of the Church as being the real birth day of our Savior, and this is one of the leading features of my book.

I am simply amazed that Brother Loomis has computed these ancient positions of the planets. He is the only man living that could perform this impossible-to-others-feat. There are perhaps fifty men now living who know more about mathematics than the entire human race combined. They are astronomers of the highest rank, and devote their entire lives to mathematical computation. None of these is able to compute the position of the planets 1900 years ago. All such problems are based on perturbations of all the planets on each other. Thus the mean distance of the earth from the sun is 92,882,000 miles; but it is rarely if ever at that exact distance. It is "off the track" nearly all the time, and all the other planets likewise. This disturbance throughout the solar system is caused by the mutual attraction of gravitation extended by all the planets and moons. To compute the amount of these perturbations has for 300 years, been the most perplexing problem encountered. Many observations are made with instruments of ever increasing accuracy; a mass of data was accumulated and finally Euler, in 1756, made a table of perturbations. Things went on swimmingly for a time, until it was seen that the planets did not follow their prescribed paths in space.

Trouble was met with, and new and more accurate tables were made. And thus Herschel on March 13, 1781, discovered Uranus, 9144,000,000 miles beyond Saturn. Then entirely new tables were computed for the future, and everything was thought to be settled.

But Uranus did not behave very well; he became cranky, and left the computed pathway. Every astronomer a once knew that there must be still another planet beyond. Then came solution of one of the greatest of all problems, finding the direction from the earth of the unknown world, its distance from Uranus and from the sun, and the quantity of matter it contains.

LeVerrier and Adams, one in France and the other in England, began the giant work, and both solved the problem unknown to each other; but neither owned a telescope, so they wrote to one who did and told him where to look. He obeyed, and found the distant Neptune very near the computed place, on September 23, 1846.

Now, can Mr. Loomis perform a work like this? If he can he ought to leave Viola, and go to the U. S. Naval Observatory in Washington, or to the Lick Observatory.

To make a working table of perturbations is the incessant task of modern astronomers, armed with the most delicate micrometers and telescopes that human hands can make. With this equipment, they cannot compute a track which the moon will follow. Astronomers are wondering what force is making the moon deviate.

Simon Newcomb, the chief astronomer of the United States says: "Small as these deviations are, they show that something is wrong, and no one has as yet found out what it is. Worse yet, the deviation is increasing rapidly. The observers of the total eclipse in August 1905, were surprised to find that it began 20 seconds before the predicted time. The mathematical problems involved are of such complexity that it is only now and then that a mathematician turns up anywhere in the world who is both able and bold enough to attack them." (Newcomb. Side-Lights, p. 118.)

Now will Brother Loomis be good? And see this: "He computed the positions from the date handed down by the early Fathers of the Church!"

But they were a set of men sunk in superstition and dense ignorance. None knew a solitary law of nature. They thought that Greece was larger than the sun; did not know that the earth is round, nor that it turns on its axis.

These same "fathers" caused more human misery and death than any other set of men that ever lived. They distorted the true teachings of the occult Masters to suit their own supreme ignorance and bigotry. Mr. Loomis asks: "Why should not man believe in the influence of the stars and planets? Every astronomer believes in their influence, for they draw each other off their orbits continually.

I have received, perhaps as many as a hundred letters from astrologers. Some implore me to believe, and some consign me to regions below, while others seek to elevate my form to airy regions as by dynamite; but many of these letters contain small i for I, and their English is worse than mine.

How can these know anything about position of planets.

I have asked four astrologers if they had studied astronomy, and they had not. For centuries astrologers cast horoscopes with "great accuracy" before Uranus and Neptune were heard of. Nautical Almanacs, giving positions of the planets and moon are so very elaborate, costly and complex, that private astronomers who usually have trouble in getting new store suits of clothes, could not think of publishing them. So governments took the vast work in hand. France began in 1679, England in 1767; but this came to an end for lack of data. Finally, England began again in 1834. France and Germany kept up publication, and then the United States made publication in 1854. These books taxed the mathematician, armed with the calculus, to their limit. Twenty skilled mathematicians beginning now, might be able to compute positions of planets at the beginning of the Christian era, if they could find out when that occurred, in three years' work. And then they would sign their names, saying these are approximate positions. So the computer in Viola had not better begin the colossal job.

All astronomers take their positions of planets from the great government Almanacs; the last contains 595 pages of long columns of figures, but these give places for only 3 years in advance.

All astrologers who know how, also take their planetary aspect from the same Almanacs. But the poor astrologers who never heard of the book, and would not know how to take out a position from the wilderness of numbers, have a hard—no easy—time of computing "accurate horoscopes for life," and how to find gold mines and "buck the Board of Trade" up in Chicago.

And the man of Viola wants me to believe that the "earth is now in the fourth, or kamic, or desire round." But over there are books saying that it is in the fifth. But here in a little drawer alone is a book greater than all in my huge library, except one—the New Testament—and it equals that in many respects. It is one of the most wonderful books in existence, and must be studied with all the concentration of mind required by mathematical science. The name of the marvellous book is, "A Dweller on Two Planets," by Phylos, the Thibetan," through the hand of Frederick S. Oliver, as Amanuensis, a young man now on the other side. This stupendous book is on sale by the boy's mother, whose name is Mary E. Manley-Oliver, 415 North Fremont street, Los Angeles, Cal.; price $2.00, postpaid. All students of modern science, whether physical, mental, spiritual and "the occult," simply cannot be without the work. It says the earth and man is in the closing hours of the sixth age, and that the seventh is beginning to dawn. It is a mighty book of prophecy, and the prophetic warnings are being fulfilled to the letter.

Chaos is approaching. I hear excited men and women nearly every day up here clamoring for wholesale repeal of certain laws on our statute books, born in medieval ages, and substitution of laws based on modern science. The entire social structure of the United States is in turmoil.

How do I know?

I hear 5,000 people from every state and city in the Nation say so, per year. The book tells why it is so.

Even now, in the closing of the sixth age, a man from Viola wants me to explain what I mean by "getting into tune with the Infinite."

I strive all day and part of the night to place my mind and body into harmonic oscillation with the flux and flow of Corpuscles, the only real objects in existence. They are made of electricity. I received a letter containing news one day. It was from a man who said that "he did not believe himself to be a triune being made up of body, soul and spirit, but knew it."

Grant this to be true, then all three are made of corpuscles, the chief discovery of all time.

If the people only would get books and study corpuscles, they would be all right.

Just then came a voice crying in the wilderness, up near Washington, Cal., the voice of Brother C. M. Carter, Progressive Thinker No. 914, p. 3, saying that corpuscles are not the limit, seeking to destroy me up here on this impregnable granite peak. He goes on dreadfully, saying: "He has a positive knowledge of the existence of an energizing activity that scientists know nothing about from a scientist's point of view."

So have I, and the mighty energizing force, power, entity or whatnot, is MADE OF CORPUSCLES. This is strange language indeed to say that force is made of corpuscles, and they are made of electricity, and that no other force, power, entity or whatnot exists. But this is the tendency and trend with the heavy tread of modern science.

I fear that the Washington man has not heard of mathematical abstractions. If he should suddenly secure even one glimpse of the tremendous meaning of these two amazing words, he would rise to his feet in sheer astonishment. Is Brother Carter's mind made of finer stuff than corpuscles when it requires 100,000,000,000

A Strange Story.

"Like a Thief in the Night."

As Set Forth by Marguerite Linton Glentworth, in the New York Herald, Illustrating the Great Interest People are taking in Occult Matters.

Note from the Author.

To the Editor of the Herald:—

I have been much interested in your True Ghost Stories, and I should like to submit a story which in every particular is strictly true. I have called it "Like a Thief in the Night" for want of a better name. The experience related was that of a cousin of mine.

MARGUERITE L. GLENTWORTH.
No. 77 Parkhurst St., Newark, N. J.

The Physician's Story.

I am Dr. McLean, physician-in-chief of the insane asylum at B—, near New York. Among our several hundred patients we, of course, hear and see some strange things. It is in the nature of things that we should. But the story that I am about to tell you is so different from the ordinary that I give it to you for what it is worth. Nowadays there is such an interest in the supernatural, such a yearning for a word from the unseen and unknown, that this stray testimony may not be unwelcome.

Two years ago I received word from Dr. Ward, of South Berwick, Me., in regard to a Miss Dorothy Foraker. She was a very beautiful girl, well known in Boston and Washington society, as well as abroad. According to Dr. Ward's report of her, she had suddenly become stricken with melancholy.

She refused to eat or speak, had gone to bed in perfect health and was found in that condition in the morning. "Would one of us come down?" he wrote. I quote these items from my records of that time.

Dr. Clark, of the hospital staff, went to Maine and brought Miss Foraker back with him. Her appearance and quiet demeanor touched me greatly and at once aroused my sympathy and interest. She had long white hair, hair which the doctors told me had changed color in a night. Certainly she had undergone some terrible shock or fright.

Soon after her arrival at the hospital word was received from Washington that Robert Foraker, her twin brother, had died the same night at the Government Hospital in the Philippines, crying, "Dolly, Dolly, you have killed me!" Dolly was this girl.

Of course, the question naturally occurs to me, by some mysterious law, of which we know nothing, did his dying cry reach her ears? She remained with us nearly two years, a sad, sweet young woman, not recognizing her own mother, and rarely speaking. Her only interest seemed to be writing and music. About two months ago she died.

I was always a great favorite with her, and the night she died she sent a nurse to ask me to come to her. It was an intensely cold night, and at first I refused to be disturbed, but when the nurse assured me that she was quite rational and was dying, I went to her.

"Doctor," she cried at seeing me, "I am almost home. Give my love to mother." Then she asked the nurse to give me this story which she had written for me to read, and I give it to you in her own words, not changing a line.

The Patient's Story.

We were passing the winter of 1899 at my grandfather's old homestead, Oldfields, just out of South Berwick, Me.

It was the first winter we had ever passed in the country, but my twin and only brother, Robert, was in the Philippines, captain in a Massachusetts regiment, and my mother and I had no place in our hearts for the gayety of Washington.

My brother-in-law, Commander Rodgers, of the navy, was also attached to the Pacific squadron, and my sister, Mary, and her baby, were expected to pay us a long-promised visit.

We were in the habit of sitting up very late that winter, 'round the large open fire in the library, and on this All Halloween of 1899 it was later, perhaps, than usual when we retired. Mother had not been well all that autumn. One cause—in fact, the sole cause, I am sure—of her illness was her constant anxiety about my brother.

He had been wounded that spring in a skirmish, and later had been in the hospital with a low fever. We never knew what news the mails would bring us. Then, too, Robert was a poor correspondent. He rarely wrote, and when he did his letters were most vague and unsatisfactory. One is apt to fancy so much when one hears so little.

Mother loved Mary and me dearly, but Rob was loved, if not better, with a different love from that which she gave Mary and me. He was the only son of his mother and she was a widow, and he was precious beyond all price to her. But perhaps I wander from my story; my mind has not been quite strong lately. I have been ill a long time.

To return to that dreadful night. Strange that as I write I seem to live again in the past. I see, I hear, I feel as then, and although it was so very long ago, I have not forgotten anything.

After I retired I remained awake a long time thinking over our plans for Mary's visit, and as I lay there I began to realize how dark, how very dark, it was; darkness that could almost be felt. I remember I held out my hand before me, a child's test of darkness, and I could not see it, nor could I see where the window was, although I could feel it with my hand without rising. It was very, very dark.

Suddenly I was aware of hearing something—apparently on the front porch—but whether it was voices or footsteps I could not tell. I was only conscious of feeling, of knowing rather, that persons were near me; perhaps passing the house, which at that hour of the night on our great road was very unusual. The road was not open far above us, and we had only two or three near neighbors, with large grounds separating the houses.

Our house had an acre on each side of it, and the only house which might have been called near was above ours on the other side of the road—Deacon Yeaton's, who considered it part of his religious duty to go to bed at nine o'clock by the meeting house clock, so I felt sure that it was none of his family, unless there was sickness.

Still the consciousness of presence remained near, so that it seemed to take shape and come toward me in the blackness of the night.

I had never been called nervous. I did not know then what nerves were, save as I learned of them at school as organs of sensation running from the brain to all parts of the body. Nor was I timid. From a little child I never remember to have been frightened. I led a healthy, out-of-doors life, riding the gayest horses, swimming in the Berwick River, that ran back of our house; shooting at a mark and rarely missing it, my eye was so true and my hand was so steady.

"Had I found my nerves?" I asked myself. Those nerves I had never known I seemed to feel. Then I heard that indescribable noise again; that noise that was not a noise—rather a voice that had neither speech nor language, and I am now convinced that it came, as it had at first seemed to me, from the road. Still I did not spring to my feet, as would have been natural, but lay there quite still, listening to the beating of my heart that would not let me hear.

"Perhaps some animal is wandering around the house to-night," I thought, or rather tried to think, but that instinct which God has given us to witness to the truth, and which never errs, told me that it was not an animal, but rather something in a human form, and which I felt had come on some mysterious errand.

No thought of robbers entered my mind. In a small place like Berwick there were no robbers. But still the consciousness of presence remained near, and the presence grew upon me, as pain becomes more and more intense as the tide creeps slowly but surely up on the beach.

I could bear it no longer. I sprang to my feet. You wonder, no doubt, although it has taken me some little time to write this, I lived it in the least time that it is possible to imagine. How many experiences we have had in dreams, how much we have seen, heard and felt in our sleep in an instant! In a dream we have lived what seemed weeks and months, and on awakening have found that we had not been asleep five minutes. We measure time, we poor mortals, by days and weeks and years, but they, the immortal, do not; our days are to them as ages, and the ages to them are as days.

My room was over the front hall and my window directly over the front door—I note down every particular. As I stood at that window, my hand on the curtains to thrust them aside, there came a sound at the door. Again and again it was repeated—not a rap, nor even a knock that a man in haste might make, nor even like blows to break open a door. I cannot describe these sounds other than by saying they were not unlike claps of thunder when a fierce storm it at its height, and yet it was not like that, but more because they were unlike any noise in the material world.

The house that had stood for a century rocked like an infant's cradle every time those knocks were repeated. But why, perhaps you will ask, did not my mother and the servants hear them, and see and feel as I did? Ah, that I cannot answer, save by saying the summons was not for them, but for me.

I do not know why this terrible terror was sent to me, but perhaps sometime, somewhere, I shall be told. After the last knock had died away there was a long silence, in which I regained something of my usual courage and presence of mind, and the thought occurred to me, "What if it is a tramp, whom a pistol shot will frighten?" The thought nerved me.

I had been out shooting at a mark that morning and had left my revolver loaded on the table. I felt for it and found it in the darkness. I also lighted a candle, but it was instantly extinguished by a cold breath close to my ear, while a voice whispered in the silence, "What! do you frighten spirits of the air with powder and shot? Ha! ha! ha!"

Scarcely knowing what I did, but feeling that I must do something, I threw up the window and leaned far out of it and listened, straining my ears that I might catch the faintest sound, but although I had heard so much that was terrible the moment before, I was now mocked by the silence deep as the darkness was intense. Every moment brought fresh courage. I wondered at myself. I longed to see something and hear more. I felt that I was willing to face anything dead or alive when, suddenly looking down, I saw on the steps of the porch below me a—what was it, who can tell?

All nature lay in blackness as before, but the figure on those steps seemed to be shrouded in a strange light, or rather in a cloudlike mist that appeared to radiate from itself. At first my senses seemed to have taken flight, then I stood with my pistol grasped in my hand, holding it the closer because it was something that I could feel, touch and cling to. I could not move or cry for help. My voice, too, was for the moment gone.

Now that I had ventured to look out I was compelled to remain in that position whether I would or not. It is always the case, I believe, that as the eye becomes accustomed to the darkness up to a certain point it can see more and more distinctly. So it was with me. The shape, which at first was a cloak of darkness, now took the form of a man. Plainer and plainer I could see him—and I see see him still. The form was wrapped in what appeared to be a cloak and yet it was about the head although not covering the face entirely; that cold, white face, with eyes like lights in the night.

Then the knocking was resumed, although the figure did not move or turn its eyes from mine. I cannot tell how long this continued, but at length, together with the loud knocks at the door, there came to my ears the sound of voices, apparently in angry disputation. Frightened beyond measure, I cried in a loud voice, scarce knowing what I said or did, "If you do not go away at once I will kill you!"

Just why I said this I do not know, for the figure I felt was clothed, either for good or ill, in his immortality. A loud, derisive laugh and sneer were raised at my words, but not by the figure. "It" did not move or turn away. Stirred by the laugh in the darkness, I raised my revolver and fired, and as the flash from the pistol died away the figure vanished, and my brother Rob's voice came to me, as if from a great distance, "Dolly, Dolly, you have killed me!"

"Dolly" was Rob's pet name for me; "his darling Dolly," he used to call me. Was it possible that I had mistaken the voice? Was my imagination so wrought upon as to deceive me? Were my ears no longer true to me? I summoned reason to my aid. My brother was thousands of miles away from me. How could I have heard him speak at all, yet he had said I had killed him!

It was just one o'clock. I wrapped myself in a shawl and went down stairs and opened the library door. The open fire was still burning, makmaking the room bright and cheerful. I threw some more wood on it and seated myself in a chair before it and waited—waited for what I do not know, unless it was to hear Rob's voice again, for if the figure was Rob's, whether in the body or out of it, I did not fear him. Loving me in life, he would surely not harm me in death.

And I stayed there until daylight, no further sound of voices coming to break the fearful silence, and when I heard mother's step overhead I went up stairs and to my room again, and presently mother came in to say good morning.

I told her that I was ill and that I could not go down to breakfast—nor do I ever remember going over those stairs again, but lay there wasting away until I was ghastly to look upon. Our physician could not tell what was the matter with me, nor could the Boston specialist who came to see me. How could they? They did not know I had killed my brother. In the morning Mary arrived with her baby, but I was too ill to greet her. I remember she came into my room, but when she saw me she did not speak, but went softly out again.

Mother seemed to have become all at once stronger and better and to have laid aside and cast from her all needless anxiety and nerved herself to help me in my fight for life and reason. They said no word of Rob, nor did I ever mention his name or ask for letters or news of him. Did they think—they must have—that something had happened that had been revealed to me and to me alone?

In the spring, or late winter, I came here. How long ago it was I do not know. My hair, which was then brown, is now white and thin, and my face is pinched, wasted and lined like an old woman's. Perhaps, who knows, I am old! I was twenty when they brought me here, fresh as a rose in June. I pass my days in a sort of dream; nothing interests or pleases me; nothing troubles me either.

I am like one who has put all things aside—all joy, all hope, all fear—and am only waiting for death; this lethargy is death of mind and body. Sin is death—what holds us when we would go to God is death.

I am waiting for life—eternal life, full of immortal hope, and yet they say I am crazy—I, who am willing for death to open to me the door of knowledge and of peace. What became of my mother and sister I know not. People come here sometimes and ask to see me. Among them is a woman who says she is my mother. She is younger than I, and yet she would call me her daughter. I dislike deception and fraud, and I never notice her. There are others, too, who come, whom I do not know, and they also go away.

They are very kind to me here and patient. I try to give them no trouble. I rarely speak and I never read. Sometimes I play and occasionally I write, as I am doing now. I have often thought of writing this confession—no, you would scarcely call it a confession—rather my testimony to the unseen and unknown. There are so many questions I would like to ask of time.

There is one physician here whom I love. He was here yesterday. I know it was yesterday, for they said it was Monday, and to-day they say is Tuesday, and I asked the doctor how much longer I was to stay here, and I noticed he looked surprised. I never ask questions; in fact, I say little to anyone. And the doctor said in answer to my question, "Not long; you are going away very soon."

"To heaven, doctor," I said, "where I shall know and be known?" He told me "yes," after some hesitation, as if afraid to speak the truth, and that one solitary "yes" has been the only word of comfort or of cheer that the years have brought to me.

"How long have I been in the house, doctor?" I asked him. "Over a year," he replied. "And mother?" "She often comes here," he said.

So I have grown old, and have lived, as it were, my three score and ten years in a few months' time, and mother remains as when I last saw her. No wonder I did not know her. All these thoughts confuse and puzzle me.

I am going to give the doctor this story of my life, and ask him, "Did I kill my brother—is his blood on my head?" I could not tell him all this. We were not allowed to talk much; we became excited. If I should begin to tell him this he would say, "Yes, yes, another time." But he can read what I have written, and may perhaps be able to answer the questions, the two questions I ask myself night and day, day and night:—

"Did I kill my brother, and if not, who was it that came like a thief in the night?"

A GRAVEYARD.

We walked beneath the autumn-colored shade,
Where tinted leaves lay scattered on the ground;
In all the golden silence was no sound
Save that among the leaves our passing made.

Before a low stone wall our steps we stayed,
And gazed at many an ivy-covered mound
Where those who learned of life, their rest had found,
And as a dear reward in peace were laid.

It slept 'neath mem'ry's all-embracing pall
Silent, serene, untouched by passing time;
Oblivion, calm and peaceful, was its lot;
Perhaps a tombstone, green with age, might fall,
A slender sapling grow up to its prime,
But by the world, the graveyard lies forgot.

TRENCHANT REMARKS.

Made in Reference to the Equal Rights of Woman, by Paul McArthur, President of the Missouri State Spiritualist Association.

To the Editor:—There has appeared from time to time in The Progressive Thinker articles on that old, yet ever new theme, "The Equal Rights of Women." The subject has been well "cussed and discussed," many able articles having been written both for and against. I felt tempted several times (being of a reckless disposition) to butt in and take issue with some of the writers—not because of their laudable efforts in favor of justice for our unjustly-treated sisters, but because of some of their radical assertions. For instance, I deny that that which some of them define as equal rights is either equitable, just or desirable. Again, I deny that women's suffrage is or ever will be under existing conditions THE remedy for all political ills such as boodling, ballot-box stuffing, bribery, etc. I am going to hazard the rash assertion (even at the risk of getting my hair pulled) that the male or female who speaks or writes as if he or she believed that the whole political problem would miraculously be solved by and through the ballot being placed in female hands, is talking through his or her chapeau, and in nine cases out of ten is making a grand-stand play for applause to the galleries.

Facts, stubborn facts that we cannot close our eyes to, especially if we really believe in equal rights, dispute it.

As for myself I am in favor of women's suffrage—not because of what might be accomplished as a result, but because it is their heaven-born right. The government that taxes the property of women should give her also a voice in its local and national affairs. "No taxation without representation." But I believe that some of the men and women that cry the the loudest for their so-called rights, really want release from duties that no true man or woman can shirk or evade. I do not believe in the right of woman or man to neglect either the home or business duties or the children for the church, the club, the lodge or society. I believe in that passage of scripture which reads: "He (and I would add to that "she") who neglects the home is worse than an infidel and the truth is not in them."

I have no faith in the sincerity or kind of reform that Carrie Nation would give us with a hatchet while her husband lays helpless from disease at home, cared for by strangers. Neither do I believe in the anarchy, etc., of Emma Goldman, or in her right to teach such degradation. I have yet to find the woman or man that has no duties to perform, the neglect of which shows that they are lacking in the qualities that go to make up a true man or woman. Man has his duties, one of the principal of which is to provide by daily toil food, clothing and shelter for his loved ones. But with the true man it is a labor of love. Can the most radical advocate of some of the so-called rights of women deny the fact that woman has her duties also, the evasion and neglect of which shows her lack of true womanhood; for with the true wife, the true mother, it is equally a labor of love.

I believe that the man or woman who enters into the marriage relationship understanding all that it implies, duties for each that are necessary for the maintenance of the home, pay the price willingly and count it light compared with its joys.

The men or women that have lost that feeling that nature—nay, God—has implanted in the hearts of all, I truly pity; they have the right to choose for themselves; they may forswear the bonds (as they term it) of matrimony, they may scoff at the joys of motherhood and fatherhood and the sacredness of home ties; they may regard as worthless the love and respect of the opposite sex, but will the compensation be worth the price? I doubt it. I confess I cannot see how the world political is going to be redeemed by the class of women that tear the clothes off one another in the mad struggle to witness (uninvited) the daughter of a multi-millionaire sell her body for life to a broken-down roue for a title. One old lady, the newspapers called her respectable looking old female, actually crawled up into the church to see the private wedding ceremony through the coal hole. I frankly confess I see no hope for the world morally from the women that can do things like this and then say to the fallen sister that is trying to redeem herself: "Back to the hell from whence you came; there is no hope for such as you."

Justice would not be any safer in the hands of women jurors that could do thus, or could fill the cell of a murderer, and the murderer of one of their own sex at that, with flowers and love letters. Morality, purity, justice!—do you believe we can get women, single and married, that at the St. Louis World's Fair so shamefully and persistently thrust their love (?) on the black and yellow-faced Philippino?

I know that you can continually hear the howl going up that woman is the slave of man, and I admit that in some cases that is true. Will you, howlers, as freely admit what is equally true, that many men are slaves to women? I do not believe that true manhood has ever deprived true womanhood knowingly of what she felt was her just due or right. In the old days one of the principal duties of a knight errant was the relief of distressed females. Nothing today so quickly arouses the anger and indignation of man as the abuse of woman. Brutes have been burned at the stake for having violated woman's honor. In some states a law has been enacted and is being enforced that the brute that raises his hand to a woman is lashed at the whipping post. Her influence has and is regulating the affairs of the world to such an extent that it is a common saying that "woman is at the bottom of everything." Her very strength has laid in her weakness, and the poet spoke truly that said: "The hand that rocks the cradle is the hand that rules the world."

Equal rights!—I believe in them in the strictest sense of the word.

Women's place?

Why, everywhere a true woman or man can do good; most certainly not at man's feet, nor behind him, but at his side—his companion, sharing together their joys and sorrows.

I am not in favor of a separate code of laws or morals for woman or man. The morality that is held up for womanhood is good enough for me. The place that is not fit for my wife is not fit for me. If it is not right for my wife to commit adultery, it is not right for me, and if it is not right for me, how poor the logic of the women that say (as I have heard some of them), "well, if it's right for my husband, it's right for me." Who said it was right for him, and who said that two wrongs ever made one right, or ever will? I have heard more excuses for man's immorality come from the lips of women than I ever heard come from the lips of man, and while women assist in lowering the moral standard by making excuses for the immorality that exists, and by the giving of her child to the wealthy or titled libertine, permit me to doubt the efficacy (not the justice) of women's suffrage. Reform, like charity, begins at home. If there can be a higher purity taught than that of the home, I have yet to hear it. If there can be a sweeter, holier theme that can arouse and inspire the poet to grander or greater effort than when "Home, Sweet Home" was written, I have never heard it. If there can be a greater happiness than that of the couple knit together in the bond of love, I have yet to experience it. If there can be greater love than that of the mother for her child, I have yet to see it; the love that the poet so truly depicts in the song:—

Go to my wandering boy to-night,
Go search for him where you will,
But bring him to me
With all his blight,
And tell him I love him still.

Thank God for the companionship of true women! Our comfort in troubles, sickness and distress—our panacea for all human ills. The mannish woman and crusty bachelor may loudly demand their emancipation; the greatest evil I can wish them is that they get it; they won't find it worth the price they pay. As for myself, I am old-fashioned enough (if you will) to believe that if you sever and break up the home ties, you destroy the very foundation of all that is good, pure and holy in life; you have done away with all that makes life worth the living.

Woman—The Sphere of Her Influence.

In a recent editorial the Louisville Courier-Journal advocates the appointment of women factory inspectors, and says that "the enlargement of the sphere of woman's influence would undoubtedly tend to the correction of certain evils in schools, hospitals, insane asylums and other eleemosynary institutions." This is an important admission from so conservative a paper, and shows the drift of public sentiment in the South. The Lexington Herald goes still farther and declares for woman suffrage.

Two women, at least, are in public office in Texas, both having been put there by men's votes. Miss Zena Dalrymple was elected county and district clerk for Uvalde County, and Mrs. Mary C. Cope for Fannin County.

Undoubtedly public sentiment, and especially the stand taken by such persons as George Meredith, Bernard Shaw, Mrs. Despard, the philanthropist, and Elizabeth Robins, celebrated equally as author and actress, are responsible for the release from jail of the English suffragettes.

Women were permitted to vote at Glen Ridge, N. J., the other day, the proposition being to retain the post office at that fashionable suburb, or to have mail delivery from the Bloomfield office. 369 men and 360 women voting when they had a chance. A separate ballot box was provided for the women's vote.

The Vermont Senate voted down the municipal woman suffrage bill, 17 to 12.

Nora Stanton Blatch, grand-daughter of the pioneer woman suffragist, Elizabeth Cady Stanton, has been appointed on New York's staff of civil engineers. The girl is well equipped for her work and got the appointment solely on merit, having no political pull whatsoever.

Baroness Alexandria Grippenberg, of Finland, in commenting on the political enfranchisement of the women of her country is reported as saying: "The gratitude that we, the women of Finland feel, carries with it a regret, that we are less worthy than the women of England and America, who are so much better qualified and have struggled so much longer, and with so much more energy, ability and perseverance than we."

Looking at the walls of her cell in the London jail, Mrs. Montefiore read such inscriptions as these—memoutoes of former occupants: "Keep away from drink, or you'll come back here again;" "Fannie Lee, six months for stabbing;" and she left a record of her visit in the enamel of the bricks: "Dora Montefiore, two months for asking for votes for women."

The Cause at Los Angeles, California.

To the Editor:—The many friends of Mr. I. C. Craig, formerly of Clyde, Ohio, now of Los Angeles, Cal., will be pained to hear of his severe illness caused from ptomaine poisoning. His life was despaired of for days. Physicians, both this side of Time's River and the arisen ones, have carried him safely over the crisis. His faithful and devoted wife watched over him unceasingly until the light came back into eyes grown dim with agony, and looked into her own, where unshed tears spoke of joy that knows no misunderstanding.

It is a case where the soul stood upon the very brink, and Love caught it in the folds of Life and bore it back to the work unfinished.

Each Sunday we have missed Mr. Craig's presence from the rostrum—his fine personality, his logical reasoning, and sublime oration. He is slowly convalescing, as is also his sister speaker, Dr. Althea M. Briggs, who has been ill with fever from overwork. Our Guiding Stars, both being ill at the same time, has caused our hearts to be troubled.

I am requested to write to The Progressive Thinker, whose kindly face visits so many homes, that their friends east of the "Rockies" may know that they have been tenderly cared for here, and are on the way of recovery.

The free Spiritualist meetings are growing in popularity. Every Sunday new faces grace our hall. They come to listen to the able speakers who feed the weary and down-trodden the bread of life. There are souls that come to listen, to catch the beauty and meaning of the full fruition of life in its sweet effulgence, as the truths fall from lips that angels inspire with messages to their beloved ones.

"Heaven is not gained at a single bound." How sweet to feel and know that life always was, and ever will be, and all knowledge necessary for the growth of the soul is not gained in one earth existence. Ah! how sweet is life, how grand and beautiful is life, how grand and beautiful is death! Rose L. Bushnell DonnElly.

A SERMON OF DAY.

When the Captain of All the Forces Calls the Troops Before Him the Scars Upon Which He Will Look With Greatest Love May Not Be Those That Remain to Remind Us of Sword Wounds; They May Be the Scars of Hearts Bruised and Faces Tear-Stained, of Backs Bent and Hands made horny in loving, Lowly Service of Our Fellows.

The reminder of the days when men laid down their lives for their land thrills our hearts with a new appreciation of our privileges and a larger, deeper love of country. No land is worth much until it has cost much. Without the shedding of blood no patriotism is born, and by no other means can a soil be consecrated to a people.

The man in whom there awakens no response to the call of patriotism, who does not love one land above all others because it is his own land, cannot love any land at all, cannot enter into full living, for love for one's country and service for her welfare are part of the soul and substance of every true life.

Living for a city or a nation is religious service. It is moonshine for men to talk of loving heaven unless they can love this earth and labor to make it heavenly. Such sentimentalism usually stands for simple evasion of known duty to the present by deferring them to an indefinite future. The important thing is not that you should go up to the city of God, but that it should come down to us.

Patriotism, after all, simply is living for and working for others, those who constitute the state or nation. It enlarges the love from the self center to the full social circumference. It teaches to love the neighbor as one's self. It is altogether imperfect and often perilous until it includes those high religious motives of altruism, service and reverence for noble ideals and inheritances.

It always has seemed so easy to pray "Thy kingdom come," and then to wait for it to drop full-orbed from the skies that we have forgotten that every such prayer waits for the indorsement of our endeavor to bring all that that kingdom means to us within reach of all our fellows near, that no man really believes in that ideal kingdom who does not seek to make it immediately real.

The best memorial that can be offered for the sacrifice and service of days long past is sacrifice and service for some worthy purpose to-day. Religion and patriotism become one motive, compelling us to willingness to pay the full price of citizenship. There is no better way to honor the dead than honorably to live for the things for which they died.

We hear no thrilling call to arms; we feel no tidal wave of martial enthusiasm. There is no call for those ready to die. But there is a call for those who live. It is all the same, dying on the field or fighting for the right in the ward or city; the patriot is giving his life to his land. The dying or the keeping a whole skin are incidental; the essential thing is that we give ourselves.

Vain are all our dreams of glory past unless we are making the present goodly and the future's promise yet more glorious. Too many evaporate their patriotism in pride of yesterday's mighty works or in to-days full-dress parade. The puppets of passing enthusiasms, they mistake emotional memories for enduring memorials.

When the captain of all the forces calls the troops before him, the scars upon which he will look with greatest love may not be those that remain to remind us of sword wounds; they may be the scars of hearts bruised and faces tear-stained, of backs bent and hands made horny in loving, lowly service for our fellows.

Whoever loves his neighbor glorifies the State; whoever helps his fellow-citizen honors his city. The battlefield of to-day is the slum and the highway: the foes are greed and lust; the patriotic motives will be many, including love for men, high aspirations for our land, confidence in the coming of the glorious city of God. To fight against the things that keep us down, within and without; to lay down our lives in daily living for men is to become part of the glorious army that follows the King.

CURIOUS EXPERIENCE.

The Writer Claims a Materialized Spirit Hailed a Car, Got on Board, and Rode Toward Milwaukee, but Suddenly Vanished.

Bro. J. R. Francis:—The last of May I took the surburban car Racine for Milwaukee, at 7:15 p. m. It was daylight and the sun was shining. I was seated in the middle of the car. The car stopped and a young man got on. He was dressed in a light summer suit. He walked to the front vestibule and sat down behind the motorman. As he passed me the impression came as to who he was. I watched the conductor going to collect his fare. There being a partition between the materialized form and me I could not see him, but when the car got to Milwaukee there was a vacancy. The conductor searched the car twice for his passenger.

The young man I did not know personally, but knew of him. He passed to spirit life last February. Here is proof that a materialized form hailed a car, got on, and went the whole length of it in broad daylight. Of course the young man hadn't any coin of the realm with which to pay his fare, so he had to vanish.

VEDANTA PHILOSOPHY.

Lectures by the Swami Vivekananda, on Raja Yoga; or Conquering the Internal Nature, and other subjects; also, Patanjali's Yoga Aphorisms, with commentaries and a copious glossary of Sanskrit terms. Revised and enlarged. 12mo., Cloth, $1.50. Raja Yoga is an ancient system of Indian Philosophy, and one of the four chief methods that the Vedanta Philosophy offers to obtain freedom and perfection. Swami Vivekananda became a familiar figure in several American cities during the three years following the Parliament of Religions at Chicago; he was cordially received in America, where the breadth and depth of his teachings were soon recognized. His teachings are universal in their application. The book is cheap at $1.50. For sale at this office.

THE PROGRESSIVE THINKER

Published Every Saturday at 40 Loomis Street,

J. R. FRANCIS, Editor and Proprietor

Entered at the Chicago Postoffice as Second-Class Matter

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION:

THE PROGRESSIVE THINKER will be furnished until further notice at the following terms, invariably in advance:

One Year..... $1 00
Six Months..... 50cts
Thirteen Weeks..... 25cts
Single Copy..... 5cts

REMITTANCES:

Remit by Postoffice Money order, Registered Letter or Draft on Chicago or New York. It costs from 10 to 15 cents to get checks cashed on local banks, so do not send them unless you wish that amount deducted from the amount sent. Address all letters to J. R. FRANCIS, 40 Loomis Street, Chicago, Ill.

TAKE NOTICE.

☞ At the expiration of subscription, if not renewed, the paper is discontinued. No bills will be sent for extra numbers.

☞ If you do not receive your paper promptly write us, and any errors in address will be promptly corrected, and missing numbers supplied gratis.

☞ Whenever you desire the address of your paper changed, always give the address of the place to which it has been going or the change cannot be made.

TO FOREIGN COUNTRIES.

The price of The Progressive Thinker per year to foreign countries is $2.

SATURDAY, JUNE 29, 1907.

WORDS OF CAUTION.

You should not send money in a letter. You may do so a dozen times safely, and then the next remittance may be lost or stolen. Secure a postal order for five cents, and then you are perfectly safe, and will save yourself annoyance and trouble.

TAKE NOTICE.

All books advertised in The Progressive Thinker can be obtained at this office. Express charges or postage prepaid at the price named unless otherwise stated.

THE N. S. A. CONVENTION.

Full reports of the proceedings of the late N. S. A. convention in Chicago can be obtained by addressing Mrs. Mary T. Longley, 600 Pennsylvania avenue S. E., Washington, D. C.

AN ENTIRELY NEW DEAL.

The POSTAGE on papers has been increased to all the British possessions on this continent. . On a single paper we are compelled to pay ONE CENTS each week, amounting to 52 cents a year, whereas previously we only paid the pound rates—a mere trifle. Hence, to all the British possessions on this continent the paper hereafter will be $1.50 per year.

Never Made Laws for Us.

The Nottingham Guardian, an English journal, in reporting a murder trial, quotes Justice Ridley, in reviewing the case, as saying:

"If I remember rightly, the Bible says, 'Whosoever sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed.' This was the original decree of the Almighty, and he had yet to learn that they were to have it called in question."

The Justice was mistaken; the "Almighty" never said any such thing. It was the Jehovah, the tribal God of the Jews, the fictitious Moses as his mouthpiece, who gave utterance to that declaration. That God kept concealed in the ark, otherwise a box, was the "God of Israel." In chapter 4 and 5 of I Samuel we learn this "God of Israel," the Jehovah of the Bible, when captured, was placed by the side of Dagon, otherwise Fish God. The next morning Dagon was found prostrate on his face, with his head and both hands cut off. The Philistines soon found they had an "elephant on their hands," so they gathered all their lords, who decided to send the "ark of the God of Israel" to Gath. But the God of Israel smote the people with hemorrhoids, and made it so unpleasant for the captors that they sent him to Ekron. Because of the "deadly destruction" which followed his arrival at Ekron it was determined to "let" this Jew God "go again to his own place." In chapter 6 we are told the Philistines procured a new cart on which they placed the "ark of God," with "jewels of gold as a trespass offering." They tied two milch cows to the cart, keeping their calves at home; then the kine took the straight way to the camp of Israel, lowing as they went. On arrival in camp the men were curious to know if their God was yet in the box, so they raised the lid and looked in. For doing this, says the sacred record, "The Lord, even he, smote of the people fifty thousand three score and ten men."

The Lord who knocked the God of the Philistines out in the first round, cut off his head and his hands, and avenged himself because the lid of the box in which he was kept was raised, and killed such a multitude of people, was a personage to be placated among the barbarian people; but a God who can be confined in a box, and drawn by lowing cows in a cart over the rocky wilds of Palestine, and was maddened because the lid was raised, causing such a slaughter, was good enough to make laws for the savages of 5,000 years ago, but he should be eliminated with a thousand other foolish things from the Bible when that book is radically revised and fitted for these modern times.

The reader is again reminded that the Hebrew word four times translated Jehovah, and in all other places in the Old Testament is rendered Lord, in Hebrew appearing as Yhvh, and correctly would be rendered Yahveh. Wherever the word Lord is used in the Old Testament, always remember Yahveh should be used, or else the old Saxon Y may be substituted by the modern J, giving us Jahveh. However written or pronounced, a Lord dwelling in a box, or "ark," and hauled over the country by lowing cows, whatever he may have done for the Jews, he never made laws for this age and generation.

A "New Theory" Stolen From Spiritualism.

The celebrated scientist, Ray Lancaster, in his work "The Kingdom of Man," has announced as a new discovery that the primary cell which represents living beings is the same in plants and animals. In other words, that in the beginning the two great kingdoms were united in the primordial cell. Hitherto biologists have regarded the vegetable cell as distinct from the animal, by being incased in a wall of cellulose, while the cell classed as animal is free to communicate with others. This discovery the author declares, is "no less epoch making than the discovery of the circulation of the blood.

It appears that the most careful investigators have been misled in drawing distinctions between these microscopic organisms in which animal and vegetable life blend. They have transferred them from one kingdom to the other repeatedly. Now it is affirmed with demonstration that this primary cell-being has essentially the same factors of growth, and that the plant is a "form of animal, and the animal is a moving plant."

This may be new to "science," and seem to make the reputation of its promulgator, but simple justice demands a plain statement of the truth in the case.

Nearly fifty years ago this theory was clearly stated in the Arcana of Nature, a book claiming to have been written by spirit inspiration through Hudson Tuttle. The following brief quotations are in evidence:

"The lowest and universal archetype is the cell. The cell combines all forms. The great subdivisions of natural history arise from the difference in aggregation the cell assumes. In their wide divergence from the primitive type it is easy to draw the distinction of class; but in their point of contact, difficult, indeed, is it to define their characters. Great are the differences between the oak and the bird caroling in its branches; the bee and the flower from which it sips the nectar; but when we trace the widely separated chain of beings—vegetable and animal—downward, they meet and inseparably blend (in the cell-being). Naturalists have been unable to assign the proper position to the zoophites, and the lower members of this division have been repeatedly transferred from vegetable to animal, and ahimal to vegetable. They have been confounded because it was thought they must belong to one kingdom or the other—a mistake, for their structure is strictly intermediate. They are the links which unite vegetable and animal."

There is an accompanying diagram of the Tree of Life, showing how with its roots in these primary cell-beings or "amoeboids," as the authors designate them, the trunk rises and is divided, first into branches of animals and plants, and these again in the different subdivisions. This diagram is represented as extending up through the strata and thus in beginning with the primitive rocks indicates in what age the branches were thrown off.

Now the choice is given to those who refuse to honor its spiritual source, to accept the statement that it was written by the medium—then scarcely seventeen years of age—on a remote farm, uneducated, without books of reference, or any external sources of instruction or information.

Had Hudson Tuttle been worldly wise and published this matter in scientific journals as conclusions of his personal research, he would have at once ranked with the most advanced leaders of science. Instead he has given its credit absolutely to the spiritual teachers whom he affirms are its authors.

Agnostic Spiritualism.

It is a pleasure to note that a goodly number of the correspondents of the Truth Seeker—one of the ablest agnostic papers now published—in communications are expressing themselves as believers in the truths of Spiritualism. There would be many more were it not for the discredit the impostors, the fraud mediums, are imposing on us.

Mrs. Elizabeth E. Evans is one of the ablest and most forceful writers for the Truth Seeker. She is the author of several pamphlets which we have read with profit, all from an agnostic standpoint. In a recent article Mrs. Evans makes an important admission, from which we gladly make a brief extract, and regret space will not permit its entire publication. She commences by saying:—

"The older I grow the more I am inclined to believe in continued existence after death, notwithstanding the many scientific facts which seem to favor a materialistic view of the universe, and consequently to disprove the idea of immortality. To me the strongest argument in support of this belief is the fact that in this life no one is entirely satisfied, while the greater majority fail to attain what would make them happy.

"Even lives which may be called successful do not satisfy their owners, who regret their mistakes of ignorance, or grieve over their personal sorrows, or sigh for more complete achievements, or deplore the shortness and uncertainty of remaining opportunities for further activity. May we not venture to hope that after the brief and unsatisfactory span of earthly life there exist other spheres of action wherein we may develop our better selves according to the wisdom acquired through disappointment here, and thus atone for earlier failures?"

Passing her logic showing why a future life ought to be, Mrs. Evans concludes:—

"We have no right to say there is no future life. It is more likely when one door is shut another will be opened before us, and our opportunities for knowing and doing will be endless. It is time most of the so-called messages from the Spirit-world are unsatisfactory, and we have the option of rejecting testimony which appears unworthy; but there may be difficulties in the way which we do not understand; at any rate, we can catch hold to the agnostic standpoint, and say, with regard to all these questions, "I don't know."

There is practical good sense.

Sorrow for the Distressed.

We grieve for the evident distress of churchmen who are conscious of the constant inroads of skepticism as regards pulpit teaching. In every large assemblage of the clergy the general lament is the apostasy of the age. "God help us," is their constant prayer. But is it not apparent he is helping the other fellow?

The age is too intelligent to admit of further fabrication of holy books. When education was almost wholly confined to the priesthood, and critics were subjected to inquisitorial fires, any controverted question could be met by adding a paragraph or two to the Gospel; but when education became more widely diffused, and the art of printing, aided by the Reformation, placed the Bible in nearly every home, then whole books were forged, and were claimed to have been found in some old monastery. Only those who have made a study of the subject can form any idea of the extent of such priestly vice. Large volumes are everywhere found on our library shelves, supposed to have been written in the early centuries of our era, which were forged during the first half of the 15th century. A magazine employing the best scholarship of the age is needed, to be devoted exclusively to the literary frauds of the Christian church. It would be in great demand. Who will undertake its publication?

A Hired Assassin.

No character of modern times has been presented to us in such obnoxious colors as that of Harry Orchard, and he, while on oath, in the trial of Haywood, at Boise City, Idaho, tells of his own many crimes. His great forte was murder, and he seemed best pleased when he could destroy men in large groups, eighteen at a time. One hundred dollars, it seems, was about the fee required to kill any one. His victims were ushered into eternity without warning—all unprepared. The assassin was arrested in his career of wholesale murder. He turned informer, hoping thereby to escape just punishment. With plenty of leisure he "got religion;" is on friendly terms with God; is sure of eternal reward for believing, whilst his unfortunate victims are writhing in the flame of a burning hell.

Out upon such damnable teaching. The man who lives a worthy life, and wrongs no one, whether he believes or doesn't believe Christian creeds, will gain the highest seat in glory; and he whose hands are dripping in human gore will experience the woe he has pronounced on others. Worthy lives win the crowns, and belief cuts no figure before a just judge.

Self-Convicted.

Some one—a confessed liar and fraud—wrote the Chicago Daily News recently that he was "a full-fledged Spiritual medium for seventeen years." He says:—

"There is no such thing, so far as I know, as spirit return or manifestation. All my experience goes to show the work is done by the mediums and their assistants."

The writer, who signed his name Hiram True, should have used Liar as his patronymic, to make his name and character harmonize. Seventeen years a liar, a cheat, a contemptible fraud, a base deceiver, during which long period his habits of life were formed—who would believe him on oath to-day?

They who practice fraud to promulgate any religion merit universal detestation and execration.

It is said: "An open confession is good for the soul;" but what is a "soul" worth that would personate the sacred dead for fraudulent purposes for seventeen years? It is not worth hell room, and it would be a waste of brimstone to confine it there.

Bearing Fruit.

Nearly every paper we take up has an account of a murder in which the assassin justifies himself on the score of "emotional insanity," that being the present polite expression for being very angry. A woman feels she has been insulted, and retaliates by shooting the aggressor.

The Thaw trial for murder, with the defense of "emotional insanity," will result, before its pernicious influence is lost, in the sacrifice of a thousand lives.

The murderer who knows enough to kill, knows enough to suffer the penalty, and should not escape because of the newly modeled American defense. Hanging or electrocuting may not be the proper caper, for it is too soon forgotten, but a life sentence in a penitentiary will serve a good purpose in deterring other offenders.

Man alone is and shall be our god. —Feuerbach.

Photographic Trickery.

Again it is in Evidence. When will the deluded learn that no law or principle of Nature can be transformed or changed by mortals or spirits, hence the impossibility of a realm of the supernatural.

Having received from Mrs. Julia Coyle of Los Angeles, Cal., a communication lauding the work of the "Spirit" photographer Wyllie, we sent two specimens of his work which she furnished us, to the eminent scientist, Prof. Lockwood, for critical examination. One contained four faces, and the other a cluster of flowers with a face therein. The following communication shows the result of his examination.

To the Editor:—The two specimens of "TRICK PHOTOGRAPHY," sometimes called "spirit photographs" by the ignorant and over-credulous, came duly to my hand for analysis and review. These clumsy specimens of photographic fakirism were made or exposed, it is claimed, in the dark, in the studio of a man by the name of Wyllie, of Los Angeles, Cal.

If Mr. Wyllie knew anything about the mathematical principles underlying optics, chemistry, and photographic formula, he would not care to expose his ignorance of these factors by placing before the public such specimens of his handwork and proofs of his duplicity as these specimens contain. And if the party for whom these pictures were made could be led to see that there can be no optical or chemical action and reaction in any supernatural sphere, and that the thought or human volition cannot change the tendency of chemical action in photographic process, or lengthen or shorten the real distance between the article photographed and the camera; it cannot change the curvature of the lens and their focal length; thought cannot make a flower larger than it really is by line measurement, or a spirit head as small as a common rose—if this party could be induced to study these factors of the art of photography they would have a more valuable acquisition to their photographic laboratory than a Kodak camera and a developing dish.

Now it happens that if these photos had been made in the way the accompanying letter from Los Angeles claims, every one of these principles of optics, chemistry and dynamical law, so-called, would have been transformed, from which it would appear that any so-called law of nature could be set aside or transformed by the silly thought of an over-credulous intellect.

The first specimen we will briefly examine is the bouquet of flowers containing a female face. Now the presumption is on the part of the operator that this face was taken at the same time as the bouquet. If it was not taken at the same time, the artist must confess to two separate negatives in the production of this picture. As the artist would not confess this much, we will follow up the presumption that the face seen in this bouquet was taken when the bouquet was photographed, and we will see how this man's art shows him capable of mental perjury and culpable artifice.

Applying our areometer to this photo we find the face of the lady to be smaller in diameter than the rose at the right hand side of the face was. This is a violation or transformation of the law of optical dynamics. This law is sometimes called the law of inverse squares, or relative proportions. Applied to photographic optics it means that the areas of the same size and occupying the same distance from the lens of the camera would result in pictures of these areas, of the same relative size on the photographic film.

Since it would be difficult, even in California, to find a rose as large as the average human face is, it follows that the face in this instance was a copy made to suit the relative size of the bouquet, and it was printed on the photographic paper before the bouquet was. The seeming picture of the rose over the lower part of the lady's face covering her chin and neck, is not the picture of any flower, but a little puckling of a film put on to deceive those who have eyes and see not. A good magnifying glass used in sunlight will reveal THIS EVIDENCE OF TRICKERY. Then, again, the great divergency in the character of the high-lights between the bouquet and the face indicates negatives of separate chemical density, in which the greater density of the original film containing the picture of the face is found. It is quite evident that the face in the bouquet is a copy of the photo of the central figure in the second specimen, which contains four faces of adult people, each face varying in size from 100 to 500 lines. The two faces in the foreground of the photo are smaller, and one of them considerably smaller than those in the background. This is the reverse of the law of inverse squares, since the faces in the foreground—as seen in this picture—should be larger, being nearer the camera. One face, and the only one in the background, is the largest one of the lot, whereas it should be the smallest, being the farthest away from the camera.

This picture does not take on the semblance of a group, for if so, the two clear spirits in the foreground must have sat squat-flat on the floor, while the spirit lady in the center of the plate must have knelt upon something to make her high enough so the heads of the two in the foreground came up to the lower part of her bust, while the person in the background (I can't tell whether it was intended for a man or woman, it is so dim) had to stand on air or a stool to be one of the quartet.

Three of these pictures or faces were printed under isinglass, or a film of celluloid, to give the face that chalky whiteness which jingo photographers employ to simulate a photographic angel, and while it produces a peculiar effect, it invariably throws the picture out of focus during the time it is being printed. Nearly all photographic angels are out of sharp focus in the print, and whenever you see a spirit photo of this kind you may be sure that it is a fraud. We have not at hand the apparatus for indicating the various densities of the films from which this conglomeration was made, but the way the group is put together indicates the "printing-in process" from several negatives, each of which had its own polar attributes, the result of the chemical reactions taking place in the film when each negative was made. That anyone can imagine that such a careless mixture of chemical and optical physics is of value to the cause of Spiritualism is one of the greatest mental phenomenons of the age, and if there be such a state of mind as that indicated by the term "Dementia Americanis," it certainly will apply here. THAT SPIRIT PHOTOGRAPHY IS A FACT, and its principles are found in the realm of natural philosophy, we feel abundantly able to prove; but this mental chicanery practiced by many and patronized by the overcredulous and unsophisticated ought to receive the condemnation of all honest men, and to consign those who practice it for gain to the realm where the rights of citizenship are denied.

Yours for demonstrated truths,
W. M. LOCKWOOD.

GREETINGS!

They Come from the Hague Delegates On Board of the Steamship La Bretagne, June 9th.

Greetings, on this French line steamship, 540 miles from Havre, which port we expect to reach early next Tuesday morning. From there we go to Paris, for a day or two, and then to The Hague.

The passenger list of this steamship this trip is made up almost entirely of members of an International Bohemian Society, organized years ago at Prague, to which place there is a pilgrimage of members from all parts of the world every five years, to take part in their meetings and contest in their Olympian games.

We have had a very tempestuous passage for this time of the year. It has been much like the winter storms on the great lakes, and most of our Bohemian passengers have been sick, but most of them have got their "sea legs" on now, and are a very jolly crowd, singing and laughing all the time. They are from all parts of the country, a number from Chicago.

Mrs. Richmond and myself have both been very well and have enjoyed the passage very much. Mrs. Richmond joins in kindest regards to all friends. WM. RICHMOND.

TAKE NOTICE!

Spiritualists Everywhere Be On the Alert.

Spiritualists of the United States, do you want Spiritualism properly represented in the report of the Director of the Census? If so, urge the officers of your local and State association to fill and return the card sent them long ago, by the Department. Every opportunity has been given us to prove by figures how many we are, and it will be our own fault if we are incorrectly reported. Spiritualists, have you the courage to stand up and be counted? If so, send in the reports of your local societies.

How It Was Done.

NO END TO TRICKERY.

It Comes to Light Daily—How One of the "Rev. Dr." Moore's Tricks Was Done—It Was a Trick.

To the Editor:—I attended one of the "physical manifestation" seances of "Rev. Dr." Moore, during the past winter, while he and his wife were so successfully DECEIVING a numerous following here in New York.

One of the star features at these performances was the giving of type-written messages to the sitters, who had written the name of a departed friend or relative upon a small card, and then sealed the same in envelopes passed out for that purpose. Card and envelope were returned with the message, and the seal had not been broken. I took the trouble, however, to examine the card and envelope when I got home, and found that by pressing the envelope tightly against the card I could plainly read all that was written on it.

The Californians seem to be less gullible than New Yorkers, for at Los Angeles the "Rev. Dr." had been in business only a few weeks before he got into serious trouble, and here he continued as a "HOWLING SUCCESS" for several years.

Affairs of this nature are like a millstone about the neck of true Spiritualism, and its sublime philosophy.

Wishing The Progressive Thinker unbounded success in its special work of weeding the fakes from the ranks of mediumship, I remain very truly yours, M. P. ROPP.

MATERIALIZATION.

It Only Acts a Secondary Part in the Ranks of Spiritualism—An Interesting Dream or Vision.

To the Editor:—In your issue of June 8, J. F. Baker makes the assertion, "Spiritualism must stand on the truth of materialization. If there is no materialization there is no Spiritualism."

I wish to state briefly that I cannot agree with him. While I believe materialization to be possible, I consider it one of the phases of mediumship of least importance.

How many of us would reject all of the more ennobling, soul-soothing truth Spiritualism has given us, even if it were proved that all so-called materializations were fraudulent.

Would it not be beter if some of the money spent in materialization and other phenomena were used in defraying expenses of the more spiritual lecturers in the movement, and a wider circulation of The Progressive Thinker and other literature having an uplifting tendency?

Many of the lectures and articles recently published in your valuable paper would do splendid work if published in pamphlet form and given a wider circulation.

I regret that there is no medium here and but few Spiritualists, but I have found two persons who have promised me they would subscribe for your paper. I had given them copies of it.

I am a railroad man, employed at night, and having some ability as a magnetic healer, have been kept busy night and day nearly.

Last evening as I was resting for a few minutes I had a peculiar dream, or vision. I dreamed a great calamity had occurred resulting in many being suddenly called beyond. I knew they had no knowledge of a life beyond, as I called them together and explained to them as best I could their new condition, and how to make the best of it. I seemed to grow suddenly eloquent, and I seemed to see them as well as many mortals listening intently. I finished with a lengthy poem, the language of which was not my own. I was then not asleep, and sat up and tried to write it, but could not. I lay down again, and it continued. It equalled anything I ever heard or read. It was real, and I realize it was being given by some advanced spirit. I would give a great deal to be able to get it on paper; perhaps I may later.

I wish to endorse your editorial, "Well Meant Advice Not Accepted," in issue of June 8. Yours for a more spiritual Spiritualism.

THE PROGRESSIVE THINKER.

It Incites High Aspirations, and Promotes Morality and Spirituality.

I do not believe that any person can carefully read this huge weekly without having his aspirations for right endeavors strengthened, and ability aided to put them in practice.

As to the morality of mediums, if the gifts of mediumship are inherited or acquired like music or mathematics, why should it change the natural tendencies any more than the former? Outsiders who know little of Spiritualism and less of mediumship, naturally think that the ability to converse with the spirits, the higher intelligences, must imply spirituality as well as morality on a more elevated plane than those not thus constituted.

Are musicians, artists, or even writers of verse more amiable and pleasant or useful than the persons who are not devoted to some specific hobby? Common sense, which is not very common, and tact, which is said to be higher than talent at all times exercised in the commonplace, every-day affairs, may unobtrusively do more to steady and balance the world than those making louder claims.

Progress begun on earth will be continued in the life beyond, and there we recive just what we lived for here It is justly claimed that Spiritualism came to the earth to redeem the people from ignorance, error, poverty and crime; that people live after the change called death is a fact that can be demonstrated. They are able to "try the spirits" and do not believe every spirit. Wicked men walk the streets here, and unless they reform before entering the spirit world have to overcome their evil propensities there. Some individuals are so obstinate by nature and so tenacious of their previous beliefs, that it takes a long time. So you perceive how advantageous it would be for all to take The Progressive Thinker and learn about the country to which sooner or later they are destined to go.

Truths unapplied are practically useless. Preaching the truth and not practicing the same is not convincing to the student.

If Spiritualism has something more satisfying than orthodoxy gives, it must be promulgated and commended by persons embracing it. A sin committed by them is more reprehensible than when committed by others.

The world expects more from those who are taught by the angels and conversing with them. People of the world do not consider that many who cross the portals of what is called death leave behind saints of a higher grade than themselves, nor are the people liberated from the flesh kept in idleness. The most erudite will find something to learn, and fellow beings to teach. Many pass on who have not learned the a. b. c. of Spiritualism. Other things they can teach and other persons must teach them.

Subscriber for The Progressive Thinker and learn much about the place and condition of the life after having left the body of flesh.

PERFECTION THE AIM OF CREATION.

We Should "Set Up" in Mind a Standard of Noble Perfection.

If there is any purpose in the plan of the universe, in the multifarious workings of nature, it certainly points in the direction of growth, development, unfoldment, and ultimate perfection.

Look where we will and we behold on every side incessant, untiring activity. What does it all mean? Shall we say "Nothing"? By so doing it cannot alter one fact. No, it does not even modify a single truth by the fact that the rocks may be unconscious of what is taking place within themselves. Man has been pushed along from the ages of cannibalism, and the sun would continue to move if even that truth had never dawned upon the human mind.

Progression is the great law of creation, and there is no thwarting the plan of the Supreme Intelligence. There may be instances of seeming retrogression, as in ages gone by, but the fall of man from the standard of perfection when that standard has been but once reached is as impossible as for ripeness to prove unripeness, or perfection imperfection. Indeed, it never was possible for ripeness to precede unripeness, but it always follows as a natural outgrowth of unfolded conditions.

The object of the creative intelligence never has been accomplished. The work of progression still goes on. The planet has not reached its maturity, as scientifically demonstrated, and man, the microcosm or little planet who embodies within his own personality all the properties of the mother planet, is but in the very infancy of his growth.

Nevertheless the human race was never so far advanced as to-day, and each year brings new revelations of steady progression. But we are far from being perfect. The perfect man or woman is not vain, not selfish or deceitful as we are. We have still to conquer ourselves, our passions, appetites, and the many little pet hobbies which confine us within the narrow boundaries of self and keep us from expanding in heart and head. We have still to gain the balancement of our moral as well as intellectual faculties, a balancement of all our functions, which alone can insure unison and harmony of action.

Though we pay most, if not all, our attention to the bodily needs, still we have not mastered the art of uniform development. But with the curbing of appetites, and a strict attention to sanitary laws, coupled with systematic exercise, pure air and simplicity of living, much will be accomplished in this direction towards furnishing the requisite steam for higher development.

It is the higher development and uniform balancement of all our faculties which constitute sanity, perfect harmony and consistency of action, manifesting itself in wisdom, forbearance, kindness, humility, temperance, self-denial—in short, a perfect life.

We ought to take an occasional glance at ourselves, and set up in the mind's eye a standard of perfection worthy of imitation; an ideal of true and noble manhood and womanhood, of christian simplicity, not vanity; of generosity, not selfishness; of intelligent understanding, not ignorance and groundless superstition.

We can profess what creed we like, but the question is, how much does our creed profit us? How much does it make us grow, or develop us into true and noble specimens of men and women? If it does these things for us, it is the right religion, no matter what it is called; but if it fails in this particular, then it is worse than useless, inasmuch as it keeps us from seeking that which might profit us.

Strength—physical, intellectual, or moral—is the result of a gradual growth, and can never be acquired by haphazard efforts, no more than at the eleventh hour. It requires time and a systematic course of training to develop the physical man, and it requires a much longer period to develop an intellectual and moral man.

It is, indeed, the most lamentable theory that has ever been evolved to suppose that a man can carelessly go on his way through this life, making no effort at improvement except in a financial way, and then at the eleventh hour expect to become immediately cultured, refined, and radically changed, perhaps, from the natural effects of the most vicious habits of a lifetime, as well as the depths of ignorance, and all for the mere asking. If there could be concocted a mischievous doctrine, certainly this is the one. But the reverse is the case. "Be not deceived, God is not mocked; whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap."

We are very fond of talking of miracles, of supernatural events, the suspension of the natural laws, and so forth, and try hard to make God and his laws conform to our little pet ideas, but if we continue to ignore these immutable, impartial, and therefore just, laws, governing us day by day, we will most assuredly be overtaken by their very natural effects.

We have been blessed with functions capable of great possibilities. Let us then see to it that we be not found like the man who buried his talent, but rather let us give them immediate attention, so that when called upon to render an account of our stewardship we shall have something more to offer than good looks and finely-made garments.

Hungry People.

A Trenchant, Spiritualizing Lecture by the Poetess, Mrs. Emma Rood Tuttle, of Berlin Heights, Ohio.

THERE IS A HUNGER OF THE SPIRIT WHICH IS EVEN MORE GENERAL AND MORE IMPERATIVE THAN THAT OF WHICH WE HAVE BEEN SPEAKING, AND WHICH IS NOT SO EASILY SATISFIED. IT IS THE HUNGER OF THE SOUL AFTER TRUTH, AND BEAUTY, AND ALL EXCELLENCE. THE HUNGER FOR THE FOOD UPON WHICH IT MAY GROW TO THE DIVINE PROPORTIONS OF ANGELHOOD. THIS HUNGER IS THE CAUSE OF ALL RELIGIOUS REFORMS, AND THE POWER WHICH MOVES THE WORLD AHEAD.

IT WAS THE HUNGER OF HUMAN SOULS WHICH BROUGHT OUR NEW GOSPEL INTO THE WORLD. THE MENTALLY STARVING SENT UP CRIES TO HEAVEN FOR MORE DIGESTIBLE RELIGIOUS FOOD. SOULS WERE DWARFED AND STARVED ON A POISONOUS DIET THEY COULD NOT ASSIMILATE, SO THE ANGELS ANSWERED THE HUNGRY CRIES OF THE WORLD.

We are ushered upon the career of an earthly existence with the cry of hunger upon our lips. The first labor of life is to appease the demand of Want. The little human organism cries in imperative tones for the wherewith to grow, and sets at once to work to appropriate the material at its command—to take the first step forward in the shrouded labyrinth of a never-ending life. The ceaseless struggle to gain maturity, and comparative perfection, begins with cries and struggles, and so it continues along the snow-frosted and bloom-laden years, until they are lost in the unmeasured life which is no longer mortal.

In the start hunger is generally legitimate in its demands. The appetites are natural and healthy. The child simply claims its right; it does not wish to rob others to feed itself; it does not cry for pernicious indulgencies; its hunger is only the demandfor healthy growth, and its labor is solely and justly in its own behalf.

If we could only preserve the pure tastes of childhood how much more effective might be our lives. If we were wise enough to guard them, to prevent their becoming vitiated and turned into agents for destruction instead of agents for development, we might indeed ornament this world, and hungry people would cease to be beasts of prey, seeking whom they may devour.

As we commenced life needing food, so we continue to need it all along our journey, and I doubt if ever in the future which stretches before us we shall reach a time when we shall be absolutely self-contained and self-supporting, needing nothing, asking nothing, receiving nothing. Sure it is, if we ever do reach that Godlike self-sufficiency we shall never more feel the pangs of hunger. Our souls will famish no more for that which nourishes their holy longings, and eyes which plead on earth will no longer pray in silence for something more divine than earth can offer. I know not what satiety that strange, heavenly country may yield us, but I expect to enter it hungry—hungry for the wisdom of the holy angels—hungry for their gentle welcomes and loving words—hungry for the purest friendships and the holiest communion of souls—hungry for heaven's melting music and unpainted beauty—hungry for the things of which I have dreamed but have failed to find on earth—hungry for the rest which cometh after the battle—and I know I shall find it all!

And still I shall want until I know all there is to be learned in the universe of my Father. I shall be hungry while I am imperfect, and the eons of ages which lie before me until I reach the white heights of a perfect soul I cannot count, but of our needs and the Divine Father's ways of answering them when we shall have passed on to the land of sunshine and eternal spring I will not now conjecture. I trust and bide my time, meanwhile reaching up for the guidance and assurance of the lily-handed angels, who have climbed up, treading, as we do, the thorny highways and byways of mortal existence to the country which lies in the blue distance beyond us.

Let us think together of the hunger of our present existence; not alone of that wailing cry which comes from the physical demands of a starving body, but also of that spiritual hunger, which is less discernible but not less demanding. It was the shrinking skeleton of starvation which caused and drove on the French Revolution, with its horrid retinue of terrors. Do you think a well-fed nation could have enacted that tragedy? It is the hunger of Russia's serfs—now technically liberated, but still taxed until with the most meager of diets they are obliged to mix chopped straw to eke it out—whose strongest food is black bread and onions, which is thundered in the desperation of the nihilists. The wrongs of the downtrodden subjects of the most indecent monarchy on the face of the earth are so great that they have almost driven to madness the would-be savior of the poor. We sometimes shudder at what would seem to an American remorseless atrocity, but we also stand aghast at the wrongs which nurture and feed it. The cold, unobserving selfishness of a lineal aristocracy, with its boundless and bottomless wants, and the squalid poverty of the labor-chained millions to support it! If one word, one thought, uttered or printed, is put out in remonstrance, the old tyrant growls and "Get thou off to my hell—my Siberian prisons—and after George Kennan's disclosures, aided by the entire press of our country, we all of us know what that means. And knowing, is it any wonder that we are disgustingly surprised that our freedom-loving America should have a little squad of United States Senators mean enough to meet in secret session and pass an extradition treaty against Russia's political refugees! Must our country be made a hunting ground for the blood-hounds of Russia to chase down free thought? Must we hear her chains clank and her victims moan on American soil? A loud shout goes up to the ear of Columbia thundering "No!" and a protest against the treaty and against the secrecy in which it was passed. It is a shame to the United States Senate, and unworthy of American institutions and methods.

Loose Ireland from the yoke of oppression and starvation and we shall again hear her young men and maidens singing the old songs, "Erin Mavourneen" and "Erin go bragh."

Men can be brutalized by luxury as well as brutalized by want. They will unrelentingly clutch at the meagerest fruits of hungry toil. They may become stunters and deadeners of their fellows who are stived and immured in the bitterest destitution. They look at their own well-limbed bodies and the scantily-fed poor who are toiling to fatten them.

Anyone having eyes and using them may see in all our cities pale, gaunt-faced women with hungry children clinging to their skirts, who sew for scarcely enough to keep soul and body together. In constant fear of of sickness, and eviction if the fingers are palsied or stop for rest, they have not even time to join in the chorus singing the doleful "song of the shirt" which Tom Hood's sympathetic soul gave to the world.

These poor creatures are too often compelled to brace up their starving bodies to the sacrifice by the use of narcotics, and then hope is indeed gone and destruction is swift-footed.

I trust that the cry of these hungry women will yet be heard at the bar of justice, and that the many avenues now open to women will decrease their number. I hope, too, in heaven our robes will not need be fashioned by a class of hollow-eyed, white-lipped sewing angels who starved from earth into heaven. I hope jobbers will have done all their scheming here in the lowlands, and hunger have loosed her fangs from the flesh of my sisters.

We do not forget the toilers in mines, buried from the sunlight, always in more or less danger, crouching with aching backs from day-dawn to day-close for scarcely enough to feed and clothe their families, knowing nothing of luxury, elegance or beauty, little of the society of home or family, or of anything which makes life worth living.

This hunger of soul and body sometimes becomes unendurable, and then we see the half-frenzied strikers rushing forth with torch and knife to avenge wrongs almost untraceable. Blindly they fight, recoil, go back to labor and silently hope for a good time coming. May it come soon, and bloodless!

There is a hunger of the spirit which is even more general and more imperative than that of which we have been speaking, and which is not so easily satisfied. It is the hunger of the soul after truth, and beauty, and all excellence. The hunger for the food upon which it may grow to the divine proportions of angelhood. This hunger is the cause of all religious reforms, and the power which moves the world ahead.

So my friends you may know when you are wanting nothing you are not likely to advance much, but will float sweetly on the billows, dreaming of their music, as your silken-sailed shallop rocks in the breeze.

It is the ones who want something ahead who make the swiftest and bravest sailors on the ocean of life.

It is the hunger of human souls which brought our new gospel into the world. The mentally starving sent up cries to heaven for more digestible religious food. Souls were dwarfed and starved on a poisonous diet they culd not assimilate, so the angels answered the hungry cries of the world.

White angels cleft the airy sea
And said "O, Earth, we pity thee!"

The ceaseless moaning from the vales
Has burdened all thy fragrant gales.

The dripping of so many tears
Has saddened heaven these many years.

Then all the air grew strangely sweet
With chiming of the angels' feet.

Homes full of mourning grew more light
With wavering clouds of raiment white,

And all the air was full of songs
Of Earth's redemption for her wrongs.

Jesus the crucified, the good,
Sang the grand song of brotherhood;

White choral bursts of symphony
Proclaimed mankind's divinity.

Earth's fallen angels, sunk so low,
Peered up through smoky clouds of woe,

And having rent their veils away
They ran to greet the songful day.

Those who were slaves to blighting wrong
Cried: "Lo! of Freedom is the song."

The toiler caught the melody
And cried: "They sing equality!"

Woman who sat with bended brows,
In the draped windows of her house,

Arose, and felt the tides of strength
Throb through her languid-heart at length,

And stepping forward, hand in hand,
With man she murmured: "Life grows grand."

The little children jumped in glee
And cried: "The angels sing for me!"

O, Earth was one grand music hall
Bringing some melody for all.

And yet this heaven-sent beneficence made a great disturbance in theological circles, and one witty writer likened the church to the oldwoman who "didn't" live in a shoe. She who "didn't" live in a shoe lived in a strange old house lighted only by a skylight, and having but one door. Nobody could open or shut the door but herself, and she claimed she could see through the door as if it were glass. She had a great many children and grandchildren who troubled her greatly to know what was beyond the door. She threatened and scolded, but it did little good. One day a knocking was heard on the other side of the door.

"What is that, Mother, a-knocking?"

"Nothing," said she, crustily.

"But we hear it, Mother."

"Nonsense! I don't hear anything."

"But, Mother, are you not a little deaf?"

"I, deaf? How dare you insult me?" I can hear anything there is to hear! Nobody ever knocked on the other side of that door and never will."

"But, Mother, look! the door is opening now—now we can see beyond the door!"

The old lady looked daggers and told them to go away from the door and stop meddling with it.

"But look, Mother, see!"

"I can't see anything and there is nothing to see."

"But, Mother, maybe your eyesight is bad."

"My eyesight bad! That's a pretty speech to make to a woman almost two thousand years old!

"I tell you," said she, "if you don't come away from that door, children, there is a great monster out there which will eat you all up alive!"

The saucy things laughed and said: "The monsters look like Mother, and sister Mary and baby Bess, and brother John, who died and went to heaven. The monsters are only heavenly visitors, Mother."

The old lady went into a dizzy spell, but declared the door was not open, and never could be opened.

She crossed her feet and took a pinch of snuff, having placed her chair against the door.

"Mother! Move away! The door is opening! You will be hurt!"

"Hurt me? Nobody can hurt a woman two thousand years old!"

But the door opened, upsetting the old woman and spilling her snuff. She had a stroke of paralysis, from which she never recovered, but the angels marched in singing songs of joy!

Thus it came with such power as argument, nor persuasion, nor threats, could master. And it has proved a healthy diet upon which souls have expanded into happy and healthful lives.

Sometimes the hunger becomes abnormal, and there is a craving for impossible things, and things which are harmful and demoralizing. We can all recall instances where mortals have relied too much on the aid of immortals and done too little in their own behalf. But the few sad wrecks have taught the lesson of self-reliance to others, and advancement goes on.

The nobleness of life depends upon its consistency, clearness of purpose, quiet and ceaseless energy. All doubting and repenting, when we come down to the strict analysis, are vice as well as misery. You ask, "Must not one repent and hesitate when one can't see one's way?" I say, with emphasis, we have no business to get into any way we cannot see. Our intelligence should be in advance of our acts. Whenever we do not know, we are liable to do wrong.

"But," you say, "not in the dreadful way."

Yes, many times in the most self-destructive way. Think of those who have put aside reason and walked blindly. Do you not recall a ghostly train of ruined souls which it would almost require a crucified God to redeem!

It is not well to turn the angels into nurses to watch us grown-up babies! We need not burden them with what we shall eat, how we shall sleep, who is our affinity, will we die before or after our companion, should they marry again, etc., etc., etc.

This brings to my mind a credulous old soul in New York State, who formed the habit of consulting a certain medium on everything.

One day he went over hungry—to be crammed. She astonished him by telling him his healthy old wife was about to die and his second wife was already chosen by the spirits.

This was indeed startling! But all-believing, he started home and with a wise look in his eye asked his wife which of two cemeteries she would prefer to be buried in, in case she should die.

She looked up with big eyes. "Why, Asa!" she exclaimed, "what is up? I don't think I shall die as long as I am doing the work of seven in the family—washing and all!"

"Wall, maybe you won't," said he, "but Mrs. Little-Brain had a vision and saw you with your hand on the latch of the gate of glory, and she says you said: "Tell Asa Widow Little-Brain's his spirit mate!"

I am happy to inform you that the smart old wife had sufficient strength to root out all that nonsense and lived to attend Widow Little-Brain's funeral.

This age is one of unrest. Every day must have its sensation and its excitement. An appalling instance came under general observation within the last decade, and the two principal parties in this "pleasure exertion," as Samantha Allen would call it, were the two monarchs, William II of Germany and Franz Joseph of Austria. They wanted something sensational and so they planned a long-distance ride from Berlin to Vienna, a distance of four hundred miles, and the conditions of this royal atrocity were that the horses were to be ridden without food or rest the whole four hundred miles, and the winners were to receive prizes from these monarchs.

What was the result?

Nineteen splendid horses lay dead on the road, and as many more died in great agony after making the distance. Count Starhienberg's splendid bay gelding Athos won the first prize, but he died after intense suffering, and one cannot help feeling it would have been better if the brutal count had died and the noble horse had lived. A hunger for excitement and notoriety which would induce two 19th century monarchs to commit such an atrocity makes one cry to God for MEN and not BRUTES to sit in high places.

Another laughable instance of a perverted hunger for excitement manifested itself at Norwich, Conn., one New Year's eve. One hundred sports of that place concluded they would open up the record for the new year by having a cock-fight in an old hotel three miles out of the city. They procured fifteen game cocks, went up into a third story chamber and, having muffled the windows, felt secure and in for a great time. There was also a Law and Order Society in Norwich, and when the show was well started the officers of said society went to the hotel. The proprietor showed them up, and with a loud rap on the locked door, they demanded admittance in the name of the law. Utter consternation seized the sports and every one of them jumped out of the third story windows—a lusty fellow of 210 pounds leading the procession. He was killed by the fall; others had broken limbs, made bruises, and all of the M. D.'s of the city were kept busy to heal the law-breakers. That shows what cowards men will be when they are committing crime. People always pay dear for satisfying abnormal and sinful hunger.

I do not know that these exibitions are worse than a case of another kind which I venture to give you, although it is not a pleasant recital. I make an extract from a letter received—it is only one of many—from a person who was hungry for a sensational career. She was uneasy, fault-finding, indolent; a victim hunter; a parasite who would attach herself to whatever and whoever would feed her—a "sponge" which would absorb without benefit, whether filled with water, milk, or soup, but would spoil for all other use the nourishment at hand. But here is the letter:

Mr. J. K. B———,

Dear Sir:—I am anxious to spend some time in a healthy and cheerful family where I can gather strength and pleasure—I need this and must find it. I am impressed that I have a mission to perform. I do not know what it is to be, but I must change my surroundings. My duties burden me. I shall throw them off at once. My domestic relations are not satisfactory. I am magnetically starved, and would like to go into a family like yours, where I could rest and be developed for my glorious mission. I will say that I have been a lifelong church member—am a Methodist still. But I am not satisfied. I trust, my dear sir, you will answer at once, bidding me come, although I am a stranger to you. If you cannot take me, I will go into any family near you. I will be subject to any dictations you may make to me. If this letter brings no answer I shall keep on writing. Address Mrs. E. Blank,

Lock Box 943. Blanktown, Ind.

This is not a fictitious letter. It is the voice of a hungry woman. A woman who imagines she is magnetically starved, and I have no doubt her husband is leached until he is as thin as a ghost! I presume he longs to die—and who can blame him? I know, if he is a tender-hearted gentleman, he pities the lady he wooed and, alas, won, and who has eaten him, inch by inch, and is now ready for another victim.

But I hope you do not. I hope you have too much good sense to waste sympathy on anything so utterly futile as trying to appease her. You might throw her the peace of your home, the labor of your wife, the fresh, sweet magnetism of your children, your own soul, and still she would be hungry. She begs to enter with her hungry eyes and ravenous constitution into that inviolable heaven of home-peace—the family circle. She wishes the most cheerful apartment, the easiest chair, the softest couch and the sunniest window. The most desirable food must be served to her by the hands which, by prolonged industry, have built the home, sacred to love and purity. She even asks the husband to become her spiritual dictator, and after housing and feeding her, send her off on a career of sickly sensationalism. Such persons, whether men or women, remind one of that contemptible bundle of feathered meanness—the cuckoo—which will not build for itself, but thieves into a nest already made by some nobler specimen of the feathered creation.

They are unworthy of the place they ask in your home, and you have no right to grant it; no more right than you would have to let a starved wolf in among your rosy children to feed upon their tender flesh and bright blood.

I rejoice that the day for such senseless desecration of rights is almost past. I have seen homes, happy as the fabled Paradise destroyed by these hungry people. I have seen wives—true, saintly and divine in their devotion, driven out, loveless and homeless, from their homes by these hungry women. I have seen children robbed of their parents, and their united protection, and sent out crying and lonesome into the world from a ruined home and divided hearts. Carnivorous human vampires have no right to rob children of their natural inheritances. They are robbers of the darkest dye who despoil homes!

Let them rave about the selfishness of isolated homes, and the lack of sympathy in this cold world. It is no fault of yours that they are cannibal in their constitutions. It does not follow that you must stand still and be eaten! The world would be out another honest man, or woman, and nothing gained.

O, hungry world! I would you could be appeased without devouring the weak and helpless!

But in the forest I see the little carnivorous pitcher plant, holding up its pretty cup, half filled with rain and dew, for its innocent winged victims, which, after crawling down into its bearded neck, endeavor in vain to get out, and after fruitless efforts to do so, fall back into a watery grave.

In the blue sea above us I often hear the cry of the little songster as the horny spears of the hawk hush his music and tear his flesh.

The beautiful antelope, drinking at some spring in the depths of an Asian forest, moans in helpless pain as the mighty lion pounces upon him to appease his hunger.

Kings hunger for conquest. They marshal their armies; the fame-hungry officers ride on glittering chargers and cry their orders. The men fight, the wounded reel and are vanquished; widows wail, children cry fatherless and the power-loving despot's hunger is regaled.

The religious fanatic hungers for larger numbers and greater power. He writes his creeds, demands that they be accepted, makes ready his instruments of torture—sword, stake, dungeon, wheel—seizes the heretic, and with the shriek of a protesting soul, and the cry of pain-bleached lips in concession, his hunger is satisfied.

The intolerant Rev. and his trained soldiers of the cross, encounter a stalwart foe in the young giant of Free Thought. They hunger for the legions who rally around him; so they hurl at him missiles of slander and untruth; epithets which blight and anathemas which blacken, and if, in weakness, one of his followers is overpowered and falls, be it strong man or defenseless woman, his hunger is quieted.

But the carnivorous hunger which kills to sustain life is not the kind with which we are endowed. All we ask is to thrive naturally and healthfully, preferring a diet of truth to a hash of poisonous falsehoods—mouldy and tainted—which would turn fresh bright blood into that which is blue and stagnant.

Healthy hunger and bright blood build up angels on earth. Stagnant, blue blood produces men and women who worship a carnivorous deity—hungry for praise and abject obedience; who sits enthroned somewhere in the heart of the heavens, awaiting the supreme moment in which to destroy the major portion of his children.

Hunger is the tyrant which makes the world labor and keeps us all moving. We tire of his orders, but we must obey, for he holds the keys of the vaults of death and oblivion. But we may all be choosers of the viands on which we grow, and may we eschew all that which is poisonous and unclean, eating only the best, until we feast on the bread of divine love in company with the angels in our Father's house, which is eternal in the heavens.

THE NEW YORK CONVENTION.

Interesting Notes of Persons, Work and Incidents, by an Honored Participant.

To the Editor:—In the glow of enthusiasm produced by the success of the New York State Association Convention of Spiritualists, held at Rochester the 7th, 8th and 9th insts., I feel impelled to ask the favor of your columns for some of the details and incidents which cannot well find space in the official report by our worthy secretary.

The weather was ideal—sunshine, balmy air, without excessive heat. Nature had donned her beautiful dress of green, and deferred putting on other colors, in blossoms, until our arrival. Plymouth Church, the newly acquired Spiritualist temple, of spacious elegance, was artistically decorated, and our welcome and entertainment by the Rev. B. F. Austin and his Society was as hearty, as gracious, and as generous as the most exacting could wish, placing us under deep obligation and filling our hearts with grateful appreciation.

Not only were we continually waited upon, favored, and assisted, but the church was at our command gratuitously. The fine choir, accompanied by the excellent organist upon the magnificent organ, favored us afternoons and evenings and on Sunday all day with choice selections abundant in solo and quartet parts. All calculated to inspire the mediums and lecturers to their best and to produce in the minds of the listeners an attitude of receptivity most desirable; and all this for love, "without money and without price."

The attendance was large, the interest intense, and the work accomplished satisfactory. The new board of trustees is composed mostly of the old or former board, and the keynote of harmony so universal heretofore bids fair to lure and lead in the future.

We shall have the same missionary, Mrs. Tillie U. Reynolds, who has so faithfully and successfully conducted the work in past years.

It is hoped that the earnest Spiritualists interested in the advancement of our cause will follow the noble example of our colleague, Mrs. J. H. R. Matteson, of Buffalo, who donates one hundred dollars this year, as she did last year, for the propaganda by the State missionary.

The reports from societies and from the missionary field where, as yet, no organizations have been formed, were most encouraging.

We were favored with masterly and interesting addresses by Rev. B. F. Austin, Prof. Lockwood, Mrs. T. U. Reynolds, Mrs. Clara Watson, Mrs. Gertrude Mudge, Mr. Charles Hurlburt, Mrs. Adeline Cooper, Mrs. May A. Price, Mrs. Clark, Mr. Dell Herrick, and others. Sunday morning the service assumed the form of a symposium where a number of speakers, both old and new in the field, were heard. Miss Sarah A. Woodruff, the State Secretary, recited the following original poem impressively, and it was well received:

(Original poem by Sarah A. Woodruff.)

From over the river they beckon me;
I hear the sound of the crystal sea,
My soul is a rhythm of ecstasy.
For I go to my own.

I leave behind all sorrow and care,
The sigh of anguish, the cry of despair,
All these I remember no more over there,
When I go to my own.

I am tired of toil, labor, and tears,
Of sowing the seed through weary years;
But the harvest will bear me no doubts or fears,
For I go to my own.

I see in the west the waning light,
The day is done, soon it will be night;
I see through the twilight the stars so bright
As I go to my own.

The call will come over the crystal deep,
A bed of flowers, a dreamless sleep;
For one you loved fondly you must not weep
When I go to my own.

The world may not miss me, I shall not care,
When I reach that city so bright and fair,
For angels will meet and greet me there—
I shall have found my own.

Mrs. Margaret Gaule Riedinger, the renowned test medium, was in attendance and her work was startling to skeptics and comforting to the sorrowing. She won all hearts, and her marvelous readings awakened such interest in the cause that the outcome cannot be calculated or estimated. Her popularity was great, and she will receive a warm welcome when we meet again in the same place to conduct the next Annual Convention, for the State Association was invited by the Rochester society to come again next year, and the invitation was quickly accepted.

Miss Floy Cottrell gave marvelous manifestations in spirit rappings, gratifying, electrifying, and mystifying the large audiences.

Among all these glad features of the convention, we were saddened and disappointed by the physical inability of our sister, Mrs. Carrie E. S. Twing, to carry out her part in the program.

Strong combined thought will, we trust, help to restore her to her usual attitude of keen perception, happy expression, and genial helpfulness; let us all join in sending to her our best thought.

At the Sunday afternoon session a most impressive ordination ceremony took place when Mrs. Adeline Cooper and Mrs. May A. Price were ordained to preach the gospel of Spiritualism.

Memory adds to its store in noting the fruition of long-wished-for conditions and the outcome of careful planning, culminating in successful results, as illustrated by this rambling comment on the convention so recently adjourned.

MARRIED AT THE NOON HOUR.

The Services Followed by an Impressive Impromptu Poem by H. L. Chapman.

Married at the bride's parents, at the noon hour, June 2, Miss Rena D. Chapman, former secretary of the Michigan State Spiritual Association, to Mr. George Meyers of Marcellus. Miss Manda Welker, the little niece of the bride acted as flower girl, and followed by the now Mr. and Mrs. Meyers, and Mr. and Mrs. H. G. Welker, sister and brother-in-law of the bride, and Mr. Archie Woods, the justice who performed the ceremony, all wearing their office regalia of the Rebecca Lodge, and Mr. and Mrs. Chapman, they marched to the parlor which had been decorated with flowers and ferns, and where the guests were assembled. The services, in a few well-chosen words, were preceded by a moment of silent prayer. Immediately following the ceremony, Mr. Chapman gave an inspirational poem, as follows:

We will try to tell you a story
Of the days of long,long ago
When the fields were all a wild woodland,
Where grain and the grasses now grow.

And the scene was an open moorland,
A woodland just north on the hill;
From the hill-side out through the moor-land
Ran a beautiful sparkling rill;

And down by the rill in the moorland
Grew a rose-bush so tall and strong,
And the birds, that beautiful morning,
Were chanting their sweetest love-song.

And the sun was shining above us
And the air was balmy and free—
It was then that we found this treasure
The roses were destined to be.

We waited and watched for the roses
Till the buds began to expand,
And to give out the rarest perfume
To breezes that passed o'er the land.

And as we went to them one evening
When the clouds were crimsoned o'erhead,
The roses had caught of their splendor
A blush of the deepest of red.

And this red, red rose is an emblem,
Of a love that is holy and high,
A love that endureth forever,
And never, no, never can die!

We looked at this beauty and wondered
If it could be there all alone,
For it seemed so strange that it should be,
Though others to us were unknown.

And we looked by the foot of the hill,
And we found another one there,
Its leaves were so green and buds so large,
We knew that some beauties were there.

And the buds were ready to open
When we left it just for the night,
And the first bright rays of the morning
Had painted the roses pure white.

The white rose indeed was an emblem
Of true purity, grand and high,
We would that all world folks could live it,
As they will in the by and by.

But once on the brightest June morning,
These roses, the white and the red,
Were touched by a fair angel's fingers,
And lo! the two roses were wed.

And for year after year these roses
Lent their sweet perfume to the air,
And lived out their beautiful message,
Of their love and purity rare.

When we found that another had grown
In the space just between these two,
And its roses were wonderfully fair,
As we saw them sparkling with dew.

And partaking of each of the two,
By nature's eternal decree,
And thus blending the love of the red
With the white, as pure as can be.

And it gave us an emblem so grand,
So true and so lovely, we think,
In this blending of white with the red,
Which gave us the beautiful pink.

And so may your whole lives ever be,
Just as full of love, and as true,
As the red and the white of the rose,
Nature's emblem given to you.

May your thoughts be as pure, and your acts,
As high as your souls can e'er think,
May they blend like the red and white rose
In the rose of beautiful pink.

May the work of your lives ever be
The highest, the purest and best,
So that all those who meet you may know
By harmony true you are blessed.

THE WORLD OVER.

It Is Interesting to Note the Interest Taken in Occult Subjects Everywhere.

The following from the Chicago Examiner affords an illustration of what is going on in the world:

Naples, Italy.—Practically all the leading scientists of Italy have banded themselves into a committee for the purpose of investigating spiritualistic phenomena, and have been meeting in the physical laboratory of Naples University. The famous medium, Eusapia Palladino, has been called in by them, and only scientists have been admitted to the five seances which have taken place.

An official report is to be published by the committee and is awaited with the keenest interest in view of a declaration made by the members in the columns of the Tribuna to the effect that they have been confronted with the existence of a new force, a force of terrible possibilities and superior to any other force yet known.

According to the unofficial statements the results of the seances exceeded all expectations. The most striking phenomena were witnessed and in each case photographs were taken. These phenomena included:

The materialization of some twenty spirits.

The transportation through the air of numerous articles.

The lifting of the medium from the ground by some unexplained agency.

The appearance of many strange lights.

The passage of solid bodies through other solid bodies without leaving traces of their passage.

The mysterious lifting into the air of several members of the committee against their will.

ACTINA" A BLESSING

To Those Afflicted With Eye Troubles.

Every person with impaired eyesight or suffering from weak or diseased eyes should write for our latest free booklet, entitled "Positive Evidence."

The records of phenomenal cures by the "Actina" treatment, as described therein by grateful patients themselves—names and addresses given—will satisfy the most skeptical that "Actina" is not only a remarkable, simple and harmless invention, but restores eyesight even after specialists have pronounced cases incurable.

Following are a few of the successes produced by "Actina," but more fully described in our free booklet.

A Chicago gentleman, after suffering 12 months with inflammation of the iris, used "Actina" a few weeks. He says he can now see as well and as far as anybody.

An Iowa lady writes that after being under treatment of specialists for 15 years, "Actina" completely restored her eyesight and she no longer uses glasses.

Astigmatism and granulated lids impaired the eyesight of a Hartford (Coun.) lady. Specialists failed to cure. As a last resort, against advice of friends, she tried "Actina." She writes:—"For many months I have written almost daily without glasses. No more pain in my eyes and drooping eyelid is restored."

"Actina" removed a cataract from the eye of an Oklahoma lady; relieved the closure of a tear duct for a well known Chicago lady, and in scores of instances people have been able to discard eyeglasses through the faithful use of "Actina." To get an idea of the enthusiasm of our patients the entire letters as printed in our book should be read.

"Actina is made on common sense principles. Its simplicity, effectiveness add lasting qualities will appeal to any one that will investigate. Let us send you one on two weeks' trial. Use it as often as you please and if you are not benefited, or for any other reason are dissatisfied, send it back and no charge will be made. Write today. The Psychic Riddle.

By I. K. Funk, D.D., LL.D., Editor-in-Chief of "The Standard Dictionary," Author of "The Widow's Mite, and Other Psychic Phenomena," "The Next Step in Evolution," etc.

A book full of psychic suggestions supported by startling experiences, all told in a wonderfully conservative way. It harmonizes with the judgment pronounced by The Review of Reviews, New York, on the author's previous publication of this subject: "A very sensible, cautious, level-headed piece of work all through;" and also with the judgment on the same book pronounced by the Cleveland Record: "There has never been so fair and painstaking a book put forth on this subject as this one." Price, $1.00.

THE LEADING WORKS OF E. D. BABBITT, M. D.

The Principles of Light and Color.

Superbly issued, royal 8vo, with over 200 engravings and colored plates. Price, $3.00; in massive binding, imitating half Russia, 50c. extra. "An imposing volume of nearly 600 pages. Shows a great amount of research on the part of the author. Will prove a great acquisition to Scientific Libraries."—N. Y. Herald.

Human Culture and Cure.

In six parts, five parts being already issued.

PART I. The Philosophy of Cure, including Methods and Instruments: 75 cents.

PARTS III and IV in one volume; $1.00. Part III treats of Mental and Psychological forces; Part IV of the Nervous System and Insanity. "This work discloses for the first time the chemical mystery of mental phenomena, throws the first clear light upon the nature and processes of hypnotism and all kindred psychological phenomena which have never before been explained or understood. Dr. Babbitt has here not only given the rationale of hypnotism, psychometry, clairvoyance and mental science, including the mysterious subject of memory, but has furnished abundant illustrations of their working. The student of Phreno-physiognomy alone is of priceless value as enabling us to understand our fellow beings around us."—Prof. W. C. Bowman.

PART V. "The Bodily Organs, their Diseases and the Great Natural Methods for Their Cure," aims to be the most practical work on healing thus far given to the public. Price, $1.

Health and Power.

Brief Natural Treatment for 110 Diseases. Price, 35 cents. "Worth its weight in diamonds."

SOCIAL UPBUILDING. Paper, 15 cents.

RELIGION.—A most thoughtful and excellent work. Price, cloth, $1.10; paper, 60 cents.

ANTIQUITY UNVEILED.

The most important revelations concerning the true origin of Christianity. Reader, in bringing to your notice "Antiquity Unveiled," it is with the sincere hope that you are earnestly looking for the truth, regardless of any other consideration. If such is the case, this advertisement will deeply interest you, and after reading this brief description you will doubtless wish to give the work a careful perusal. Price, $1.50.

A MASTERLY WORK.

Continuity of Life a Cosmic Truth

By Prof. W. M. Lockwood.

A masterly presentation of an important subject. A powerful argument along new and scientific lines, establishing on a scientific basis the fact of the continuity of personal individual consciousness selfhood after laying aside the physical body. A book of rare value. With several fine illustrations. Cloth, $1.00.

Origin, Development and Destiny of Man.

A Scientific and Philosophical Treatise, by Thos. P. Fletcher.

The Origin of Meteors and Comets; The Organic Kingdom; The Origin of Man; Man—His Attributes and Powers; The Soul—How it Receives and Imparts Knowledge; How the Soul Receives Its Highest Impressions; The Record Book, or The Heavenly Ether; How to Cultivate the Sixth Sense; The Finer or Spiritual Body; Growth and Degeneration; Morality. Spiritualism Proved by the Bible; The Bible and Christ; The Summary; "What Must We Do to Be Saved." For sale at this office.

Price, cloth, $1.00. Paper 50c.

ASTRAL WORSHIP

By J. H. Hill, M.D. A valuable contribution to the current discussion of religious problems. The author by illustrations and a planisphere (a representation of the celestial sphere upon a plane with adjustable circles), traces most of the myths which lie at the base of Christianity to their origin in sun and star worship. The astronomical facts given possess great value, the illustrations rare and curious. The book is bound in only one style—heavy boards. Price $1.

HEROES AND HERO WORSHIP, AND THE HEROIC IN HISTORY.

By Thomas Carlyle.

A remarkable book by a remarkable man. Marked by terse strength and vigor, deep thought, philosophy and dramatic tensity of earnestness. A notable literary effort. A fine edition in cloth. Price 50 cents.

General Survey.

The Spiritualistic Field—Its Workers, Its Work, and General Progress, the World Over.

THIS GENERAL SURVEY DEPARTMENT IS ONLY INTENDED TO CHRONICLE THE ENGAGEMENTS AND WORK OF SPEAKERS AND MEDIUMS. A REPORT OF WHAT THE VARIOUS SPEAKERS SAY WILL NOT BE PUBLISHED, AS WE HAVE NOT SPACE SUFFICIENT FOR THAT PURPOSE.

KEEP COPIES of your poems sent to this office, for they will not be returned if we have not space to use them.

The Song Cards for sale at this office at $4 per hundred, by mail $4.50, are the help you need in society work.

W. V. Nicum, prominent as lecturer, writes: "In this day of combines and through a culmination of circumstances I expect by the 1st of July, 1907, to withdraw from the commercial world, for a time, at least, in which I have been engaged for years; therefore I shall be open for engagements as lecturer, either for itinerant work or a permanent engagement of six months or a year. I hope the time will come ere long when associations will engage speakers or mediums of their choice, and keep them long enough to show their worth and give them a chance to build a Constructive Spiritual Church, which means in time a spiritual Spiritualism. Address me at my home, 631 River street, Dayton, Ohio."

Mrs. E. L. Nicholson, a cultured lady and a most excellent medium, late of San Diego, Cal. was in the city last week. She will visit Lily Dale Camp.

George B. Warne lectured last week at Sturgis, Mich.

E. R. Fielding writes from Washington, D. C.: "Harrison D. Barrett will remain in Washington most of the time during the summer. The home of Mr. and Mrs. Wm. Bakman was the scene of a very happy event, it being the birthday of Mr. Bakman; he was surrounded by his children and grand-children. Beside his family, those who came to do him homage were, Mr. and Mrs. M. T. Longley, Secretary N. S. A., who made some congratulatory remarks. Harrison D. Barrett, President N. S. A., spoke kindly words to the dear brother; others followed. Mr. F. A. Wood, our genial president of the Joint Association, M. H. Steinburg, Mr. Allen Hodge of Lynn, Mass, and others, followed with remarks. After a few musical selections by Mrs. Blanch Bakman Brown of Baltimore, Md., and Bertha and Lloyd Bakman, and Beulah Emmerson, refreshments were served, and with god wishes to the host and hostess, we all departed to our homes. Mr. Keeler, the slate-writing medium will dpart for his summer home at Lily Dale, about July 1. He will be accompanied by his wife and son, Earl. Mrs. Holly, sister of Mr. Keeler, has departed to her home in Brooklyn, N. Y. Mrs. Mary Keeler of 1343 Euclid avenue, will spend a portion of the summer at Lily Dale, accompanied by her daughter, Maude. The Temple League meets every Wednesday evening, at the home of Mrs. Farrow, the President, No. 50 M. street, N. W."

Mrs. Laura G. Fixen delivered the opening address at the Paducah, Ky., Chautauqua. She has also lately lectured at the Kingfisher, Okla., Chautauqua. Last Sunday she lectured in Kansas City, Mo., and then on to Atchison, Kansas.

A very pretty home wedding was celebrated June 12, at the residence of the bride's parents, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Steggall of Owosso, Mich. The contracting parties were Thomas N. Veit of Indianapolis, Ind., and Miss Nellie May Steggall. Mrs. A. E. Sheets closed the meeting June 9, of the First Spiritualists' Society, of Jackson, Mich.

Samuel A. Huntington of Malden, Mass., writes: "Mrs. M. A. George, of Boston, was the speaker and message bearer on Sunday evening, June 16. Mrs George chose for her theme "The Cross," giving a fine address, filled with Spirituality, love and sympathy. After the conclusion of her address she devoted an hour to giving many fine messages. Mrs. George, although young in years, is a fine medium. Oliver Thomas Newcomb of Boston, will be the speaker and message bearer on the 23rd, and Mrs. Annie M. Coggeshall, of Lowell, Mass., on the 30th. Our Sunday evening meetings will be discontinued through July and August, but the Thursday evening and 11 a. m. and 3:30 p. m. Sunday circles, will continue through the summer."

Mrs. S. V. V. Booth writes: "Mrs Fannie Spalding of Norwich, Conn., has been speaking for the society of Hardwick, Vt., for three Sundays. The meetings were held in S. V. Hall, both afternoon and evening. The charming personality of Mrs. Spalding, and the beautiful and instructive lectures given by her guides, have done much to deepen the interest in our town in the Religion of the Angels. The tests given by her little Indian control "Ulla," were well received. We trust the time is not far distant when she can again serve our society."

Mrs. C. A. Thompson writes: "The Fraternal Daughters held their semi-weekly meeting, Wednesday, June 19, at the home of Sister Jennie S. Adams. The afternoon meeting was taken up with readings, by the following mediums: Mrs. Dr. Caird, Mrs. H. Lichtig, Sisters J. S. Adams, Knapp, Minor, Bloom, Howes and Brother Traver, and Thompson. They served supper at 6 p. m. for 15 cents a plate, which was a credit to the society. In the evening we had a "snipping" party, which was attended by a very nice crowd of friends, who showed their appreciation of the untiring efforts of Sister J. S. Adams, who had her home decorated very artistically with orange and green streamers, and every one seemed to be very much interested in trying to see who could get the best "snip" when blindfolded. When our meeting came to close we were able to add another good round sum to the treasury of the Fraternal Daughters. Our next meeting will be held July 3, at the home of Sister Roe, 1151 West Monroe street, at 2:30 p. m. On this occasion we are going to have what we call a "Black-Bird Pie," party. Come and bring your friends, and have a Fraternal Good Time, or as Brother Dr. T. Wilkins said a few weeks ago, "Let us all get Fraternalized."

BEAR IN MIND that the editor of The Progressive Thinker is in no wise responsible for the views expressed by contributors. He may, or may not, agree with their respective views.

J. R. Bruer writes from Sterling, Kansas: "May I take the opportunity of speaking a word for your splendid paper? It is eagerly waited for, and when it arrives our hearts are made glad, our minds enlightened, and our souls strengthened by the experiences and lessons therein portrayed. You are reaching the multitudes, and not only touching the great souls of humanity, but making conditions that these millions of unfolding souls may better manifest the philosophy of philosophies, the science of sciences, the religion of religions."

Georgia Gladys Cooley is home again for a short season of rest. She cannot rest long, however, for she goes to fill an engagement in Michigan, on Sunday, June 30. She proposes to spend he glorious Fourth of July round about these parts, with friends. Good mediums do not find much time to rst; the people are so hungry for spiritual food. The people of Decatur, Mich., claim her promise to preside at a grove meeting on the above date, and the perfect success of the occasion hinges upon her and her corps of guides.

A. F. Lee writes from Meadville, Pa.: "Mrs. Georgia Gladys Cooley has just finished a very successful series of lectures here, followed by messages. Her work has been excellent, she holding the large audience that greeted her at each meeting so still you could hear the proverbial pin drop, showing she was greatly appreciated by all. Her messages were all recognized. She has, as on all previous occasions, added a number of new names to our society, and started many more to investigate the grand truth of Spiritualism. It is with regret we learned of her intended trip to New Zealand, and thence onward around the world; but we must not be selfish, as others have a right to her time as well as us, as she will do a good work in whatever field she may choose to go. We wish her a safe and prosperous journey, and await patiently the time for her return."

Mrs. Maud Lord Drake is in Chicago for a few weeks, stopping with her daughter, 16 St. James Place, and will shortly return to her home at Boulder Creek, Calif. Mrs. Drake has been doing a great work in New York City, speaking to crowded halls every Sunday.

A. F. Hill writes from Boston, Mass.: "Boston Sunday Newspapers often publish stories about spirit manifestations. One newspaper that is part of a two million circulation on Sunday, usually has one or more articles about Spiritualism There is no patent right on the manifestations called Spiritualism or Spiritism. Clergymen of several creeds in Boston, including some of the Roman Catholic and Episcopal churches, are teaching about spirit manifestations to great audiences. Truth has prevailed. We should proclaim about true spirit manifestations; by such, victories are won."

J. L. Mussena writes: "The First Church of Spiritualists in Williamsport, Pa., has been enjoying excellent treats in the lectures of Mrs. R. W. Barton of Rochester, N. Y. for the last six weeks. Her messages have been recognized as true.

Dr. T. Wilkins writes: "The Elgin Picnic was a grand success from start to finish. The early morning rain had laid the dust along the line of that splendid interurban electric line and cooled the atmosphere too a high degree of appreciation. About 200 people were on hand at the dinner hour and partaking of the good things they each brought and spread upon improvised tables on Condon's lawn in the rear of his home, and which extends to the very banks of the grand old Fox River. Dinner served and the physical man replenished with tea, coffee and that pure spring water bubbling up at the foot of the hill, and the soul feast was spread before us. George B. Warne, as chairman, began in his pleasing manner with a few well-chosen words of encouragement and cheer for the outlook of the Cause in Illinois and in the nation. His address was well received, as were those which followed. As we kept no notes, and memory seems to be somewhat deficient regarding names, we should perhaps omit them entirely, but will say that Brothers MacDougal and Merritt, of Genoa, Georgia Gladys Cooley, Mrs. Isa Cleveland, Mrs. Weaver, "Mamma" Bloom, Mrs. Susie Thompson, Dr. Cross, Dr. Caird, and others gave either short talks, or messages, and your humble poetical servant, the writer, a poem appropriate to the occasion, which will appear next week. There were others who took part whom we will be pleased to mention when the names can be furnished. But suffice to say, everybody enjoyed the outing, the physical and spiritual feasts, with satisfaction only expressible in their smiles and silence. A beautiful location and a beautiful vibration of soul force, mingled with the sweet songs of the native birds made the day one long to be remembered.

Mrs. Lole F. Prior, the eminent lecturer, after a wonderfully successful visit to Australia, writes to us from 1608 Fourteenth Ave., Seattle, Wash.: "You will be surprised to hear from me in the West. I am back in Seattle, Wash., again, in charge of the First Society, which I served for two years before I went to New Zealand. I reached New York on the first of May, where I found letters which caused me to go at once to Logansport, Ind., where my oldest daughter was very ill. Continued poor health confined me to the house, and as soon as she was better we started at once for the West. On the 21st of May, I was in Chicago, but remained only three hours, which was too short a time to call at the office of The Progressive Thinker. I was sorry to have been unable to do so."

Mrs. M. A. Congdon writes from Hood River, Ore.: "Inclosed find the price of another year's subscription for The Thinker. I am lost without it; it has woven itself into the web of my life so that the pattern is not complete without it. It is a map to me also, showing the topography of the spiritual world to a rare degree, for by it we trace the rugged mountain ranges, the silvery streams, the full-breasted rivers, the restless oceans and outline the continents of thought. There are the trends upward and downward, inward and outward—all making the history of the day, of the epoch in which it is our good fortune to take part. Success is assured. We have banished fear."

Emma Ellis writes: "The social of the 'Band of Harmony' was held at the home of Mr. and Mrs. L'Hommereu on Thursday last. As usual the weather was fine and a very delightful time was had. The afternoon was given over to cards and beautiful prizes were awarded. In the evening a musical was given. Special mention is due the daughter and son of the hostess, who sang some fine duets. A number of selections were read by members of the 'Band,' and altogether a perfect time was had. Too much cannot be said of the efforts of the hostess and family to make everyone have a delightful time. It was decided to hold the next social at the home of Mrs. Stone, 331 York Street, Elmhurst, on Wednesday, July 3, from 3 p. m. to 8 p. m. The card game will begin promptly at 3 o'clock. Prizes; supper at 5; return trip to city 8 o'clock. Everybody is invited to come for a good time."

GROWING OLD.

We may follow all "directions" that that the Doctors give for health;;
And may make the wise selections, in accordance with our wealth;
We may hie to warmer climates to escape the Winter's cold;
Yet, with all of these protections, we will find we're growing old!
We may eat the choicest viands that the markets can afford;
And may drink the purest liquors that e'er graced the festive board;
We may wear the finest garments that were ever bought or sold;
But with all of these provisions, we will still be growing old!

kq t,.reet..at" h bm bm bmm
We may guard our passions even, to keep us free from sin;
We may pray to God in Heaven, that no devils enter in;
We may have the true religion, that is better far than gold;
Yet, with all of these provisions, we still find we're growing old!
We may try to keep in training with this moving world of ours;
While we feel our progress waning with decreasing strength and powers;
We are loth to "put on glasses;" but the tale is quickly told;
As time so swiftly passes, and leaves us growing old!

They may say "old age is honored,"
but I fail to see it true;
Except with favored geniuses, who number but a few,—
Who bring the world great blessings by their labors strong and bold;
Yet fame and sweet caressing will not save from growing old!
Yea, growing old!—I ponder, if "three score years and ten,"
Is time enough to wander and gather earthly ken?
I soon must journey onward to the higher, better fold;
Where all the lambs are gathered,
and never more grow old?

* * * * * * * * * * *

Will the angels note my query, and the spirit life unfold?
As I am sad and weary with thoughts of growing old!

A Spirit's Reply.

Since you desire an answer to your query at the last;
I come, a spirit, messenger, who hath the portal passed,
To give you my opinion of existence farther on,
In Nature's grand dominion (as far as I have gone);
The great eternal mansions of which you often hear,
Are Nature's vast expansions, we enter sphere on sphere;
And as we gain the graces our developments unfold
We change our forms and faces, and thus discard the old!

Our progress here is measured by an inward true desire,
And a corresponding effort to mount
the ladder higher;
A gradual ascension is assured by works of love,
And each succeeding mansion that we enter is above
The former lower station that for a time we hold,
And thus by transformation we are casting off the old!

No graceful form is changeless in these angelic bowers;
A constant metamorphosis goes on among the flowers;
That which was first material; where all forms must begin;
Becomes a form ethereal, to clothe the life within;
With nature's law prevailing in all celestial spheres;
And matter never failing through endless years and years;
We're sure of a provision adapted to our mold;
And in the realms elysian have no fears of growing old!
But what we may become through progression, sphere on sphere,
As one of olden-time hath said, "It doth not yet appear!

The Grand Ledge Camp, Michigan.

Grand Ledge, Michigan, Spiritualist camp meeting opens July 21. The speakers and mediums engaged this year are among the best known on the Spiritualist platform.

The programme for the forenoons, Sundays and Mondays excepted, will be varied and interesting, consisting of mediums' meetings, conferences, etc. Mediums who are developing, as well as others, will have an opportunity to participate. These exercises are a great aid to those expecting to take up the work.

The fact that Oscar A. Edgerly is being engaged for the fourth season as speaker and chairman of our camp is sufficient warrant of his congenial and affable manner as chairman and entertaining and instructive as a speaker, to insure the successful direction of our present camp.

Mrs. A. E. Sheets, our former president and chairwoman for many years, is so thoroughly established in the hearts of the progressive and initiated public mind that the mere mention of her name as the first speaker upon the list is an agreeable insurance of intellectual eminence in spiritual ethics and oratorical pleasures for the opening session. Her homely welcome to each and all will be a cordial and sympathetic feature in the social environments of the camp.

Mrs. R. S. Lillie, known throughout the length and breadth of America as the "Queen of the Rostrum," is comparatively a new speaker with the patrons of Grand Ledge Camp, but who has been in the spiritual field since (nearly) the advent of modern Spiritualism, but because of the unremitting demand in other fields for her labors have we been unable heretofore to secure the services of this far-famed oratress. That her inspirational gems of thought will be a delightful treat is forecast in her presence with us.

Elizabeth Harlow, who was a new speaker with us last year, proved to be one of our best and will be with us again. She comes highly recommended to the management as having been long in her appointed vocation of saving souls to higher and brighter spiritual aspects of life here, while the future of eternity will take care of itself, and none should miss hearing her.

Mrs. A. Atcheson, of Buffalo, N. Y., with us last year for the first time, is a very good and true message medium, has acted as pastor of a Buffalo Society for several years and is highly recommended by them. She will give messages during the greater part of camp. They are always convincing and to the point.

Geo. A. Letford, known from North to South as the Drummer Medium, and one who has done some wonderful work in Georgia and Florida, where he travels, and has made the South more liberal toward Spiritualism, will also be in attendance and follow some of the lectures with messages.

Spiritualist, skeptic, and all friends are cordially invited to attend Grand Ledge Camp. Remember the date it opens, July 21st, lasting until August 18th. Don't fail to attend.

Letter From an Iowa Worker.

To the Editor: "I have just closed my long season of engagements in Iowa, and have again returned to this beautiful city, where I feel so at home.

I have from time to time noticed in The Thinker columns articles from our worthy president, Harrison D. Barrett and others upon commercial Spiritualism, and I am sure I comprehend all these earnest writers refer to; but on the other hand, I don't quite agree with them in some respects, and for this reason: Supposing a gentleman or lady calls a mouthpiece for the immortals, and asks only business questions, and the spirit in reply answers those queries most accurately, and the recipients are benefited by advice previously given, and would this be commercialism? I fail to see it in that light.

Who are our friends, and what are they if they cannot guide us aright in all things pertaining to the material, for we certainly cannot live without the material necessities? I do not believe in any medium peddling his or her wares, merely for the almighty dollar, as do, I am sorry to say, the majority of so-called mediums; but there are few, very few, who are honorable, who can not earn a living on account of the floating and greatly advertised fakirs, who know how to bring the separated together, and sell charms to young ladies that they may catch a lovely young Adonis.

And what are some of these charms made of?

Why, a piece of white wax sewed up in a rag; and these poor dupes pay from $2 to $5 for them.

Do you wonder, friends, that people hoot at us, and call us all kinds of vile names? I don't; and I think it would pay the N. S. A. body to send out one or two agents to travel and report all such as the above to the Chief of Police in every town, city or hamlet, and ask them to fix a set fine on all who practice this nefarious work under the name of Spiritualism. It would not take any great sum to do this, and in that way, while we as Spiritualists could not stop their side-show business, we could get them out of the ranks, for when a license is imposed upon all such people, of $10 or $15 per week, as Cedar Rapids, Iowa officials are going to do, or have done, I am sure there will be fewer of them. Then we, as Spiritualists, will be recognized as being what we try to represent ourselves to.

I was pleased to read the article written by Dr Warne upon the imposing of fines upon all dishonorable workers.

The time for camp life and work is near, and we will all be glad to clasp the hands of old friends and new ones on the beautiful grounds of Mt. Pleasant Park, Clinton. I have not only heralded the glad spiritual tidings in my travels for the past nine months in this state, but shouted the joyous news that Mt. Pleasant Park is one of the most beautiful camping grounds on earth, and might be compared to some of greater worth in spirit life. Such beautiful and refreshing air! water unexcelled, Elixir of life. Everyone wearing a smile that won't even come off long after we go to our different homes.

I am pleased to note the extra fine talent the Clinton Association has engaged for this season, and more pleased to note that some of the city divines are to lend a helping hand on our platform. I wish all my home city friends all the joy and blessings that can come to them.

PASSED TO SPIRIT LIFE.

[Obituaries to the extent of ten lines only will be inserted free. All in excess of ten lines will be charged at the rate of fifteen cents per line. About 7 words constitute a line.]

Clarence Delote of Muskegon, Mich., passed to spirit life at the age of 37, June 17. Unmarried, therefore greatly missed by an aged mother. He was a kind-hearted man, and loved by all who knew him. The services were conducted by Mrs. Jennie Martin.

Mrs. Mary A. Ingram passed to spirit life June 14, at Springfield, Mo., aged 74. She was a Spiritualist from the early days of the movement, and always had the courage of her convictions. Her gentle nature and saintly character commanded the love and respect of all who knew her and her funeral was attended by a host of friends of all shades of belief. Services by the writer.

W. F. PECK.

Passed to the higher life, Mr. Richard Blocker, on May 25, 1907, in his 60th year. He gave up this earth life by drowning, in trying to save the life of eleven-year-old Chauncey Moody, who also lost his life. Mr. Blocker was a life-long Spiritualist and one of the charter members of The Psychic Society of Apalachicola, Fla., organized last April. He leaves a wife and two sons. MRS. A. JETER.

Passed to spirit life, Mrs. Alice Morris, "Our Alice," wife of Geo. W. Morris, in Dallas, Texas, June 8th, 1907. Transition services were conducted jointly by Mrs. Isa Wilson Kayner, and Mrs. Carrie M. Hinsdale. Mrs. Morris was one of those good true women, whose life leaves a legacy of good to all who knew her. Many beautiful floral offerings attested the esteem of friends and acquaintances.

TWO IN ONE

A COMBINATION OF

"The Question Settled" and "The Contrast" Into one Volume.

BY MOSES HULL.

This highly instructive and interesting work is a combination into one volume of two of Mr. Hull's splendid works. By this arrangement the cost is such that the reader is enabled to secure the two books combined at the same price as was formerly asked for them separately. This volume contains 462 pages and is handsomely bound in cloth, and contains an excellent portrait of the author.

THE QUESTION SETTLED

Is a careful comparison of Biblical and Modern Spiritualism. No book of the century has made so many converts to Modern Spiritualism as this. The author's aim, faithfully to compare the Bible with modern phenomena and philosophy, has been accomplished. The adaptation of Spiritualism to the wants of humanity; its moral tendency; the Bible Doctrine of angel ministry; the spiritual nature of man, and the objections offered to Spiritualism, are all considered in the light of the Bible, nature, history, reason and common sense, and expressed clearly and forcibly.

THE CONTRAST

consists of a critical comparison of Evangelicalism and Spiritualism. It is a most able production, and is a perfect storehouse of facts for those who wish to defend Spiritualism, or find arguments against the assumptions of Orthodoxy.

Discovery of a Lost Trail

BY CHARLES B. NEWCOMB,

Author of "All's Right with the World." Cloth 370 pages. Mr. Newcomb made a distinct success with "All's Right with the World," which continues in the front rank of the Metaphysical books that are now so popular. The great number who have been cheered and strengthened by him will welcome another book by the wise teacher whose words of help are doing so much to make the world better by making men and women better able to understand and enjoy it.

"Discovery of a Lost Trail"

Is a simple study of that strange and beautiful thing called life, but grand in its scholarly simplicity. It will be in demand by many who have not previously read metaphysical writings. Price $1.00. For sale at this office.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

This department is under the management of

HUDSON TUTTLE.

Address him at Berlin Heights, Ohio.

NOTE—The Questions and Answers have called forth such a host of respondents, that to give all equal hearing compels the answers to be made in the most condensed form, and often clearness is perhaps sacrificed to this forced brevity. Proofs have to be omitted, and the style becomes thereby assertive, which of all things is to be deprecated. Correspondents often weary with waiting for the appearance of their questions and write letters of inquiry. The supply of matter is always several weeks ahead of space given, and hence there is unavoidable delay. Every one has to wait his time and place, and all are treated with equal favor.

NOTICE.—No attention will be given anonymous letters. Full name and address must be given, or the letters will not be read. If the request be made the name will not be published. The correspondence of this department has become excessively large, especially letters of inquiry requesting private answers, and while I freely give whatever information I am able, the ordinary courtesy of correspondents is expected.

HUDSON TUTTLE.

H. E. Brown.—Q. How are moving pictures obtained of such scenes as burning mines, bands of Indians pursuing scouts under a running fire, a burning ship, or a battle? Evidently no one with a camera could be present at the critical moment.

A. The pictures are taken from fake representations, often necessarily elaborate and expensive.

M. E. Holzemer.A. This is not an answer to a question, but a card of thanks. Not to myself, but the invisible authors of the book, I give the praise, yet the fraternal words of appreciation are priceless, as showing that my endeavors have not been in vain. Often I have thought of the writings cast on the wide tide of publication, that they were lost in the wash of floods, and found no resting place, and bore no fruitage. When, however, some glad soul writes that he gathered up the fragments in some out-of-the-way place, and was spiritually nourished thereby, no greater reward, no greater joy, can come for the labor.

Hence I thank friend Holzemer for his kindness in writing to me: "I have read the Arcana of Spiritualism, and am reading it again. I find it the best soul-food I ever tasted. Truly it is an inspiring book for a new recruit as well as an old soldier."

J. C. Reed.—Q. I believe you claim for your answers that they are mainly received from a spiritual source, and usually I have no fault to find with them, but in the light of scientific evidence, and the communications from many alleged spiritual sources, it seems to me that the position taken that the planet Mars is not inhabited is not warrantable. You or the spirit writer in answering a question on this subject ignore the almost demonstrative character of the "canals" which the telescope reveals on that planet, which, as great channels for irrigation, show unmistakably that they were planned and excavated by beings who think and act like ourselves.

A. The so-called "canals" on the surface of Mars have been a source of speculation since the increased power of the telescope presented them to sight, and the speculations as to their origin have been as wild as erratic fancy could devise. Their regularity seemed to indicate a designing intelligence; and with this idea came the many fictions based on the belief that the planet was inhabited by beings like man, but,of course, greatly superior.

Our correspondent is mistaken in saying that it was said Mars is not inhabited. It was said that it could not be inhabited by beings like man, for the conditions would not allow the evolution or sustenance of such things.

Of the canals it was said if they were excavated for irrigation, they were made out of all proportion—too large—in fact their size forbids artificial origin. The query of this correspondent is quite opportune, for recently the question of the canals has been settled in a manner that brings all the preceding theories and spirit fiction into ridicule. The existence of these canals has not been altogether a certainty with many astronomers, and have been made most of by the imaginative professors, who, on the outskirts of the science, attempt to popularize it and captivate their readers with stunning assertions. It has been reserved, however, for Professor Douglass of the University of Arizona to show that the grand irrigation system,' so much exploited, is an "illusion of the vision." Of his conclusions it is said: "We see to-day astronomers of world-wide eminence basing a theory of habitibility of a remote planet upon a series of optical phantasmagoria, destitute of all objective reality, and resulting from so simple a thing as a fixed stare, or position of the head as the eye scrutinizes its own vain imaginings through a tube. Not only are there no canals on Mars, but there are no markings on the planet of the sort made familiar by recent text-books." All these are appearances caused by defective structure of the eye, and the "halo" which comes from steady gazing.

The astronomer who thought he saw a spot on the sun, because of a speck of dust on the lens of his telescope, was not more deluded than these canal seers.

Of course it does not follow that Mars is uninhabitable because there are no canals there; but it does follow that all the fancies about the disappearance of water, its gathering in ice caps on the poles, melting in the long summer, necessitating vast irrigation ditches to bring it to the fields, and the wonderful civilization said to be fostered by and around them, have no more reality than a dream.

J. S. Taylor.—Q. What credence can be given the prophecies of Spangler, largely published in the New York papers?

A. The same that is given the vaunt of ignorant and crazy persons. The dark and sad side of the picture is the fact that leading newspapers publish with stunning headlines such inane stuff. The editors know full well how absurd and untruthful the matter is, yet because of its sensational character it is given wide space, and the public led to believe that the rot has importance.

The publication of prophecies of terrible disasters, as earthquakes, tornadoes, pestilence, etc., which are simply fancies of those seeking notoriety thereby, is little short of a crime. There are a multitude yet of ignorant, and hence superstitious, people, who believe what they see in print, and are greatly disturbed thereby. Newspapers profess to be public teachers, and directors of public opinion. If so, they should exclude the whole race of Jeremiahs as charlatans, whose influence is only pernicious.

H. A. Varga.—Q. Do premature births and monstrosities retain existence after physical death?

A. To this question an answer is given by the following quotation from a spirit-writer: "A spirit is not necessarily immortal, but can become gradually extinguished, like a lamp burning for an indefinite time and then going out. Such is the condition of the lowest races of mankind. They may exist after death; but with them there is no progress, no desire for the immortal state, and slowly they are absorbed into the bosom of the universal spirit-essence, as the spirit of the animal is immediately after its death. * * * If it be asked at what age the spirit of man retains its identity, it might be replied that no certain data can be given, for it varies with development. The answer depends on circumstances—the degree and cause of idiocy." To the premature born the same applies, it being a question of how far development has advanced from the animal to the spiritual plane. The line between the mortal and immortal—or better, the continuing—is not sharply drawn, and yet is of impassible strength. To pass it requires a certain development, which is not of easy definition to mortal comprehension.

The necessity of such a line of demarkation is apparent, when we consider that without it there would be no stopping place in the limitation of continued existence until the invisible germ, which is the beginning of being, is reached, and the absurdity and consequences of this supposition are its own refutation.

A GOLDEN SHEAF.

To Our Friends: — October next will bring the 50th anniversary of our marriage, and nearly the 55th of our labor in the field of Spiritualism. In the first years we published a volume, "Blossoms of Our Spring," thinking that should the time come in the autumn of life, we would have a volume fitting the occasion of the closing years, of fruitage. A half century has almost gone by, and this 50th anniversary gives the occasion for the issuance of this volume, which we have entitled A GOLDEN SHEAF. It will be made up of selections from matter not before published, in prose and verse; selections of the best sentences and paragraphs scattered through our various books; a new spiritual song with music; illustrations of fac simile automatically written manuscripts; photogravures of our home, birthplace, and brief autobiographical sketches

We propose to make the book in paper and binding as superior as the price, $1.00, will permit. Every copy will be numbered and contain our autographs.

The number of copies will be strictly limited to the number of subscribers, and the book will not be placed on sale after publication. As we have reached the conclusion to publish at a somewhat late date, if you favor the undertaking you will confer a favor by sending your name, by card or letter, at once (the price is not now wanted).

A list of names of subscribers will be published in the volume.

We thank you beforehand for your favor in inviting our book to your homes.

MRS. ANNA GILLESPIE.

A Cordial Reception Extended Her in California.

To the Editor:—A few lines from San Francisco to let your readers know what we are doing here. We are trying to regain the foothold we had before the great fire and quake. Every Spiritual hall was destroyed. Hundreds of Spiritual homes were also destroyed, and families divided, but with it all we are slowly rising to our proper station, and in good working order.

There are many mediums in this city, all busy and doing well; also many societies in a flourishing condition.

One of the first to rise out of the ashes was the "Ladies First Spiritual Aid Society." They were gathered together by Mrs. T. Johnson, at whose home they met, for nearly a year, with Mrs. A. Sexon as president; Mrs. T. Johnson, secretary and Mrs. Paul, treasurer. As the membership grew, interest became stronger, and this body of noble women set about to secure a hall, and invite the general public to hear the phenomena and philosophy of modern Spiritualism.

With the election of the new officers, this move was carried out, with Mrs. Ella York, president; Mrs. Agnes Secord, secretary; Mrs. Nettie Riley, treasurer, and the remaining six members of the board.

The past three months afternoon meetings have been held by circle and platform test mediums, and in the evening lecturers have occupied the rostrum. Let me say right here that all work done for the cause in this way has been done free of any charge by our mediums, and each one has done good work. Membership is gaining and finances growing, and we hope ere long to be compelled to move to larger quarters.

All the business meetings of this society are held each Wednesday at 2:30 p. m.

Mrs. Anna Gillespie, formerly pastor of the People's Church, San Francisco, is now in California in connection with the National Lyceum work. She occupied the platform in the evening of June 2d, and with her sympathetic and instructive lecture drew us all nearer to her, and her good guides, who gave us many beautiful messages. We hope to have her again with us on June 23d, when we propose to give her a rousing welcome and an all-day meeting, so that her friends, far and near, may meet and greet her.

As the guest of the "Ladies' Aid," Mrs. Gillespie was tendered a reception and welcome home on Wednesday, June 5th, at the residence of Mrs. Ann Sexton, vice-president of the society.

Friends of the dear sister presented her with beautiful California roses; in fact, flowers of every variety were showered upon her, and their beauty and fragrance were admired by all. Again we were delighted with the grand talk our dear sister gave us in reference to the work in the far East, and also listened with pleasure to the spirit guides "Alice" and "Buttercup," who were glad to meet with us, and seemed to enjoy it all as much as the audience did. It was a beautiful day and a beautiful time. Every little detail had been carefully attended to by the hostess, Mrs. Sexton, so that we all felt beautiful. Covers were laid for thirty, and all enjoyed a delightful repast, and when the big cake was cut (which was made in honor of Mrs. Gillespie), and each person presented with a piece, all joined in declaring it a day long to be remembered.

Last, but not least, several members of the Lyceum were present to do honor to their former teacher and conductor, and sang to her songs and recited to her recitations. The presence of these children made the heart glad, and all felt it was indeed a day of rejoicing and gladness. With three cheers for Mrs. Gillespie and her guides we said, "au revoir."

ELLA YORK.

San Francisco, Cal.

Rev. J. E. Roberts, of England, Versus a Class of Young Men in Columbia University.

Preacher Roberts says: "I would say that if I were convinced that the Bible was a myth, and that there was no life hereafter, I would not think it worth while to restrain my lowest and most natural passions."

We sincerely hope he libelled himself on that occasion. We don't like to think of him as being as bad as he describes himself. But if he tells the truth about his own character it is easy to see what he would be at. He reminds of the title of an old play—"She Would if She Could"—which, as Dr. Johnson said, needs little explanation. Mr. Roberts would if he could. He is only restrained by the hope of future reward or the fear of future punishment. Without that restraint he would wallow in sensuality. We venture to remind him, however, that there are other restraints. Human society, without troubling the lords of heaven and hell, will take care that he is kept under some control. His "lowest passions" might suggest an act that would lead to twelve years' penal servitude. Surely it might be "worth while" to practice self-restraint if only to avoid that unpleasant experience. We hope the reverend gentleman's head (letting his heart alone) is equal to this simple calculation.—London Free Thinker.

Now hear the young men speak for themselves. The faith of a class of students in the Columbia University, New York City, was put to the test not long ago, according to the newspapers, by the propounding, among others, of the following question:

What difference would the non-existence of God make in our daily life?

Thirteen of the young men said it would not make the least bit of difference in their daily lives if they had not heard of God.

One bright young fellow was candid enough to say, while admitting there was probably such a being in existence, if God did not exist he should feel a greater responsibility for his acts, and have a greater fear of doing wrong.

The words of the young men are in great contrast with the emotions and moral make-up of the Rev. J. E. Roberts. I have heard clergymen in my own country say the same things. Surely, their religious education must have been defective. Goodness should not depend on religion, but religion should be nourished by goodness.

Historically, atheists are among the best people in the world—men and women. Adam Smith, author of the "Wealth of Nations," said: "Hume, the atheist, was as near perfect as the frailty of human nature would permit." John Stuart Mill was called the Saint Atheist. When a clergyman blurts out, "Blank Atheism," what do intelligent men think of his ability and research. A. A. BELL,

Good Workers Appreciated and Successful Work Done.

On Sunday evening, June 16, we had the pleasure of having on our rostrum A. Scott Bledsoe and wife, of Topeka, Kan. Mr. Bledsoe has been president of the Kansas State Spiritualist Association the past six years, and is a man of great power and ability. Etta S. Bledsoe is the most gifted psychic it has yet been our pleasure to know. Four years ago Sterling Spiritualist Society was organized by Mrs. Bledsoe, and from this little band of faithful workers have issued good reports. Two splendid inspirational speakers have here unfolded their powers and have ministered unto this society Sunday after Sunday, and have received as their compensation the friendship of the members and the knowledge that good was being done. One other member has developed trumpet work in the light, and another has great healing powers. A number of others have been enabled to unfold clairvoyance and clairaudience.

Mr. and Mrs. Bledsoe, along with other workers, are proud of the good work done here. We have been the banner society of the State every year until this year, when Wichita showed a little larger membership. During the four years we have rented a hall and held meetings EVERY SUNDAY the YEAR AROUND, except twice we gave way to other meetings. We have welcomed the workers who came among us, and the compensation we have given them has always been satisfactory. We have had two delegates and two other members at our State convention every year. We always pay expense of one delegate.

Last October we were represented at the National Convention in Chicago by a delegate who is an inspirational speaker. We have ordained one minister, christened two children, sent aid to those we felt needed our aid and were worthy. We have always been in line with organization and have done whatever we could for the good of the cause and labored always in harmony with those outside our own circle. We have had a speaker two years on the program at the State convention. This same speaker has been employed at various camps over the State.

In a city of two thousand two hundred people, with some fifteen churches and religious organizations, we have toiled on patiently trying to sow the good seed, and while our members are few, and our growth slow, yet we feel sure the harvest will be great by and by. We feel we owe much of our success to Mr. and Mrs. Bledsoe, as we have been constantly in close touch with them, and often when weary in soul their words of encouragement came and we were inspired to go on.

The I. O. O. F. hall last night was packed, and in the ante-rooms standing room was at a premium. In the majesty of her magnificent powers Mrs. Bledsoe stood before us, with a face radiant with divine light, and poured forth words of inspiration, truth and beauty, that burned into the hearts of her hearers. The rapt attention of her audience and the intense silence in the room were the highest tributes that could be paid this splendid worker. As the magnet attracts the steel, so this marvelous psychic attracts unto herself the highest and holiest in the thinking realms of human and spiritual spheres.

The audience gave expressions of appreciation by an unusually large collection. Mr. Bledsoe followed in his usual forceful way. As an orator he has few equals. The words he speaks are eloquent and to the point. His addresses always of the solid and philosophical. He is a free thinker, untrammeled by creed or abject reverence for antiquated myths and unreasonable dogmas. He speaks the truth as it appeals to him, without fear or favor. His fearlessness often causes him to be criticised, misunderstood and misjudged.

We regret that we were unable to have them longer in our midst, yet are grateful that as they journeyed westward they tarried with us a little while and left a blessing for each soul. They go from our midst, but our good thoughts and wishes shall follow them. The souls they have fed shall not forget the good they have done, but shall follow in their pathway and gently nourish the seeds they have sown, that a rich, ripe harvest of truth may result. We hope to have Mrs. Bledsoe for a month or six weeks in the fall, to carry on the good work here while Mr. Bledsoe will be engaged elsewhere. Spiritualists should be proud of these splendid workers, and we who know them best send them on their way with a prayer for Godspeed. We know the blessings of the angels will follow them. J. A. BRUER, Interpenetrating Spheres.

The theory of the interpenetrating spheres is this: The infinite universes interpenetrate each other, and birth and death are but transition from one to the other. Within the cell is the nucleus; within the nucleus, the nucleolus; within the nucleolus, all latent powers of the cell which give birth to other cells, with all their powers of increase and reproduction.

Quite a reservoir of energy in this microscopic universe. Death, then, would simply mean the casting off of one of the old shells, or the adaptation to the next interpenetrating sphere. We can neither comprehend the coming or going, as we can see no farther in the one direction than the other. All we know is, that life comes into and departs from our present sphere. It is no harder to believe that it continues than to realize it had a beginning.

We know that matter is composed of atoms in a state of motion, the rates of vibration determining the forms of matter.

Then we suppose that different spheres are simply forms of matter with differing rapidity of vibration, inter-penetrating each other like light and sound, Hertzian waves, etc. It is no harder to believe in interpenetrating spheres than to realize that the tones of the different instruments blend into harmony of orchestra.

DEMONSTRATED FACTS.

They Prove the Continuity of Life of Conscious Entity.

Demonstrated facts, and what are they? To my mind they are that which applies so palpably to our senses as to be a reality; and in all ages, ancient and modern, there are and have been things transpiring which are steadily leading every thinking and investigating mind into broader fields of knowledge, and each fact having its bearing and worth, helping humanity to a better understanding of those things pertaining to their material welfare; and also there are facts being demonstrated to our senses that interest us in that which is beyond the material, called the realms of spirit, for as all things that are visible here to our senses seemingly fade and pass away, where do they go? The materialist says that is the last; and upon what authority does he make such an assertion? For demonstrated facts have proven that what is called death does not end all.

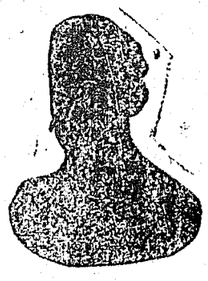
We are living, intelligent entities, here upon this sphere, having an organism through which we can express that intelligence one to another, and it occasionally transpires that intelligence is given here to mortals that is only known to them; and as time passes away leaving only living, intelligent entity occupying the human organism, who was in possession of said intelligence, would ask under what other hypothesis can that knowledge be gained by another earth mortal, except in and through spirit communion, and such information gained proves a continued existence of that intelligent entity, once in the human organism on this sphere of existence, but who has passed to the realms of spirit, according to natural laws, and has the ability to make known to another loved one on earth that which was only known to themselves and the one in earth life between whom this fact or experience co-existed or was known.

That fact was what transpired between my father and mother just before she passed to spirit life, and he said no one knew what that was but himself and her. And the last time I saw my mother in earth-life was about six weeks previous to her transition, and I have that knowledge given me by my mother now in spirit life. I have a letter from my father acknowledging the correctness of same. This is only one of many facts that have been given me from the realm of spirit, demonstrating to my senses beyond a doubt the reality of a continued existence and that loved ones and others can come to us bearing messages of cheer and advice to help us in our struggles through life.

Another fact was the receiving of a message between two closed slates, from my mother, through the mediumship of an entire stranger. I held the slates firmly in my grasp, the medium also holding the edge of the slates. I could hear the writing going on, and the conditions were such that only some unseen intelligence could accomplish that which was produced through the closed slates, the message containing that which pertained to my mother's family, and a statement that has since been verified.

Another fact was this: Upon showing these slates and messages to a medium many miles from where it was obtained, the statement was made to me that the next time I had a sitting with that medium I would get a message from my daughter, and a flower, which was fully verified to me some three weeks later, and in broad daylight, between the hours of 9 and 10 a. m., being the next sitting I had with the same medium, the message from my daughter being in fine handwriting, and on the other slate a message in coarse handwriting with Charles Foster's name signed.

The question arises: How did that medium miles away know that I would get a message from my daughter, unless she was told so by her, who had passed to the realm of spirit?



At another season given by the controlling intelligences of a reputable medium, three names were given me of those who had passed to another life, which I understood and recognized, also the controlling intelligence said there was the form of a young lady standing back of me with arms around my neck and gave the name of Nettie, which was the name of my daughter. The medium did not, to my knowledge, know her name, and the expression of arms around my neck was the last greeting and expression that she gave me while she was in the physical sphere of existence of earth life. The medium did not know, of himself, that this was the last expression my daughter gave me.

Another fact, demonstrating the intelligence of an individual entity who has passed to the realms of the great beyond, was at the instance, a while ago when I was invited into a seance in an acquaintance's home, and when I entered the seance room the medium, a gentleman, was under the entrancement of an intelligence, and when time was through, then my mother gave expression to me through the mediumship of the gentleman, proven to me as my mother's individuality by the demonstration presented to me, and was absolutely correct as given to me by my mother in her last farewell expression to me the last time I saw her in the physical form, no one in the room knowing the facts of the case but myself and my mother in spirit. Such are demonstrated facts to me; they may not be fully realized by others, yet each one in life may gain the fruitage of equally correct demonstratoins if they will but give the time and opportunity for the intelligences to manifest and make known their identity. There are many facts which I could relate, but time and space does not permit. These facts are conclusive to me, but not as real to others as their own individual experiences would be, but through honest investigation they can for themselves seek and find; knock and the door of truth shall be opened and to you will be revealed the knowledge which cannot be gainsaid, if you will be honest in your investigation and seek for the truth, like attracting like. Open the window of your soul and let the eternal truths be demonstrated to you that continuity of life is a fact and a part of nature's law of universal force in the existence of each individual entity, and to each one who grasps a realization of these great truths there will follow in due course of things results which will bring the possibilities of home, happiness and heaven. Wanderings of the Hull Pilgrim

My previous communication to The Progressive Thinker was written in the same room and by the same window where the arisen Hull Pilgrim sat when he reported for the same paper the last journey of his earthly wanderings. I had not thought to tarry so long ni San Jose on my return trip, but owing to the fact that the Spiritualist Union had been disappointed in the lecturer they supposed they would have for May, I occupied their rostrum May 5, 12 and 19. It was pleasant to meet again the many friends who had grown near and dear during the long sojourn in that city during the earlier weeks of my great sorrow.

My good friend joined me the week previous to my departure from San Jose. On the morning of the last Sunday I spent in that city, Mrs. C. A. Thompson, an old and dear friend, formerly of San Francisco, now of Berkley, went to San Jose to spend a little time with the writer, and to bid her good bye before she left for her home.

My good friends at 230 North Sixth Street (where Mrs. Kelso and myself were made "at home"), urged Mrs. Thompson to remain until the morning when Mrs. Kelso and myself would start on our Eastern journey. She did so, and on Tuesday a. m., the 21st ult., accompanied by Mrs. Barker and Mrs. Ringlep, and little Opal, the trio took the train for Oakland.

To the Hull Pilgrim the hour of going was a sad one. As the long train pulled away from the station, where a few months before the two pilgrims, full of hope and courage, had been greeted by Mrs. Barker, a tidal wave, bearing upon its crest sorrowful memories, swept over the soul of the one pilgrim turning homeward without the strong, helpful companion the mortal. In spite of all the knowledge that was hers, that though alone she was not alone, the satchel and the typewriter on the seat before her, carried on the Western journey by hands now cold and dead, were sorrowful reminders of the loneliness that must meet her when she reached the home he left so reluctantly last November.

Dear reader, whoever you may be, you may say such thoughts are inconsistent with our philosophy; that to the one who has the knowledge that "death does not end all," there should be no admission of sorrow; that an indulgence in grief because a dear one passes to the realm of souls is the sign of weakness; be it so. I lay no claim to consistency. I know, however, that I am in a material world; that since my advent upon this plane of existence I have found it necessary to adjust myself as a mortal to material conditions. I know I have loved the mortal presence of my loved ones, and have seen beauty in their eyes. I have imagined angels' voices were echoed through theirs. I have thrilled at the clasp of their hand, and when those dear ones who have made conditions in earth-life so beautiful have been suddenly removed from outward vision, I HAVE MOURNED THEIR PHYSICAL ABSENCE, because I am still mortal, and cannot as yet live apart from material conditions.

Notwithstanding the seasons of grief I have, and will in time to come experience, I am assured that in the same proportion that sorrow hurts my heart in the breaking up of material conditions, it will THRILL with joy when I shall have moved out of the material world, the mortal, and I can enter into the soul realm and become, after a time, adjusted to those conditions amid which the invisible loved ones dwell.

We were exceedingly favored the day we tarried in Berkley. Through the kindness of Mrs. Thompson and a grandson, we were given a most delightful ride over the Berkeley University grounds, which are of world-wide fame. We had the privilege of leaving the auto when we reached the spot where by a little climb we could have a full view of the magnificent Greek theater. As I stood on the eminence and looked at that immense, massive structure, and tried to imagine the effect of the thousands on thousands as an audience, gathered under that sky-roofed amphitheatre, the circling seats crowded, and the wonderful stage aglow with art, and the actors unrivaled in grace and portraying in every movement "the poetry of motion," as did the Grecian masters, and as I stood thrilled, and awed, it seemed to me every whisper of the wind brought to my ears the echoes of the immortal souls of invisibles who, for aught we know, might at that moment be engaged in rehearsing "lines" no mortal ever could interpret.

The hours were passing; we could not linger. After a few hours of rest, and breaking bread with our Berkeley friend, we boarded the Overland train on the Santa Fe. As our section on the Tourist had been secured, we were soon enabled to retire, and when morning dawned the travelers were a long distance from the dear friends who had been so closely associated with the pilgrim's work during the past four months and more.

Our objective point on this trip was Longmont, Col. We arrived on time (a strange occurrence, compared to late experiences), and after a short carriage ride, were left at the beautiful Health Home, at Sandstone Ranch. The climate at this point in Colorado is wonderful in its healing and recuperative qualities. It seemed as though I could not get enough of the air, especially at night. Some of the patients sleep in tents. Mrs. Kelso and Mrs. Coffin each have cosy quarters on an ample screen porch, where they spend their sleeping hours. They arise in the morning with the spirit and agility of girlhood. The inmates of the Sandstone Home do not count age by years.

So many pleasant yet unexpected things had been woven into my experience of the last two months I had thought that nothing could surprise me, but when I was informed, after a sojourn of a few days among these good people, that our daughter, Mrs. Niver, had been invited to visit the Home, that she might have a few days of visiting and sight-seeing. Of course the main reason for making it possible for the dear little woman to take the trip was that the Hull Pilgrim might have company on her lonely homeward journey. Mrs. Niver arrived in due time. She remained four days.

Tuesday a. m., the 11th inst., we bade our good friends at Sandstone Ranch good-bye and started on our eastern journey. We spent a greater portion of the day in the hospitable home of Mrs. May, 2939 Gilpin Ave. I considered myself extremely fortunate on this occasion, as I had the privilege of spending the afternoon in company with Mrs. Emma Jay Bullene. This lady's name was familiar to Spiritualists in the early days of the movement; she had few equals among the defenders of our cause.

Although Mrs. Bullene's voice is seldom heard from the rostrum in these days, she is not an idle woman. The hours spent in her society convinced me that she has been a growing woman all these years. As a psychometrist she is remarkable. I asked her to give me something of her experience when she was writing her remarkable book "The Psychic History of the Cliff Dwellers." Mr. Hull read every word of that book to me on our Western trip. I thrilled as I listened to portions of the history. It was even more thrilling to listen to Mrs. Bullene as she related her marvelous experiences as a psychometrist during the writing of the book.

We left our Denver friends in the early evening and resumed our journey. My arisen companion had so many times assured me that my homeward journey would not be as lonely as I had thought it must be, and he spoke truly. His beloved daughter, Alfareta, was my companion from the Sandstone Home.

Dear readers, the "Wanderings of the Hull Pilgrim" have for the greater part been made amid the shadows during the past five months. I have at last reached the home place. Can you imagine just how it seems to the one pilgrim who enters the home alone, yet not alone?

Would you think by this time the writer of these lines would feel disheartened and desire to drop the work? That would be my feeling at this writing were there naught but the material world open before me. I am weary and lonely, but my spirit was never more allied to the work than at present. Angels in the flesh, as well as in the spirit, have ministered unto me. These dear ones seem countless, as I cast a retrospect.

To them all I would send my grateful thoughts from my home. No written language can express my appreciation and my love to those who were so helpful when the great sorrow came. May I continue faithful to the end. MATTIE E. HULL.

Whitewater, Wis., June 16, 1907.

AN AUDIENCE OF 2,500.

They Assembled to Hear Eula Wilson Lecture—She Claims She Went to the Spirit World and Saw God (Probably a Spirit Only) and an Immense Audience Assembled to Hear Her Relate Rer Experience.

According to the Wichita (Kan.) Eagle, over 2,500 people were present at the Nazarene Mission the evening of June 11, to hear Eula Wilson, the 15-year-old girl who was so miraculously healed. People began to arrive before dark, and by the time the girl began to speak the street in front of the little mission on East Murdock avenue, Wichita, was crowded to the opposite curb and up and down the street for a block each way.

It was soon seen that it would be impossible to accommodate the multitude inside the house, and the girl spoke from the steps. She spoke of her experiences in a clear voice, and seems to be rapidly regaining her health. Her remarks relative to her death, ascension to Heaven, and conversation with the Lord [merely a spirit whom she regarded as the Lord] secured close attention from the crowd, which was awed by the strange story.

The girl's voice quivered with excitement and she appeared to be rather taken aback by the large number of interested listeners. Many who went to hear her talk were filled with doubt as to the manner in which she regained her health, but came away convinced that Dr. Burton spoke wisely when he said the case was undoubtedly out of the ordinary.

Local physicians who have been interviewed on the subject declare that the girl was in a sort of trance when she is said to have ascended to Heaven, but concerning the recovery of her health and eyesight they have no explanation to give.

Miss Wilson is a frail but handsome girl, and when she appeared before the awaiting crowd her face was very pale, naturally so, perhaps, because of her long illness.

Here we have an illustration of subjective mediumship. Eula was undoubtedly entranced, and was allowed to see some of the wonders of spirit life. She saw a spirit whom she would naturally recognize as God. She also saw angels with wings—the drapery. Her experience only exhibits the kaleidoscopic character of what different persons see on traversing spirit life. DIVINE WRIGHT.

SELF-CONTROL.

Its Necessity In All the Walks of Life.

On account of the importance of this subject it needs careful study and clear analysis, for self-control means far more than many think. In order to obtain it in its beauty, grandeur and fulness, it is necessary to have a clear insight into things generally, and to know not only self, but others; in fact, one should know human nature. In order to attain to real self-control it is absolutely necessary to reach that individuality whereby we can prevent others from influencing us by either words, thoughts or actions, and at the same time have our own desires under absolute control.

One of the surest signs of self-control is to be found in remembering and respecting the rights of others as being of equal importance with our own. If this just and natural law were always in force, fully understood and practiced by every one, there would be no need for man-made laws, for everyone would be a law unto himself, and instead of laws being written upon the pages of a book, they would be indelibly written within the lives and hearts of humanity. If every individual's rights were held as being of equal importance with the rights of every other individual, there would be no necessity of so-called courts of justice. Neither would there be any occasion for judges or jurors, to blunder through trials of their fellowbeings. Everyone would seek justice by being just to every other person. Everyone would admit the rights of every other person by simply attending to his own affairs and permitting all to have their rights without question.

It is my honest opinion that the entire human race will yet attain to this glorious height of mental, moral, physical and spiritual unfoldment; then, and not till then, will all have peace, harmony, happiness and perfect health.

Kansas State Convention.

Seventh Annual Convention of the Kansas State Spiritualist Association.

In the parlor of the Fifth Avenue Hotel, at Topeka, Kan., June 6, there assembled the officers, workers, delegates and visitors, to renew old acquaintances and form new ones. A very enjoyable evening was passed because of the happy, harmonious vibrations that filled the air. At a late hour the friends reluctantly said good-night, to meet on the work of the convention.

Friday afternoon, June 4, at 2:30, the meeting was called to order by President A. Scott Bledsoe of Topeka. Mrs. Grace Clark of Topeka, favored us with a beautiful piano solo, which was appreciated by all. Owing to the absence of the Secretary, minutes of the previous meeting were not read. After the general conference and short talks by various workers and delegates, the following committees were appointed: Credentials, Resolutions, Amendments, Ways and Means.

Report of committee on credentials was read and accepted, the following societies being represented: Winfield Camp; First Spiritualist Church of Topeka; First Church of Winfield; First Society of Cedarvale; First Spiritual Society of Wichita; First Society of Sterling; First Spiritualist Society of Hutchinson.

Committee on Amendments made the following report: Recommended that Article III, Sec. V, be amended to read: "That the convention may be removed from Topeka and be held in any town or city that the Convention may decide upon from year to year." The question was discussed, after which a motion was made and seconded and carried by unanimous vote. Meeting was then adjourned until Saturday, 3 p. m.

Friday evening at 8 o'clock, the meeting opned with selections by Calkins' Orchestra. The vibrations of sweet music sent forth by these excellent musicians filled each soul with melodies that echoed and re-echoed, and gave power and inspiration to the speakers.

The President's Annual Address by A. Scott Bledsoe, was a masterpiece in itself. Human hearts were touched and made tender; and as the eloquent words flamed from the lips of this gifted orator, so the tears fell from eyes that beheld "The vision splendid." To move the hearts of humanity to visible expression reveals but a little of the man's power. On all sides were expressions of approbation. The angel friends truly had drawn very near the President in his hour of ministration and co-operation with the angel world, and those to whom the words were addressed were purified, strengthened and uplifted.

The address was followed by an exquisite piece of music by Calkins' Orchestra, which impressed more deeply the truths just spoken.

Dr. Montoya, a new worker in the field, followed with a short address, which was well received.

Another splendid selection by the Calkins Orchestra followed by the benediction by A. Scott Bledsoe closed the evening session.

Saturday, 3 p. m. Meeting was called to order by the President, and a soul-stirring piano solo rendered by Mrs. Grace Clark, who is our faithful one, having served at each previous convention.

Report of Committee on Resolutions was read and adopted as follows:

Whereas, Modern Spiritualism has been with humanity for fifty-nine years and Ancient Spiritualism throughout all time. It means a knowledge of the spirit world and man's relation thereto.

Its beginning made a deep impression on the human mind which has continued to grow until its propagators and defenders number many thousands, therefore be it

Resolved, That the Kansas State Spiritualist Association in Convention assembled urge every Spiritualist to use every righteous and honorable means to its promulgation and we ask every society and each individual to co-operate in a plan of work to place this truth where all the world can see and understand it.

Resolved, That we stand for mediumship and we ask each individual to sift, strive and ever search for the best in the philosophy and phenomena of Modern Spiritualism.

Resolved, That we are forever opposed to fraudulent practices in mediumship, and urge that every society throughout the State employ no medium or worker unless they are members of regular societies in standing with the State and National Associations.

Resolved, That we advise a state circulating library of spiritual books and papers especially suited for beginners as well as those for the Sage.

Resolved, That we endorse and will help to sustain the Morris Pratt Institute of Whitewater, Wis., and other similar Institutions throughout the United States.

Resolved, That we denounce all laws tending to restrict or hinder the practice of mediumship and healing.

Resolved, That we endorse the action of the Legislature in repealing the barbarous law of capital punishment and believe that crime should be treated the same as other diseases.

Resolved, That we thank the officers of the State Association for their efficient work during the past year, for the State Associaation and for the cause in general; we thank the press of Topeka for the kindly interest it has taken in our work and especially the speakers of this convention.

ETTA S. BLEDSOE,
MISS E. E. McCARTHY,
Dr. JOSE MONTOYA.
Committee.

of Winfield, that nxt convention be held in Wichita.

Motion made by Mrs. Josephine Bruer of Sterling and seconded by W. J. Voss of Topeka that the next convention go to Sterling. The result of the vote was a victory for Wichita. Sterling lost by 17 votes.

Following letters of congratulation and good cheer were read from Wm. E. Bonney, Bassingstoke, England, John F. Maxwell, Minneapolis, Minn., Harrison D. Barrett, Washington, D. C., Geo. W. Kates of Pennsylvania, and a telegram from Inez Wagner, Kansas City, Mo. A letter from Geo. W. Kates was read urging every Spiritualist to assist in the Temple Fund. Ten members in convention responded with one dollar each for membership. Other letters of business were read and referred to the Board.

Then came election of officers for the ensuing year.

Following officers were elected: President Mrs. Bessie Bellman, Winfield; vice-president, Dr. Jose Montoya, Wichita; secretary, J. A. Bruer, Sterling; treasurer, Jacob Hey, Overbrook, Kan. Trustees, H. W. Henderson, W. P. Sailing, Ella Wingett, N. F. Shaw, H. F. Kranshur.

There being no other business, meeting adjourned to meet in Wichita the first Friday in une, 1908.

Saturday, 8 p. m. Meting opened with several selections by the noted Calkins Orchestra, after which Miss E. E. McCarthy addressed the audience. With the wisdom of a sage this speaker presented her philosophy in a way that the simplest mind could easily understand, and held the attention of her listeners, and drew unto herself the praise and admiration of all.

Following her came Mrs. Bessie Bellman, a sweet little soul, frail in physical strength but great in spiritual power. The name of this worker always brings forth an audience of eager friends, and by her logic and eloquent appeal for truth she not only endears herself to each, but creates a spiritual vibration that is uplifting to all. Dr. Jose Montoya followed with psychic readings, which were eagerly received. The messages are as the water which we drink, as we eat of the bread of life. A splendid piece of music by Calkins Orchestra followed with a benediction, dismissed the evening session.

Sunday, 3 p. m. Although the weather was unfavorable a goodly number of interested friends gathered again in Security Hall to enjoy more of the special feast. The subject for discussion was, "What Has Free Thought Done for the World?"

Mrs Josephine Bruer, Bessie Bellman, A. Scott Bledsoe and E. E. McCarthy were the speakers on the subject, and each in a forceful way gave forth thoughts of beauty and words of inspiration. A combination of splendid spiritual power was manifest, and the rapt attention of the audience bespoke of the power of the spirit, that silences every soul save the one most inspired. The conclusion of each speaker was that Free Thought has created of a desert world a world garden, where the weeds of superstition, error, wrong, injustice and slavery, had been supplanted by the fragrant flowers of wisdom, knowledge, understanding, justice, truth and liberty of soul.

The services of the afternoon was indeed a lesson that each soul gratefully received, and was completed by the many excellent tests given by Mary G. Shaw, after which occurred a simple yet beautiful ordination of Dr. Jose Montoya, by A. Scott Bledsoe.

Sunday, 8 p. m. A heavy storm had gathered and burst upon us just at the hour of the evening session, yet brave hearts faced the elements of the air to eat again at the table of truth.

After a number of musical selections exquisitely rendered by Calkins Orchestra, Mrs. Etta S. Bledsoe stepped forth in all the splendor of a queen to wield her sceptre of truth. As the sun that radiates its warmth and light kisses to life and draws unto itself all of the good and beautiful in nature; so this splendid speaker sends forth scintillating vibrations of the highest and holiest in the spiritual philosophy.

After a magnificent address, Miss E. E. McCarthy followed with a number of tests that were recognized.

Mrs Bledsoe followed Miss McCarthy with messages that were equal in truth and power to her lecture.

Next came the installation of officers, and was a short, but impressive service. A. Scott Bledsoe, in his usual forceful and eloquent manner made a short address to the officers and friends which was heartily applauded. Mrs. Bessie Bellman, the newly elected President, responded in words well chosen, paying high tribute to the splendid work of President Bledsoe in years gone by, extending to him the thanks of all for his noble efforts to uplift our glorious cause and uphold our excellent workers. The blessings of many hearts will follow him and his splendid wife in their new fields of labor.

The attendance throughout the convention was not so large as usual, but the harmonious conditions existing were perfect. Every session moved along like clock work, and we are glad to report not only the best convention in one way, but in every sense it was a grand success. Financially we are in the best condition we yet have known. During the year three new societies were chartered, two ministers ordained, and a number of new members added to the local and State Association. We have ten ordained ministers in good standing who are working together in one purpose and with one spirit for the advancement of the most beautiful philosophy known to-day. We extend greetings to all associations and societies and trust that we may strengthen and be strengthened by co-operation with mortals and spirit friends. Reluctantly we turned our footsteps homeward at the close of one of the greatest spiritual feasts that yet has blessed us. J. A BRUER,

Secretary Kansas State Spiritualist Association.

UNIVERSAL SPIRITUALISM

Spirit Communion in All Ages, Among All People—by W. J. Colville.

This work has two distinctive features: (1st) A resume of the Spiritual faith and practice of Egypt, India, Persia, Greece, Rome, China, Japan, and other ancient nations, not excepting Europe during Christian centuries. (2) A summary of recent experiences in America, Great Britain, Australia, France, Germany, Italy, and other modern lands, all tending to show the persistent continuity of spiritual revelation. Clairvoyance, Telepathy, and Psychic Phenomena in general is dealt with in separate chapters at the end of the volume, making it a highly useful textbook for all who are interested in the great question of human immortality. The Author says: "The libraries contain a large number of extremely valuable works dealing with every imaginable phase of Spiritualism and occultism, but I have searched in vain for a single portable volume, issued at a popular price, which gives a brief and lucid statement of the claims made in all ages and in all countries on behalf of the mighty truth of communion between inhabitants of earth and dwellers disrobed of flesh in the one vast spiritual universe. The enormous and ever increasing interest in "Psychic" problems and the eager, constant demand for historic information coupled with a rational setting forth of intelligible spiritual philosophy, has led me to appear once again before the public with a book." Price $1.00.

OUR CHILDREN.

Hints From Practical Experience for Parents and Teachers.—By Paul Carus.

In this little book "Our Children," Paul Carus offers a unique contribution to pedagogical literature. Without any theoretical pretensions it is a strong defense for the rights of the child, dealing with the responsibilities of parenthood, and with the first inculcation of fundamental ethics in the child mind and the true principles of correction and guidance. Each detail is forcefully illustrated by informal incidents from the author's experience with his own children, and his suggestions will prove of the greatest possible value to young mothers and kindergartners. Hints as to the first acquaintance with all branches of knowledge are touched upon—mathematics, natural sciences, foreign languages, etc.—and practical wisdom in regard to the treatment of money, hygiene and similar problems. 207 Pages. Price, cloth, $1.00.

OCCULT WORK.

Trying Ordeals and Spirit Influence—Curious Illustration of Occult Force.

An important historical sketch of the practice of judgment by ordeal is contributed by M. Caesar de Vesme to "The Annals of Psychical Science," being, in fact, a chapter from a "History of Spiritism," which M. de Vesme has in preparation. Taking this article as a sample of the forthcoming work, we are glad to recognize that "the spiritistic hypothesis" is treated with conspicuous fairness, and as one which "cannot be set aside, and ought to be admitted, at least for the present, as possible." We state this with all the more pleasure as we recently had occasion to criticise some of M. de Vesme's arguments.

The article shows that ordeals have existed among primitive peoples all over the world; they are commanded in certain cases in the Mosaic law, and are mentioned in the Vedas. The practice of causing an accused person to walk over hot iron or between blazing piles of wood, to take a pebble out of a cauldron of boiling water, to drink poison, or perform other dangerous feats without being harmed, as a sign of his innocence, is widely spread, and instances of innocent persons having safely passed the test are numerous and apparently well authenticated. Other ordeals are in the nature of suggestion: a guilty person is unable to swallow ordinary food, or he is choked by it; others again appear to be of the nature of the phenomena observed in seances with mediums. The witch-finding test of throwing a suspected person into water is one of these, and a variation of it is that of weighing a person against a Bible. In both cases a great diminution of weight is reported in certain instances, so that the accused either floated on the water like a cork, and could not be submerged, or else was found to weigh almost nothing.

Another phenomenon which is described by M. de Vesme is the finding of an accused person by abnormal means. The case of Jacques Aymar and his divining rod, mentioned by Professor W. F. Barrett in his recent address, is set forth at some length; and a somewhat similar occurrence in Thibet is described by a Russian traveler, M. Tsherepanoff:—

"The Lama is able to find lost articles by following a table which moves before him. He sits on the ground in front of a little square table and places his hands on it, at the same time reading in a Thibetan book; at the close of half an hour he gets up and lifts his hands off the table, keeping them in the same position. The table is levitated at once; the Lama stands up, raises his hands above his head, and the table rises to the level of his eyes. The Lama moves and the table moves with him, advancing in front of him in the air with such increasing rapidity that the Lama can scarcely keep pace with it; finally the table falls to the ground. The direction in which it has chiefly moved indicates that in which the lost object should be sought for. In the case of which I was an ocular witness it moved a long way, more than thirty yards, and the lost object was not found at once. But in the direction followed by the table there was the hut of a Russian peasant, who committed suicide, and the lost articles were found in the hut."

Other alleged facts in the nature of ordeals are "citations to the tribunal of God," in which a person unjustly condemned to death summons his judge to meet him in the other world within a certain time; and the "judgment of the corpse," founded on the belief that contact with the murderer caused blood to flow from the body of an assassinated person.

In considering possible explanations for all these circumstantially narrated wonders, M. de Vesme rules out of court all idea of fraud, of imposture, or connivance in the religious and judicial ordeals, as involving a world-wide conspiracy of secrecy as to methods which could hardly escape being detected or divulged. With regard to the fire test, we are told:—

"Chemistry is more advanced than it was in the Middle Ages, and fabrics, papers, even lace, can be rendered fireproof; but we know of no substance that can enable a human being to walk through bonfires ten feet long, to hold in his hand a bar of red-hot iron during the time necessary for taking nine steps, etc. * * * Even if we were to admit that the body might become incombustible, how shall we explain the fact of the beard and hair being similarly affected, and that the clothes remain intact?"

M. de Vesme compares these phenomena with instances of incombustibility among modern mediums, and says that though we can form no exact idea of how such a thing is done, the spirit explanation given through Home is neither absurd nor irrational in itself. He ridicules Mr. Podmore's suggestion that the witnesses to such feats were confused and incapable of forming a judgment. "That is not historical and scientific criticism," he says; "it is jesting." In any case, he concludes, psychical research re-establishes certain ancient facts which have been doubted by those who refuse to admit what they cannot explain, and these facts may yet form a fulcrum to uplift the world.—Light, London.

Spiritualists Everywhere Be On the Alert.

Spiritualists of the United States, do you want Spiritualism properly represented in the report of the Director of the Census? If so, urge the officers of your local and State association to fill and return the card sent them long ago, by the Department. Every opportunity has been given us to prove by figures how many we are, and it will be our own fault if we are incorrectly reported. Spiritualists, have you the courage to stand up and be counted? If so, send in the reports of your local societies.

SCINTILLATIONS

From the Pen of Henry Morrison Tefft.

"Speak Your Own Latent Conviction, and It Shall Be the Universal Sense.

When a person advances ideas different from ours in regard to things political, we regard his views as dangerous to the welfare of the government. When a man's doctrine on theological matters is not in accord with our own we say his beliefs are dangerous to the church. The world is never agreed; yet under the uncertain hand of man's rule governments and churches continue to improve. The discords of this world unite in making the harmonies of nature and life. Out of conflicting minds, opinions, and ideas, finally comes unity of action. Mind is unstable; affections vary with circumstances. Love turns to hate, friendship to indifference and then often to positive dislike. These are the varying phases through which the feelings are liable to pass. "Talk of love! Why, it is but a passion born of circumstances. To-day it burns with volcanic violence, to-morrow it is but a glimmering taper; to-day its intensity warms the most cheerless cabin of poverty, to-morrow its flickering rays will barely illume the most cheerful abode of wealth." The great body of the people are inarticulate, voiceless; it is only when some one translates their mute aspiration into words that they realize what marvelous, subtle, indefinable emotions, feelings and sentiments are pent up within each living breast. The capabilities of the human heart for joy and sorrow balance each other; they are at equipoise; they both flow into our life through the same channel. The highest definition of joy is sadness; of love, suffering. It is a pleasure, not a duty; a sacrament, not a sacrifice, to suffer—yea, to die for those we love. The martyr welcomes the flames; there is a depth of despair where the climax of suffering becomes a point of rest.

"There is a point of rest
At the great center of the cyclone's force
A silence at its secret source:—
A little child might slumber undisturbed,
Without the ruffle of one fairy curl,
In that strange central calm amid the mighty wind."

A man's life is the highest sacrifice that can be offered. In the eyes of the law it atones for the deepest sins. The time comes when nothing else will satisfy an offended public sentiment. Yea, the time comes when nothing short will meet the individual necessities of a tired and disheartened soul. Yet the heaviest penalties do not stop the commission of crime, neither does universal disapproval lessen the habit of suicide. Circumstances override both law and public sentiment. The nature of a chemical compound is changed by the addition of a simple substance. Whether a thing is good or bad depends upon its use. Every virtue contains the possibility of vice. A drug may be a medicine or a poison. Fiction often serves as high a purpose in life as truth. The story of Washington and the cherry tree is a fabrication, but it has stimulated many a boy to resist the temptation of falsehood. The caricaturist often gives a more correct likeness of a person than the photographer. He is more interested in picturing the "inside" than he is the "outside of a man." The novelist exaggerates character in order to emphasize his argument. "When Dickens held up the vices and brutalities of England to the scorn and laughter of his race he was accused of exaggerating the facts. The great novelist replied that he had to make the color of his picture high in order to make correct impressions at a distance, just as an actor had to his costumes, countenance and gestures in order to make his purpose plain." Around all great characters grow up a large number of anecdotes, stories, fictions and fables, yet they often present a truer picture of the man than actual history. Only those creations gather around a hero which are natural to the man; they are growths and are indigenous to the soil. Imagination is the most potent factor of the mind. It has to be appealed to in every great undertaking. It gives variety to life. John Burroughs says, "Dante makes hell fascinating by his treatment." Monotony drives more people mad than strenuousness. One continued diet will finally nauseate the most voracious appetite. The mind must be excited, the emotions aroused in order to stir men to any great action, whether it is violence, revolution or reformation. Cold, plodding reason never performs miracles. The orator colors his subject with words as the artist does his pictures with paint. Religion to the great mass would have no meaning without symbols, images, temple and altar. A philosopher can appreciate a principle, a truth without decoration or ornament, but the unlettered and ignorant must be addressed through the senses. Macaulay says: "Logicians may reason about abstractions; but the great mass of men must have images. * * * God, the uncreated, the incomprehensible, the invisible, attracted few worshipers. A philosopher might admire so noble a conception; but the crowd turned away in disgust from words which presented no image to their minds. * * * Doctrines, we are afraid, must generally be embodied before they can excite a strong feeling. The multitude is more easily interested for the most unmeaning badge, or the most insignificant name, than for the most important principle." The deepest thought passes beyond the symbol; it wants no intervening priest or liturgy. Tears do not express the greatest sorrow; the voice is silent when the soul is in its most reverent mood. Morley in "English Men of Letters" says: "Milton's piety is admitted; * * The fact that a man, with a deep sense of religion, should not attend any place of public worship, has given trouble to Milton's biographers. * * * A profound appreciation of the spiritual world leads to a disregard of rites. To a mind so disposed, externals become first indifference, then impediment. Ministration is officious intrusion." I believe in the church as an institution, but not wholly in its methods. Creeds have become obsolete; they stand as an impediment to progress. Tradition has always been a barrier to truth. The scholar demands proof; all the theologian asks is belief. Crude minds embrace the most absurd doctrine, believe the most improbable story, and give the same credence to mere statements that they do to proofs.

No pope, bishop, priest or king has power outside of what human hands have imposed. If a man has ability to teach, let him teach, but that one person has any more power with God than another is a product of ignorance, superstition and darkness. Beware of that man who comes to you with a certified doctrine, who can point to the day, the hour, the very moment when all past transgressions were wiped out of the book of remembrance, and with the further assurance that whatever his future life may be, his redemption is passed recall and that God cannot undo His work. No text-book is final. The time comes when all precedents have to be laid aside and new ones formulated. The work of man's hands, whether in wood, stone, or upon parchment, crumble away. Civil compacts, constitutional privileges, political and theological views are continually receiving new interpretations in order to meet the ever changing conditions of society and its needs. You cannot stereotype an opinion or belief for all time. Everything is fluid. Matter and thought are continually running into new moulds. Nature is all the time engaged in waste and repair, in tearing down and building up. The rills, rivulets and brooks carry the soil from the hills down into the valleys; the rivers carry it from the valleys into the sea, thus laying the foundation for future empires. Knowledge filters down through the different layers of society from the highest, until it finally reaches the lowest strata. What great minds thought hundreds of years ago the common mind is thinking to-day. There is but little new thought now taught, either in science, philosophy or religion that has not been spoken of, hinted at or foreshadowed in the history of the past. Error is continually being winnowed out from truth. Thousands have believed that the world was about to come to an end. Times without number have been set for the fulfilling of this prophecy and still the world lives on. Many think that the wickedness of a people is a just cause for God's special vengeance. But judgment comes to individuals, communities and nations by general laws and not by special enactment. There is no sudden pronouncing of arbitrary sentence. There are no sudden cataclysms in history. First the fitting of the ground then the sowing of the seed then the harvest. It takes hundreds of years to lay the foundation for a revolution or a reformation. Great national hymns are growths, not creations; they are born, not manufactured. It takes more than words and time to make one; there must be a history connected with it. Governments, constitutions, and all wide-spread movements are natural productions; they cannot be put up to order.

No stake or stones mark the spot where barbarism ends and civilization begins. Any given state of society is a prophecy of that which is to follow. Somewhere in the universe there would seem to be a governing intelligence—but where is it located? God's hand is more visible in the truth proclaimed in the Bible than it is in the truth proclaimed in any other book. Is not truth divine wherever it is found? Does it not proceed from the Creator of the Universe? All the giant forces of nature are invisible. Law is "a mode of procedure," a rule fixed and unalterable. God cannot change the conditions His own hand has imposed. He is manifest in every law and in every visible object. The kernel of corn contains all the elements of the root, the stalk, and the full-grown ear. It is claimed if we could solve the mystery of a single flower we could solve the mystery of God. The deepest thought can never be expressed in language. There is a limit to the meaning of words—the mind must be reached through symbols. A strange, subtle influence goes out with every thought, word and action. It is sometimes difficult to tell why one individuality attracts people and why another repels. It is not the matter a speech contains so much as its manner. "* * history is crowded with examples showing that * * it is the delicate, indefinable charm of style, not the thought, which makes a work immortal, as a dull actor makes Shakspeare's grandest passages flat and unprofitable * * " A man and his work are inseparable. The artist breathes his spirit into his pictures, and the sculptor into his statue. The mechanic who constructs a fine piece of mechanism is more interested in the achievement than he is in its financial results. The artist, whether a worker in wood, stone or with paint, must love his art more than its value to him in dollars and cents, else he will never perform good work. Genius rises above all material considerations; it will face prison, starvation and death rather than yield up its ambition. In art and in literature—the lesson taught must speak to the soul of humanity, else it will be temporary and transient. A piece of music or prose becomes classic when the emotions it arouses or the sentiment it proclaims touches some universal feeling, aspiration or desire that dwells in every human heart. The great man, the great artist, the great writer, is the one who strikes some sympathetic chord, feeling or sentiment in which all mankind has an equal interest. Whatever only represents local, provincial and geographical boundaries, will surely die. The broader the base the higher can rise the structure. The church by its narrowness has deprived the pulpit of some masterful minds that would have given it intellectual advancement that smaller minds, however heavily endowed spiritually, could not supply. The world is groping its way slowly toward a new religion, a new philosophy, and a new science of life. The old teachings no longer satisfy. God's wrath, eternal punishment, future rewards and penalties, no longer influence mankind. These beliefs are regarded as inoperative as moral factors in the conduct of men. Rev. Algernon S. Crapsey says, " * * the three dogmas of the existence of God, the immortality of the soul, and the future accountability of all men are without ethical value. The Mohammedan believes all three far more devoutly, far more earnestly than the average Christian, and, because he believes, he murders Christians. The Russian believes all three, and, because he believes, he massacres the Jews. Those who have been prominent in the conduct of affairs, those whose wealth threatens the country now, are firm believers in the three propositions." Man follows the natural bent of his mind, notwithstanding his religious belief.

"How weary, stale, flat and unprofitable, Seem to me all the uses of this world."

Meanness, closeness, sometimes pass for conservatism; and duplicity often masquerades under the name of diplomacy. Men think they are cunning, shrewd, subtle, opaque, that their thoughts are hidden, while to the observant eye they are as simple children, as transparent as glass. However well you guard your secret you are all the while publishing it. Go deep enough and there is a kinship in all natures. The primal virtues and vices of men are the same. Trace your lineage back far enough and you will find a common ancestor. It only requires the time, the occasion, the proper irritant, to arouse the barbaric element in each human heart. There is the reverse side to every question. The boy that has gone astray, who has been brought up in rude, uncultivated life, is more apt to reform when brought under more favorable circumstances, than the boy reared in luxury and idleness; when he falls, the ruin is far more complete and irreparable. Civilization does not do away with sin, but stimulates it. Civilization does not do away with suffering, but increases it; it does not do away with sorrow, but adds to it. "Society is diseased, and the best is the most so."

A RELIC OF MEDIEVALISM.

Some Trenchant Statements in Reference to Capital Punishment.

The defeat [says the Boston Traveler] by only one vote in the Massachusetts Legislature, after passing the Senate, of the bill to abolish capital punishment, shows that the campaign against the death penalty for murder has made real progress in this State. Speaker Cole's adverse vote on the bill, in the belief that the vote in the Legislature was a tie, was unnecessary, as it proved; but as the House leader of his party, his action puts upon it the responsibility for the defeat of the measure.

The 223 capital offenses which the old English law recognized as punishable by death did not keep down crime; and with the abolition of the death penalty for all crimes but murder, crime in England, as well as everywhere else all over the world where the death penalty has been modified, lessened markedly. Edmond Burke said that he could, in his time, obtain the assent of the House of Commons to any bill carrying death punishment

In Burke's day all classes of the community endeavored, with success, to have the offenses which injured them made subject to the extreme penalty. It would be difficult to-day even to imagine a list of 223 crimes which could be classed as misdemeanors, and this number in England, a century ago, was not altogether a legacy from the dark ages, because 156 of them were of later date than the reign of the Georges.

A man's life was not very valuable in those days. If he scratched his name on Westminster bridge; if he wore a wig or false moustache or other disguise on a public road; if he cut down a young tree; if he stole property worth more than a dollar and a quarter; if he had been transported for crime and returned a day ahead of the expiration of his punishment; if he wrote a threatening letter; if he stole a hide from a tanner; for any and all of these things, and for two hundred more than these, he was hanged by the neck until he was dead.

The problem of crime was solved in those days by putting the criminal to death on the theory that there was no hope of regenerating a felon, and while he lived his influence would spread and corrupt the community. It was better, therefore, for his own sake as well as that of society, that he should be dead.

As late as ninety years ago there were at one time in London fifty-eight persons, one of them a child under ten years of age, under sentence of death. With certain crimes the law was not satisfied with putting the criminal to death, but added the nameless atrocities necessary to inflict on traitors. Men who in any way opposed the government, after being hanged, were quartered, and their dishonored heads exposed in public places on the end of pikes.

Speaker John Cole, and we speak of him only because of his commanding place in the Legislature and as representing the opposition to this bill, is, or should be, old enough to know that the tendency of the last century has been to get away from the death penalty. It is only the mind bound to ancient and musty tradition that would keep from Massachusetts the credit of joining the honorable procession of the States that are wiping from their statute books this relic of medievalism.

SPIRIT RETURN.

Its Kaleidoscopic Character Comprehensively Illustrated—The Ghastly Spectre at the Bar, as Set Forth by That Great Daily, the New York World.

I have received a number of requests to place in writing the details of that "ghostly affair" connected with the New Britain Hotel, Kingston, N. Y. My father's desire that I do not do so has chiefly been the cause of my refusal. At this date, however, my father and the bartender, the only other persons directly connected with that affair, are dead, and I see no harm in briefly stating the facts just as they occurred.

My father was proprietor of the New Britain Hotel, Kingston, N. Y. Upon consulting the old register I find under July 18, the name "A. D. Merton, Chicago, Ill." This guest's appearance would suggest that of the ordinary drummer. To my knowledge, nothing has ever been disclosed concerning this man's past.

The night following Merton's arrival, I who slept directly over the bar-room, was awakened by the rattling and clicking of glasses at the bar.

Just a few words as to the location of the bar-room and my bedroom. An air-shaft ran from the ceiling of the barroom to the roof of the hotel. This shaft not only supplied light for the bar, but also for the bedrooms on the upper floors, having windows opening into this shaft. I occupied one of these rooms on the first floor.

It was the middle of summer. My shaft window being open, I could distinctly hear the noise coming from below. Thrusting my head out of the window, I saw that Jack, our bartender, whose room was directly across the shaft from mine, had also been aroused by the racket and was looking from his window into the darkness below. Any doubt which I had about someone being in the barroom was cast aside, when a glass from the bar went crashing to the floor.

Accompanied by Jack, I prepared to descend. We had reached the stairway when the sound of footsteps of someone coming up the stairs reached us. Concealing ourselves, we saw by the dim night light in the hall, our new guest, Merton, ascend the stairs and enter his room. The following night I watched for Merton, and beheld a repetition of the previous night, even to the breaking of the glass. In fact, these trips were continued for four consecutive nights, it was decided I should speak to him in reference to these nightly trips. Upon my doing so he became highly excited and expressed his intention of leaving the New Britain the following day.

That night he did not take his usual trip to the bar. He was missed at the table the following morning. After forcing his bedroom door we found him dead upon his bed. According to the physician a large ugly wound over his left eye had caused instant death. How this wound was inflicted, or who committed the foul deed, remains a mystery to this day. Entrance to Merton's room from the outside appeared impossible, as both window blinds and door were locked on the inside. I shall waste no time on the police investigations, etc.

Now for the horrible part of this tale, of which no one has ever offered a satisfactory explanation. Some day, however, I trust, I shall understand it. A delusion, I've been told. A delusion, when three pairs of eyes, three pairs of ears, heard and saw just the same! The night following Merton's death I was awakened by footsteps coming apparently from the barroom. The next instant the rattling of the bar glasses convinced me someone was moving about below. I entered Jack's room, to find him sitting erect in bed listening to the same sound which had awakened me. We noiselessly descended to investigate.

I cannot recollect who had the first look at the bar. Behind the bar stood Merton—or Merton's ghost! I could not remove my eyes from his ghastly face. That horrible scar over his left eye was so distinct. You could plainly see where the blood from this wound had entered his eye. His figure appeared of a dull gray, thus in the pitch of darkness his every movement was visible. Somehow, he knocked a beer glass from the bar. He then started through the hall to the stairs, which he apparently ascended to his room.

Reaching the first floor, Jack and I found my father, who had been awakened by the crashing of the glass. He ridiculed the tale I told him, said a rat had thrown the glass from the bar. But my father was soon to be convinced of the truth of that which we had seen. Aye! I wish he had never looked for proof. At his age, seventy-three, the shock was severe.

Yes, the next night, father, Jack and I beheld the same spectacle as on the previous night. The trip to the bar, the broken glass, that horrible wound over "its" left eye, and, last, we saw this "thing" disappear up the stairs.

The following week we moved from Kingston, and I have never had nor have I now any inclination to visit the old hotel. FLOYD J. DAVIS.

ENTERTAINMENT.

(Translated by C. T. Brooks.)

I stopped at an inn one day to dine;
The host was a generous fellow;
A golden apple for a sign
Hung out on a branch, so mellow.
It was the good old apple-tree
Himself, so nobly dined me;
Sweet fare and sparkling juices he
Was pleased and proud to find me
To his green house came many a guest,
Light-winged and light-hearted;
They sang their best, they ate his best,
Then up they sprang and departed.
I found a bed to rest my head—
A bed of soft green clover;
The host a great, cool shadow spread
For a quilt and covered me over.
I asked him what I had to pay—
I saw his head shake slightly—
Oh, blest be he forever and aye
Who treated me so politely.

"Sacred Things."

From the Standpoint of Harrison D. Barrett.

I have heard it said that Spiritualists are wont to sneer at "Sacred things," and to mock at the cherished opinions of their fellowmen, even sometimes blaspheming the name of God and the established spiritual truths of the bible. Perhaps that sweeping statement rests upon a modicum of fact, being an echo from the days when iconoclastic thunderings were heard from our platforms. That there have been those who have treated with contempt all of the old-time conceptions of religion, even going so far as to shock, offend and wound those who cling to the faiths of their childhood, no one can deny. Just how much good or harm, these extreme utterances may have done, the writer cannot say. It is so much a matter of rejoicing to him that they are no longer heard from our rostrums, that he is pleased to let them pass into and "Among the glimmering dreams of things that were."

The rank and file of the Spiritualists of America, when personally known from direct contact with them, are far from being the fierce, condemnatory, unfeeling, ungenerous people they are made out to be. "Their hearts are tender, and their souls are sincere." They are willing to do for others who are in trouble, but it sometimes takes repeated calls to awaken them from their seeming indifference, and inspire them to action. Even in their not doing, this fault is more from want of thought than from any lack of feeling. They have had so many "good things" handed them by the angels that they take it as a matter of course that all of their brethren are equally favored. Great is their surprise when they learn of the dire distress of those whom they had felt to be in opulent circumstances. They are willing to share their material and spiritual stores with those whom they find to be in need, but it is a lamentable fact that many of them are so self-complacent that they take very few steps to determine where that need really is. Taken as a class, however, they will more than favorably "Measure up" with the same number of people in any other denomenation.

There are good people, bad people, generous people, selfish people, wise people, and ignorant people in our ranks. They are all doing their best under existing circumstances, and are sowing the seed from which they must reap their own harvest in the autumn of life's years.

It is not pleasant to hear Spiritualists ridiculing the religious beliefs of other people, and sneering at the things which those "Who know not Spiritualism" have been taught all their lives to regard as sacred. Abuse, ridicule, and persiflage are not argument, neither is the use of cutting irony in the best of taste when discoursing with one who is awakening to larger views through some sorrow that has entered his life. The Cross of Christ, the Ark of the Covenant, the words of the Psalmist and Prophets have been staffs of support to untold millions in their search for religious truths, also in their hours of grief and deep despair. Let us not take away from any man that which has been a prop to him until we have something stronger and better to put in its place. What does it matter that he sings lovingly, tenderly, even strenuously from the "Gospel Hymns," or cries out with Sir John Bowring:

"In the Cross of Christ I glory,
Towering o'er the wrecks of time;
All the wealth of sacred story,
Gathers 'round its head sublime."

He is helped, sustained, soothed, by those words and melodies. Let him move on until he is ready for another truth.

We Spiritualists have our "Sacred Things." We cannot deny the truth of that statement. Our seance rooms are, or should be, "holy ground" to us. Our concepts of the spirit world are as sacred to our souls as the ideals of the Christians are to them. Our inner visions of what we are to find there, and whom we shall meet, are the most sacred of all sacred thoughts to us. We are hurt to the quick if we hear our friends and neighbors indulging in sarcasm at our expense, because of our love for the dear ones in spirit life. We theorize, speculate, dream, and indulge in fanciful flights in our musings with respect to the life beyond. We wonder what father, mother, wife, husband, children are doing there, and we wince with pain when these ideals are roughly handled even by our best beloved in mortal form. If baby has "gone back home," and we drop into a reverie of wonder as to what she is doing in her new life, when our pulses thrill, our nerves throb with emotion, our eyes fill, our hearts beat with subdued pain, do we not feel deeply aggrieved, shocked, hurt, on questioning our nearest and dearest one, if he or she says "I haven't given it a thought."

We may have been conning Longfellow's words in "Resignation:"

"She is not dead, that child of our affection,
But gone into the higher school,
Where she no longer needs our poor protection,
And Love itself doth rule."

This beautiful stanza is quickly followed by two others, so eager are we in our unspoken thought to trace her who has gone:

"Not as a child shall we gain behold her;
But when, with rapture wild,
Quick in our arms we do enfold her,
She will not be a child."

"But a fair maiden, in her Father's Mansion,
Clothed with celestial grace,
And beautiful in all her soul's expansion,
Shall we behold her face!"

If our mental query be with regard to the growth of children in the spirit world the reader can see how a friend's thoughtless reply would wound the one whose being was all aglow with tenderness and affection, in saying, "I have other things to think of."

Perhaps so, and sometime he will have to think of the heartache he has given his suffering friends at the hour of their soul's Gethsemane and exaltation. Let us learn to be kind, thoughtful, tender; these all are attributes of spirituality.

"Sacred Things!" Here is a pair of little white shoes. They are as sacred as are the bibles of all ages and nations. They are a portion of a bible for one being at least. Let us read them.

On page 1, we read of the happy laugh of the vanished baby when they were first placed upon her feet; of the sweet joy she manifested as she ran about the house telling every inmate her treasures; of the rhythmic music of her faltering words as she tried to put into song the happiness of her heart; of the loving kisses she gave as the thanks for her blessings!

On page 2, we read of the real service they were to her because of her need of them; of their impress upon her memory and their inspiration to her smile; of the day when her feet grew tired; of the times she needed rest; of the gradual lessening of her volume of song; of the pathos of her smile; of the falling of her voice; of eternal silencing; of her disappearance from mortal sight, floating on the frail raft of babyhood, "Down the blue Danube of sickness, out into the Black Sea of seeming death." When this portion of that bible is read others can see and feel and know something of the meaning of those two words, "Sacred Things!"

Look at them again! Their lacings are threads that unite our souls with hers and draw her to us over the royal pathway of her angelhood. Their whiteness in an index of her purity of soul, and a warning to us to be white, pure and clean in order that we may be worthy of her dear company in the hereafter. Their eyelets are little openings all along the leathery walls of being to let the star-shine of her love to trickle through, to warm and nourish our famished hearts. Their tongues are little reaches, placed between two apertures in our minds in order that our secret thoughts may slide across the soft, velvety substance without sound or jar to disturb the sanctity of our silence. Their soles—ah!—their soles! They are the things wrought out of our love and hers upon which we must step as we glide swiftly forth to join her in the "Land o' the Leal!"

In fine, those shoes are immutably sacred, unspoken words that link us with the eternal reals of that dear one's being who lives in "The land most fair of everywhere," just around the turn of the road of life!

Shall we be mocked for cherishing them? Shall we be ridiculed if we take them in our hands, and stroke them as we were once privileged to do the golden head of our vanished darling? Do they not enable her to walk into our presence oftener, and all the more quickly, than would be possible if we did not possess them?

As the bible is the rule and guide of the faith of multitudes, "The sacred book of divine truth, that points the way to the Palestine of the heavenly world; so are the little white shoes, the faded letters, the dried flowers, the little dresses, the worn and almost tattered garments, sacred things to their possessors that point the way to a spiritual Palestine—that promise a reunion here of the vanished spirit dear ones with the loved of earth, and a reuniting in spirit spheres of those who are akin in soul, children and parents of the same loves, comrades of the same soul-groupings, forever and forever!

"Forever and forever! all in a blessed home,
And there to rest a little while till you and others come;
To lie within the light of Love, as I lie upon your breast,
Where the erring cease from troubling, and the weary are at rest!"

SIMON PURE SPIRITUALISM.

As Presented by Archbishop Ireland.

To the Editor:—Is the Catholic church coming over to Spiritualism? I send you the remarks by Archbishop Ireland, delivered in St. Paul on June 2d, and published in the Minneapolis Tribune of June 3d. It sounds to me like Simon Pure Spiritualism. Read it carefully. J. M. JORDAN, Tribute to Country.

"America, in the Cathedral of St. Paul, thy name shall be honored and loved: there prayer shall go upward for thy life and thy glory. Cathedral of St. Paul, rise confidently and hopefully to the skies; America guards and protects thee.

"I shall not depart from the corner stone of the new Cathedral of St. Paul without a salute to the spirits of the departed, who, I am sure, are with us at this moment in mysterious whisperings—messages of love and benediction. They—who built the olden cathedrals of 1851 and 1856—they who worshiped and prayed around the olden altars, to-day rejoice with us that the city of St. Paul has so grown, that the church has so grown, as to merit a new home of religion, sumptuous and splendid beyond their brightest hopes. Names I must mention—in special affection and gratitude—names of the men, who, in special manner, made illustrious the olden cathedrals; who, by their holy work prepared the ways for the cathedral that is to be—Galtier, Ravoux and Caillet, Cretin and Grace. Cherished spirits, the new cathedral is yours—bless it with your prayers.

"And now, Almighty God, Master and Father, to Thee, to-day and forever, be there honor and glory. To Thee we offer, as the supreme homage of faith and piety, the new cathedral. Accept it, the gift to Thee from loyal children, in return for gifts from Thee to them. Be it, for time and for eternity, the bond never to be broken between them and Thee. Almighty God, bless thy children; bless their offering, the Cathedral of St. Paul."

Whence and Whither.

Man with Thinking Mind,
And Lord of every kind,
Uprisen from the clod,
Seems born an infant God,
And fain would find his own
In all the great Unknown.

How and whence am I, and how and whither am I going? Such are questions that have engaged the mind of man from the dawn of history, at least. And still the inquiry continues. Scientists, philosophers, poets, religionists, Christians and heathens; men of every race, nation and clime; learned and unlearned all are persistently pressing the question with varying degrees of satisfaction and comfort and every religion rests upon some theory fanciful or otherwise, relative to human destiny; and I, too, proceed with the same old inquiry and interrogate reason, knowledge, and Nature, with no idea of reaching any conclusive or wholly satisfactory answer, only hoping to better satisfy my soul's desire and longing for immortality.

And why this longing? I have an appetite for food and it exists. Blooming fields, orchards, and golden harvests; air, seas and rivers supply my wants. I feel the need of clothing wherewith to adapt myself to varying temperatures of climate belonging to the seasons and different latitudes of our earth wherever I may wish to dwell, and behold the vegetable and animal are my servants; the snow-white cotton from the field, the soft warm fleece of the sheep; and the fine-spun silk of the worm are provided. I hunger for knowledge, and doors everywhere are open and countless teachers are willing and encouraging instructors. I love society, and lo! the elements gratify my desires; oceans, rivers, electricity and steam make for me commercial ways and means by which I may communicate and visit with every kindred, and the social instinct is abundantly gratified. While my corporeal wants and adaptations are all thus abundantly satisfied, shall the desires and adaptations of my soul suffer neglect and go unanswered? My reason tells me it cannot be, and thus I am comforted. My intuitions, field teachers, reasonings and hopes cannot all be delusive; for they address the constitution and inborn expectancy of my soul, and tell me of that which is of common belief and concerning which, impressions, inspirations, and visions have come to me and others with sweet assurance that:

"Life is real, life is earnest,
And the grave is not its goal;
Dust thou art, to dust returnest,
Was not spoken of the soul."

That man possesses a double entity is hardly in dispute. That he has a mind, though invisible, is as evident as that he has a body. That the two are related is plain; but how is not so clear. Careful inquiry and thoughtful study may enable us to understand better this relation, along with the life and province of each. The body we know is of the earth earthy—an organized material body. But what is mind? My conception of mind is that of a universal force, uncreated, without beginning and without end, immortal, and organized just as certainly as matter and the universe are organized. This mind is variously expressed throughout Creation, but always with definiteness and purpose, whether in atoms, monads, or man. Its power is supreme over all. The boundless universe of Universes is its infinite domain; and throughout all, from atom to star, its rule is law, life, and motion, forcing evolution of suns, systems, and worlds innumerable for the further evolution and development of more ultimate expressions and consummate organized beings of its conception—visible embodiments of its invisible regal self.

Great suns command revolving worlds,
The Infinite is organized,
And Heart of one All-mind unfolds
A Universe as sensitized.

As matter is indestructible, so of mind; and that it is an intelligent force is evidenced by its work; and that it is an omnipresent or immanent force is evidenced in its activity, everywhere manifest from simples to compounds, in integration, differentiations, developments and dissolutions. It is the alpha and omega, the one All-comprising and Infinite Intelligence we call God; and Pope's conception is hardly transcended:—

"All are but parts of one stupendous whole, Whose body Nature is, and God the soul."

That matter comprises the body of the universe, and is without beginning, uncreated, is self-evident, as nothing can be made or conceived of nothing. As of matter so of mind; for to suppose a creator of mind would be to presume another mind-creator, which would necessitate another and this still another, and so on ad infinitum. Now, as neither matter nor mind can come from nothing, no more can intelligence. The human mind and intelligence must therefore have come from some other mind and intelligence, a priori, which could have been in the last analysis, none other than the Supreme Infinite Mind, the one great causative force of evolution, the way and wherefore of all life, mind and intelligence upon this planet and innumerable others in the infinite domain. Thus our birthright and relation to the stupendous whole is logically established, as is also our heritage; for as the stream partakes of its source, so man must inherit the attributes of the soul, life, power, and intelligence from the great ancestor of all life.

Some one may perhaps claim that mind and intelligence were primarily evolved out, of matter by some inhering force of law. But whence the force or law? And how evolved, unless existing there potentially? And, then, whence the possibility? If mind is evolved out of matter, then we should honor the dust above the soul. But we can credit no such endowment to the soil we cultivate. Matter does not exist as an independent substance. Matter, mind and motion can only be regarded as an external trinity, otherwise one or all must have come from nothing, which is inconceivable. Nothing is conceivably produced without some determining cause operating in the Universe. Everything produced unmistakably declares an originating source, the legitimate producer. The substantive relationship of mind over matter, determining and controlling organization, proclaims its sovereignty as an intelligent creative force, however inscrutable, determining all growth and development from protoplasm to man, and every manifestation of life and activity wherever observed. And because the universe is a unit, under like control throughout, I can but logically conclude that mind and intelligence must manifest and exist in organized forms and beings of like descent, and akin to ourselves, and of like destiny in other worlds as surely as they exist. To presume a boundless universe to exist just to satisfy the demands of our minute world, seems to me monumental egotism, or else a barbarian conception. A stupendous universe most surely voices an equally stupendous mind in control, begetting life and individualizing mind everywhere under like conditions as here on earth, which is but a very small province in the great cosmos and kingdom of the Infinite mind.

I am unable to conceive of man's coming in any other way than by conception and development by force of heredity, which process traced back by gradient steps brings him to the very door of the Infinite mind, from whence has thus come his life and inheritance of immortality. The origin and destiny of man seems thus pronounced beyond dispute, and life after the death of the body in an advanced sphere and in possible communication with this is no less than a logical requirement, and as certain as that God is our Father and we His children. Possessing the atttributes of the Father certainly adapts man to an endless existence where infinite possibilities to improve may be realized in accord with the hopes and promises born with the soul. As sure as the law of heredity is a fact, this must be so; and while the body returns to dust from whence it came, the soul as surely ascends to its own inheritance in the higher realm of sublimal life where adaptations are satisfied and advance development and happiness ultimately attained. And this is the heaven of human hopes:—

There surely is another place,
The dream of all the human race,
Divinely purposed, future goal
That waits the coming of my soul;
Where just rewards are realized
And lives attuned and harmonized
With music of expanded spheres
And love that knows no weak'ning fears.

Reflective thought declares for me,
That in the road of destiny,
The past is stubble where I've sown;
Its fruitage makes the great unknown,
All opening up as time speeds on,
With every day's returning dawn;
While I, in rough and rugged way,
Trudge on and hopeful make survey,
So far as eye and thought can scan,
To learn the heritage of man;
And what may be his future store
And home when earth-life here is o'er.

And out across the running stream,
While gazing from this side, I seem
To see familiar faces there,
With wistful look and beckoning care,
That strengthens hope with blissful cheer
In me, while battling storm-waves here.

Where'er I look, intelligence
Rewards my active diligence
With knowledge more of life and things,
That comfort to my being brings,
And lets me see yet farther still
The grandeur of the Father's will
And love divine that blesses me,
And yours, and mine, eternally.

CIVILIZING CHRISTIANITY.

Science Has Civilized Christianity by Trying to Knock the Devil Out of It.

The frequent assertion on the part of Christian theologians and writers that our present civilization is a Christian civilization, based on the Bible, seems to be somewhat widely separated from the truth. Christian barbarians destroyed the civilizations of ancient Peru and Mexico; Ancient Egypt was a highly civilized country. The Egyptians had made many discoveries in astronomy, mathematics and mechanics. They had discovered the rotundity of the earth. The ancient Greeks have never been surpassed in art and philosophy. The Grecian kings of Egypt were eminent men of learning. They established libraries and schools and cultivated the sciences. The Christian religion arose, and Egypt and Greece were overrun by the Christian fanatics of Europe. The Christian rulers of Europe placed faith above reason and substituted miracle for law. They tried to burn all the books, destroy science and pervert logic, that they might be able to fasten their fantastic devil theology forever on the minds of men! The church produced no geometer in her autocratic reign of 1,200 years." "In Christian Europe there had not been a cultivator of mechanical philosophy until Leonardo da Vinci in 1452." "Christianity did not produce an astronomer in 1,500 years." It burned Giordano Bruno at the stake for the teaching of astronomy. Galileo was kept a prisoner for life because he asserted that the earth moved. During all this period the Jews preserved the sciences. Mohammedanism arose in the seventh century and the Saracens became the patrons of education, first taught them by the Jews. The Saracens in Spain lived in luxurious refinement while the Christian kings of Europe rode in ox carts, lived in smoky huts and clothed their vermin-infested bodies in filthy skins. The Arabians gave us advanced mathematics, astronomy, chemistry and medicine. We are the heirs of the ancient pagan and heathen civilizations, preserved and diffused by Jew and Saracen. To-day is the civilization of science, not of dogma. In the great conflict between religion and science, religion had lost every battle. Science has civilized Christianity by trying to knock the Devil out of it.

STILL HUNTING FOR GOD.

Useless Search in the Labyrinths of Infinity.

What in the name of reason (man's highest faculty) do those people looking for God expect to find? If, as reason tells us, space must be unlimited in extent, and universal energy must pervade it, and this energy must, like space itself, be without end, center, or circumference, what in the name of this same reason do they expect to find?

What can a finite being, with his marked limitations, know or conceive about endless space? And yet we see mortal man with his inexcusable vanity chasing the unreasonable hope and expectation that he will some day run onto God, and know him without an introduction.

A few moments' reflection in his rational moments ought to convince any man that infinite energy, like infinite space, is too large a proposition for him to wrestle with; and all of his time given to anything but the study of phenomena through his senses is utterly wasted when looking for results.

The ancients looked for God, wrote about him and talked about him, prayed to him, sacrificed and worshipped him, just as millions are doing to-day, and all the evidence they ever found or we have since found, is confined to the phenomena of Nature. We cannot go back of it nor get outside of it; it is all we see, all we know. The folly of hunting for force outside of matter to move it, or in trying to reach it in any way through our senses, is just as great as that impossible feat of lifting one's self by the boot straps. That has been found by trial to be beyond man's power, and after ages of useless effort to find God, good, horse sense says, give it up, like the boot-strap business.

The finite can have no conception of the infinite, and it should not require more than fifty thousand years of human existence on this planet to find it out, and some folks think mortal man has been here longer than that.

If anyone in this age of the world sees the necessity for a god, or feels the need of one for religious purposes or otherwise, I would suggest that he make one in the form of a graven image as they used to. Then he can see it, talk to it, pray to it, and be sure he has one.

It is enough for me to know that sufficient energy exists in space to keep everything in motion under immutable laws, that we know anything about; and by reasoning from cause to effect, I am led to accept the satisfactory belief that throughout infinite space similar conditions prevail. I never expect to know any more about universal energy than I know right now, and as personal gods have gone out of fashion, like the bustle worn a few years ago by the fair sex, wherefore should we mourn?

Personal gods had their day and for long centuries an influence on the human mind; but under intellectual evolution we have got away from them, and now the man who wants more, or less, than infinite energy to run an infinite universe, is hard to please, to say the least.

Finite beings should confine themselves to finite things, and unless they are looking for a finite god, who certainly would be a misfit in an infinite universe, the search should be postponed indefinitely, and I throw out the hint as an aid to settling the vexed question: Is there a God? Unless the god-hunter is after the finite kind, what possible show does he stand to find one? And if he admits a finite god could not do the work imposed upon him by an infinite universe, when found, and this would necessitate further search to find a cause for infinite energy, what would his little god be worth?

Let us pause and reflect before chasing god any further.

Happiness.

No scented breath from fragrant lands
E'er bore it on its odor sweet,
Nor talisman nor fabled wand
E'er called it from its calm retreat.
It heeds not beck from place of power,
Allegiance ne'er to wealth it bowed,
As oft it smiles on cottage bower,
As on the mansion of the proud.

Search not for it upon the gold
Or epaulets that satraps deck;
No dying warrior need be told
'Tis vainly sought in battle's wreck,
Go search o'er land or all the sea
For happiness, you vainly quest,
For from within it comes to thee
That peace of soul that maketh blest.

The plaudits of the fickle crowd
The orator may full enjoy,
Too oft he finds, though ringing loud,
The gold of praise is base alloy.
Some souls in music often find
The thrills of joy bespeaking bliss,
Those thrills, alas! but leave behind
A vacant vale of loneliness!

What ecstasy the lovers feel
As lip to lip they madly press,
Delirious joys, they but conceal
The ghost of pleasure's emptiness.
As earth remote is from the sky,
As darkness is from light apart,
Thus far will fail to satisfy
Mere earthly joys, the human heart.

There is a longing in the soul
For peace which earth can ne'er bestow,
Unsatisfied it seeks a goal
Not found within this vale below.
Methinks there is a well of love
Whence flow all joys on earth bestowed,
Though sparkling at their source above,
They're soiled by banks through which they flowed.

Though mountain river at its source
Pellucid as the crystal be,
That river swelled to mighty force
Mud-laden oft will reach the sea.
This pleasures seem from heaven sent,
So sweet are they when first essayed,
Alas! but worthless are when spent—
So deep with passion's dross o'erlaid.

As he who'd drink the purest draught
Of water first must climb above
Unto its source; thus must be quaffed
The purest joys from heavenly love.
Then quaff, my soul, the nectar cup
Of love divine, unsoiled by dross
Of carnal things, that climbing up
True happiness may thee engross.

THE CENSUS AGAIN.

It Is a Matter of Much Importance to Spiritualism.

The Spiritualists of the United States are requested to take notice that only those who are members of a local society, organized and conducted in harmony with the rules of all religious bodies, are to be counted in the present census. Those who flock around the person of some medium from week to week, or attend meetings managed by individuals for their own personal profit, cannot be enumerated. A local society, to be counted as such, must have a board of trustees of least three persons, and be conducted according to well defined rules. All Spiritualist societies, whether or not affiliated with the N. S. A. or State associations, are recognized and their members counted. They are classed by themselves, while the great body of affiliated societies will be recognized as making up the organic strength of the Spiritualists of America.

The Director of the Census is not unjust to the Spiritualists in being thus explicit in his rulings. All other denominations must meet the same requirements. As the followers of other religions are willing to be counted, and are not ashamed to acknowledge themselves as believers in the religion of their choice, it will not be difficult to secure a correct enumeration of every church body in the land. The selfishness and cowardice of pretended Spritualists will have much to do with the small number who report themselves as followers of the religion of Spiritualism. Unwillingness to belong to an organization for fear of being obliged to pay ten cents per year to support it, or for another and more absurd reason still—fear of having their "freedom abridged," is now in evidence in the poor showing Spiritualism will make in the census report. The picayune Spiritualists, who pride themselves on being "individualists" and members of no society of any sort, are almost wholly responsible for the pitiful exhibit that Spiritualism will make when the figures are given out.

There is one way by which this shameful condition can be offset in part. The Special Agent for the Spiritualists will have the privilege of making a statement regarding the widely-scattered state of our forces, and that in many localities societies cannot be maintained for lack of numbers. Now, if the isolated Spiritualists of the nation will but report their names and addresses to the headquarters of the N. S. A., either to the president or secretary, it will be possible to report approximately the number of unattached believers in Spiritualism. Will not all who read this notice, who are not members of any local or State association, send in their names at once? The census agent will only count you as Spiritualists; you will not be asked for ten cents, nor even for one cent. The Government wants to know who you are, where you are, and what your religion is. Are you willing to stand up and be counted? If so, send in your names and addresses, provided you are not enrolled on the books of the society.

Mr. Editor, the writer respectfully submits that the taking of this census is the best argument for Spiritualists to join local of State societies that he has ever found. Those who stay outside injure Spiritualism by so doing, and stamp themselves with cowardice.

Isolated and unattached Spiritualists, shall we hear from you? Are you willing to enroll yourselves as Spiritualists? Your names and addresses will be thankfully received.

THE HOME CIRCLE.

Recommended by One Who Has Experienced Its Benefits.

In number 854 of The Progressive Thinker I gave a brief description of the excellent results we gain from our home circle. They are simply marvelous. It is only since about three years ago I affiliated with Spiritualism, which I despised before on every occasion, but I confess that the knowledge and wisdom acquired through the course of those three years by careful study of high-grade Spiritualistic literature and the comparison of the occurring phenomena of our circle, far outweigh the experience of forty-eight years of my life. I feel that I have become a man quite different from that of fifty-two years ago, and that independent from any alleged Christian church, too.

As I have told already, a few Germans organized a home circle, of which Mrs. L. York is the officiating medium. She is a lady of a fine and gentle character, whose motto is: "I want to know the truth as far as possible for anyone to be reached." And with noble determination she starts the work of every circle. Alma, the thirteen-year-old daughter of Mr. and Mrs. York, is already a fine medium, besides her four young girls are developing and promise to become mediums of a high grade, too. So, in course of a few years this town will be well provided with mediums characterized by noble deeds and determination.

Brother and sister Spiritualists, not only of Salt Lake City, but the United States at large, I admonish you, organize home circles all over the country; go to work with a heart full of love and determined not to use your acquired abilities and spiritual forces for pecuniary purposes, as so many individuals are doing who parade before the world, disgracing this most noble and world-wide movement. Too late they will discover that the forces which they used for their own selfish purposes dragged them deep down in the morass of depravity and wickedness! It will require many years' work afterward to lift them out of that detestable mire, and those seemingly acquired pecuniary advantages will prove to be only a danger-gift. Invite your neighbors and friends with whom you are best in sympathy to partake of your circle, in order to gain a strong and harmonious magnetic current. Connect those home circles with a local organization, and this with the N. S. A. of the United States. Only a well-organized effort will dispel this gloomy darkness, settled down over the people by the creedal sects of an alleged Christian church, like threatening clouds before a mighty and atmosphere-clearing storm, after which a new sun will arise and shine over a new and redeemed world; this will be not only a millennial but eternal kingdom of peace and happiness, realized by the Christ of a loving and unselfish human heart.

LOOKING TOWARDS THE SPIRIT SPHERES.

Japs Ask Help of Millions of Ancestors.—Shintoism, or Worship of Souls of Dead, Revived by Success in Arms.—Religion of People—For First Time Honor Is Paid to White Men and Christians.—An Acknowledgment That Spirit Return Is True, by the Japs.

Tokio, Japan, June 22.—All Japan has been communing with the spirits of the dead who gave their lives to their country's cause in the late war with Russia. The phantom army of 80,000 souls and more, summoned by His Imperial Majesty the Emperor—acting in the capacity of High Priest of Shintoism—to the Yakusuni shrine for the festival of the Shokonsha, heard the nation's voice lifted up in praise of their deeds and in solemn prayer that for 10,000 years—ever hereafter—they watch over the fatherland.

There were strangers in this army of spirits this year. If in that world of the after life where souls abide the earth individuality is retained in any degree, and myriads of little brown souls gathered about must have looked in wonderment upon the presence of some large white souls who, in turn, must have marveled greatly at their peculiar surroundings.

Christians Are Honored.

At this year's festival, for the first time in the history of Japan, white men, Christians, were deified at a Shinto shrine. The white men to whom were paid posthumous honors, exactly similar to those paid Japanese soldier and sailor heroes were officers of a ship used as a transport, who went down to willing death when she was sunk. They might have escaped but they preferred death to leaving their ship. By this act they won a place in the Japanese heart and the Japanese religion on the same plane with that occupied by the nation's own heroes.

The Emperor himself decreed that posthumous honors were to be paid them. Perhaps the fact that they were Englishmen may, in these days, when Japan is ever holding "the alliance" up to the admiring gaze of the Orient, have had something to do with this very unusual tribute being paid them; but whatever the motive, the episode is both interesting and instructive.

The Yakusuni shrine, on the outskirts of Tokio, is a place of special worship of the spirits of dead warriors.

The Shokunsha festival is an annual gathering, held under the auspices of an association of officers of which Admiral Togo is now the head.

On the temple ground there are several monuments made of spoils of war and an army museum full of relics of the late wars and of some of the early ones. Here the Japanese people gather to worship at least once a year.

War Helps Shintoism.

When at the end of the war with Russia, the Emperor visited the great shrines at Ise and in solemn ceremony proclaimed to the imperial ancestors the successful outcome of the conflict, Shintoism was given a great impetus. It is the religion that lies deepest in the hearts of these people.

Shintoism is indigenous to Japan; it has no founder nor any dogmas. It has developed with the customs and traditions and characteristics of the nation, or, perhaps, has been the most potent factor in dveloping these customs and characteristics. It is essentially ancestor worship.

Judged by the standards of other religions, Shintoism hardly deserves classification as a religion. It has no code of morals. Japanese religious writers naively explain this by declaring that so universal is the innate goodness of the people that there is no call for such codes as have been provided for the "barbarian" peoples of the rest of the world.

Religion of Cleanliness.

Shintoism concerns itself greatly with the physical welfare of the people, apparently far more than with their spiritual welfare. Its essential is cleanliness, cleanliness of conscience, but especially cleanliness of body. The proneness of the Japanese for boiling hot baths is probably due to the influence of Shintoism. With small respect for one who takes a cold bath—this, according to their ideas not being cleansing—by the same logic they resort to the hottest water they can stand, since the hotter the water the cleaner the body.

There are twelve recognized sects of Shintoism—all with ancestor worship as their cardinal principle.

The belief of the Japanese is that the disembodied spirits acquire the power of deities and possess supernatural attributes. They become potential for good or evil, and they exercise their potentialities in the same mundane sphere upon which their interests and affections centered during life.

They are, in short, guardian divinities, and as such the object of the ceremonies in their honor is, on the one hand, to convey to them thanks for their services while on earth, and on the other hand to solicit a continuance of these services beyond the grave.

Is Religion of Japan.

Other religions may affect, and doubtless have made considerable impress upon, the surface of Japanese life, just as Western civilization has has affected the surface; but in the last analysis such as lies deep in the Japanese heart is this ancestor worship which is known as Shintoism, "The Way of the Gods."

Dividing the Atom.

In your issue of June 1, C. M. Carter says Madame Curie divided the atom recently 200,000 times, making that important foundation of the universe so minute that 12,500,000,000,000 of the sub-divisions were necessary when placed end to end in a row, to cover one lineal inch of space. It is presumed the Madame did this job with a lead pencil, but in whatever way she did it, it remains a remarkable scientific feat—if true. But I get a better idea of the size of this infinitesimal object, which Epicurus and M. L. Sherman used to construct the universe and God himself, by the comparison of Lawrence Oliphant.

Said he, "the atomic particle represents the same amount of space on the point of a cambric needle, that a grain of sand does on a ten acre lot." Now we have it down pat, and Madam Curie must take a back seat, so clear and distinctly do we see the atom on the needle's point.

It is well at times that we acknowledge our indebtedness to those who know all about the atom; for personally I admit my inability to cut it up into so many sections and to know when to stop.

SPIRIT MESSAGES.

Given Through the Mediumship of Mrs. Nellie Davis, of Kewanee, Illinois.

Mrs. Emeline H. Frank.

My Dear Ones on Earth—I am so glad to find this avenue open to me this evening, and I will try to do my very best to prove my identity, and let them know that I still live, and can return and influence and help them.

I was what the world calls a very old lady when I passed away. I was old in body, but young in spirit, and I passed away just as I always wanted to. I always said I hoped I would not be sick long, for I did not want to be a burden to anyone. So I passed away without an ache or pain, and the only thing that I dreaded about it was leaving my poor George, my faithful companion, for I knew he would miss me more than the rest; but I had the consolation of knowing that it would not be long before he would join me again. I left three children in earth life, and I am writing this message to prove to them that I am a conscious being still, for they often doubt this great truth, and while they always had respect for my belief, I could tell that they thought it was only a delusion and that mother would be disappointed.

So I come here so far from home to tell them that I was not disappointed. I found all that I expected to and more too.

I have a beautiful spirit home, and I found it prepared for me by my deeds and thoughts on earth. Every act of my earthly life, every single thought, had taken form. Many scenes disfigured my home, for I was like all others. I was by no means perfect, and had many faults, but as I endeavored to rise above all things of earth, and as I returned to earth and tried to undo some things of the past, these scenes faded and brighter ones came in their place.

Oh, I would like to tell them so many things, but I do not like to take up too much time, but I thought if I could only say a few words that they would see it, and it would be the means of their looking into this grand truth. So I will go and make room for another. I thank you all very much. Please say that I passed away in New York, about four years ago, where I will be remembered.

Ned Murray.

I don't know whether I can say much or not, but they told me every one was welcome to come, and as my folks are trying to find me, I thought in this way I might be able to reach them. But I know I can't talk as some do, for I never had an education, and never wrote a letter in my life. My folks never heard from me after I left home, and that has been 25 years ago. My folks lived at Skowhegan, Maine.

I went west with a man by the name of Bradford. We did not have enough money to carry us far, and so we took a "tie-pass," and we had a hard time of it. I could not stand such a life, and when we reached Chicago I went to work, and lived there four years. By that time I had saved up enough money to take me to Salt Lake City. I thought at times I would ask someone to write home for me, but I neglected to do it, and I know poor old mother has wondered many times if I was dead, and why I did not come home.

I was at Salt Lake City seven years when I was taken sick with typhoid fever, and passed away after three weeks of suffering. I was glad to go. The first one to greet me over there was Minnie, my sister, who passed away.

Then there was poor Grandma Scott waiting for me.

Now, the reason I came here is this: My uncle lately passed away and left his property to my mother's children, and they have advertised in the papers for me.

Please tell them if they write to Salt Lake they will receive proof of my death and burial, and this will help them. Some of the family take your paper, and they will see it. I thank the guides for helping me.

NED MURREY.

Cecil A. Gaylord.

Well, I would like to send out a few words this evening, but as I come in contact with this medium I feel a little confused, as my mind was not very clear when I passed from the earth life, having a shock of paralysis, and I find it affects my head and memory, as there are a good many conditions and things I don't remember very clearly, or in other words there was a lapse of time in which I seem to have forgotten what happened. So I just want to say to those I have come to in earth life, that I was very much pleased when I found I was liberated from the physical body, for I was sick a long time. Now I wish to send this message to my family, for they do not believe much in Spiritualism, nor do they recognize spirit return. I have been trying to manifest to them for some time, but I cannot get a response, and I was informed that if I would come here and write, it would be good proof for them, for there are those who take the paper who will see the message and show it to them. Now I hardly know what to say that will be the most convincing to them. But will say that I passed away at Philadelphia, Pa. Aunt Maria and Mrs. Russell sat by my bed when my spirit left the body. My wife's name is Mattie, and her maiden name was Hayes. I had two daughters, one is married, her name is Lulu; the other one is Vera, she works in a store and lives with her mother.

My wife is married again, her husband's name is James Burns. I am well pleased with everything that they have done. I cannot send a long message this time, for the conditions affect the medium so that I cannot hold her. Just say that if any of my family wish to open up an avenue, I will try to make myself known, and also prove to them that the body has been destroyed, but the spirit lives.

I passed away about 13 years ago. I thank you very kindly.

THE PSYCHOGRAPH
OR
Dial Planchette.

This instrument is substantially the same as that employed by Prof. Hare in his early investigations. In its improved form it has been before the public for more than twelve years, and in the hands of thousands of persons has proved its superiority over the Planchette, and all other instruments which have been brought out in imitation, both in regard to certainty and correctness of the communications received by its aid, and as a means of developing mediumship.

Do you wish to investigate Spiritualism?
Do you wish to develop Mediumship?
Do you desire to receive communications?

The Psychograph is an invaluable assistant. A pamphlet with full directions for the FORMATION OF CIRCLES AND CULTIVATION OF MEDIUMSHIP with every instrument. Many who were not aware of their mediumistic gift, have, after a few sittings, been able to receive delightful messages. A volume might be filled with commendatory letters. Many who began with it as an amusing toy, found that the intelligence controling it knew more than themselves, and became converts to Spiritualism.

Capt D. B. Edwards, Orient, N. Y., writes: "I had communications (by the Psychograph) from many other friends, even from old settlers whose gravestones are moss-grown in the old yard. They have been highly satisfactory, and proved to me that Spiritualism is indeed true, and the communications have given my heart the greatest comfort in the severest loss I have had of son, daughter, and their mother."

Dr. Eugene Crowell, whose writings have made his name familiar to those interested in psychic matters, writes as follows: "I am much pleased with the Psychograph. It is very simple in principle and construction, and I am sure must be far more sensitive to spiritual power than the one now in use. I believe it will generally supersede the latter when its superior merits become known."

HARMONICS OF EVOLUTION.
The Philosophy of Individual Life, Based Upon Natural Science
As taught by modern masters of law. By Florence Huntley. An exceedingly interesting and distinctly valuable contribution to the literature of evolution, unfolding its laws from the deeper and clearer spiritual aspect, and indicating the defects of the Darwinian theory. Spiritualists and Materialists alike can gain much from its perusal. Price, finely bound in cloth, $2.

THE SOUL: ITS NATURE, RELATIONS AND EXPRESSIONS IN HUMAN EMBODIMENTS. Third edition now on sale. Price $1.00. This is one of the best books given by the guides of Mrs Cora L. V. Richmond. They are really lessons, published primarily, as a book of reference for those who have been members of the classes receiving them. This volume is a careful compilation from reports of lessons, containing the bases of the teachings.

Hindu Spiritualism.

As presented by the Hindu Spiritualist Magazine, published at Calcutta, India. It illustrates the terrible nature of Obsession which existed long before Modern Spiritualism commenced its manifestations at Hydesville, N. Y. It was common in the time of Christ. In fact, all through the ages Obsession has occurred. Thus we find that the one great evil that confronts angelic ministrations is the evil, ignorant, malicious obsessing spirit. Spiritualists, find the remedy.

Our readers may remember the description that we gave of our own experiments in hypnotism, in Number two, page 98, of this Magazine. We hypnotized a lady of magnificent brain powers, who was at the same time a woman of the highest piety. Our readers may also remember how we were one day frightened at what she said. One day we mesmerized her with unusual vigor, determined to separate her soul completely from the body, if possible. On other days, when after hypnotising her, we asked her a question she would immediately give a reply, but on that day, after we had finished, and asked her the usual questions, she gave no reply whatsoever. To quote from the narrative:

"Thus, when to my question as to whether she had fallen asleep she made no reply, I repeated it more earnestly and loudly. Still I got no reply. Then I felt her pulse,—there was no beating at the wrist! I felt her breast, there was no beating there too! And it seemed as if she had ceased to breathe altogether!

"I was greatly alarmed, and I began to demesmerize her. I knew that I was required to keep myself cool, and never lose my presence of mind in order to be successful; and so with great effort I avoided losing my presence of mind and began to bring her back to normal condition, in the usual way.

"Are you asleep?"

"Yet no answer. At last, after gigantic efforts,—I shall never forget what I suffered on that occasion,—I succeeded in eliciting a reply. She at last replied to my question. She was not asleep, but said she,—

"'I am dead."

"'Dead? What do you mean?"

"'Yes, dead," said she, "I have come to where people come after death.

"I was then very much alarmed. I asked her to come back at once. But she refused. She said,—

"'Why should I? Death is nothing, it is only a most desirable change.

"That may be, but don't you see my position? If you die, will not that break my heart?" I said in the anguish of my soul.

"She did not understand my position at all. She said that she had gone to a world infinite times better; she had gone there easily, and why should I, her brother, and loving her so well, be so selfish as to drag her back again to the vale of sorrows?

"I wept and importuned. I told her in reply, that if she did not come back I would possibly be hanged. She at last consented to return. At first there was a feeble beat at the wrist with a feeble attempt at breathing. Then she began to breathe violently and gasp as it were for breath, and at last she acquired her normal and natural condition.

"I resolved never again to mesmerize her until I had learned more of the art, and put my experiences before an expert and asked his opinion. But wonder of wonders, my sister refused to be mesmerized. When dead, she refused to come back, but when she had come back, she refused to be mesmerized lest she died again!

"The fact, is, the instinct of the fear of death, which she had overcome when dead, overtook her again when she had come back to life."

I was so frightened that from that I had to change my methods altogether. When I first made the attempt, I succeeded in mesmerizing her, though partially, in three or four days. To the question, "Are you asleep?" she replied, "Yes, but partially." "Do you see anything?" "Nothing distinct."

Continuing in this manner for a few days more, one day I got the reply that she was seeing something. "What is it?" She replied, "lights." "Whence come these lights?" She replied, "Can't say." "See more carefully, and pray to God more earnestly," I urged. And she said, "The lights come from the bodies of persons. I now see that each of these lights envelopes the body of a man—it indicates the presence of a man in high position in the spiritual world."

We have to explain here that scientific discoveries were not our object. Here was an opportunity for us, to see if I could develop clairvoyance in my subject; but I had not the least inclination that way. We had lost a dear brother, and had been crushed by the calamity. We wanted to know whether he was living and whether we should ever get him back. So when my subject began to see sights, men and things, from her bandaged eyes we had not the least desire to test whether or not she had developed clairvoyance, but whether she had come in contact with the spiritual world. So on every night, (for I mesmerized her nightly) my questions referred only to the spirits. Thus I asked:

"You see lights emitting from the bodies of persons, do you know them?"

"No."

"Are they of this world or of the spiritual world?"

"Don't know, probably they belong to the spirit world."

We had asked her to go to the spirit-world, if she could, question people whom she saw, and bring all the information from there about people, or friends. We wanted specially to know their modes of life and so-forth. Let me describe here, in narrative form, how she secured an entree into the spiritual world and what she saw there. I only give a short description of the experiences that she acquired when hypnotized by me.

One night, just as she had been mesmerized, she saw that some one, whose body was emitting light, was approaching her. He came and accosted her very kindly. He said, "You wish to see spirits, no doubt, but you have not been sufficiently etherealized to be able to do so. I will help you, however." Saying this he handed her a mirror. He told her to watch what she might see in it and the spirit world would be revealed to her. "The mirror that I am giving you," he said, "is called the 'Mirror of Wisdom."

With this mirror in hand she sat and gazed at it; and a most wonderful world was unfolded to her. It occurs to us that after she was mesmerized by us, she was mesmerized again more fully by another (a spirit)—the spirit who gave her the "Mirror of Wisdom" to acquaint herself with the condition of things in the world of spirits. Every night she was given this "mirror" after she had been mesmerized, and she described what she saw of the spirit-world through this "Mirror of Wisdom."

She said there were three classes of people in the spirit world as far as she could judge. The highest were those whose persons emitted light. Indeed, everyone of them was covered by a luminous fluid, some with a very mild effulgence, scarcely perceptible, while some were enveloped by dazzling lights, though they did not dazzle, but rather pleased the eyes, so that a look at it (the light) brought tears of joy. Everyone of them, again, had not the same light to clothe their body; some had yellow, some white, and some of other colors. Now, every part of the body of the blessed spirit was not equally illuminated by the same class of light. The light which enveloped the head was most dazzling, the breast emitted another class of light, and yet the fingers another. Some high spirits, when they laughed, appeared to be "vomiting full moons of gorgeous flowers." It seemed, in short, that after every laughter a flower came out of their mouths which floated for some time in the air and then disappeared. Nay, it seemed, that their smiles illuminated their face and persons. Those who were of the highest position seemed to have their bodies made up of light only: They were, indeed, men of light with a halo of glory round their heads.

They were young and old men and women, and their beauty was celestial. Though each had a separate style of beauty, yet it seemed that "each was more beautiful than the other." What struck her most was their purity and piety. Everyone seemed to be absolutely guileless, generous, merciful and good, pure and holy. Above all, every countenance seemed to be beaming with Bhakti or veneration for God. Now, it is impossible to describe how the very sight of the face created such notions in the mind. Yet it did; the mere sight of the face showed that he was angelic. The eye was turned a little upwards and this alone indicated that the thought of God and only the thought of God was in the mind of the spirit, while the entire face showed the owner not only loved everything and everyone, but above all, his Beloved, the God, the Master of his heart. It seemed everyone was communing with God, and the external was nothing to them.

She saw men and women joined together like the Siamese twins. They were loving couples in earth-life. It seemed half of the body of one had entered into half of the other. She further saw another wonder which was that sometimes a man was joined in this manner with two women, one on the left, the other on the right. She was impressed that they were man and wife or man and wives.

Let it be borne in mind that the material world is the expression of the spiritual world. Every material object has its soul, so the spirits too have theirs; again, what we have in this world the spirits have in theirs too. So if we have trees, mountains, rivers, lakes, etc., they have them in the other world. Yet the spirit-world had objects of which there was no counterpart in this world, at least part in this world. Thus, she saw flowers which she had not seen in this world.

The world in which they moved was as beautiful as they themselves were. Every substance emitted light, every tree, shrub creeper did the same. Many flowers that she saw were strange and indescribably grand and beautiful. Such were also the birds. The atmosphere was soothing, bracing and pleasing. It imparted ecstasy.

She swooned away in ecstasy at the sight of this world's beauty. When she recovered, she saw that the scene had changed. She saw that the world of beauty had vanished to give place to the world next in order. She saw spirits of a low order residing in a world something like that of ours. These looked just like men, indeed it is impossible to distinguish them from the men of the world. Only they are too many and too busy, so busy that they seemed to be occupied day and night, in divers occupations, religious, intellectual and physical. Thus, at one place there was an image of God and thousands were worshipping Him with flowers. Others there were who were doing Kirtan dancing, singing and playing the Mridanga. At places an Image was worshiped by a single votary, who sitting before it, was muttering his prayers with eyes shut. Others were doing secular work, teaching boys or giving lectures to an audience. Still another class, who were amusing themselves with gymnastic exercises, with rope-dancing, with high jumps, and so forth. This world was almost the same as ours, yet there were strange flowers and plants and fruits which are not to be seen here.

She had also an insight of the dark region. Let us call this Hell, and the one first described as Heaven. The two regions differ as poles asunder. In Heaven spirits emit light, in Hell they emit darkness. In the former region people are healthy and beautiful; in the latter they are sickly and ugly. In the region of the blessed, it is all quiet; there is scarcely any sound except that of music, in Hell it is noise and confusion, with the shrieks of the distressed and the loud and angry voice of combatants. In Heaven, walking is dancing, speaking is singing; in the lower regions there is no singing, but weeping. So different is the lower from the higher that even its sanitation, as it were, is had, a dreadful stench comes out of the place which is quite nauseating. Whence comes this stench? It is emitted no doubt from the aura of the men and women of the place, from the dirty rags and dreadful ulcers that cover them, and the impure atmosphere that surrounds them.

We said men and women were ugly, but they were more. Some of them were ill-shaped; some had no limbs; some had xzfiflff flvbghcj cmf nose; some were blind; some feathers; some were bald; some were hunch-backed; some could not walk but had to crawl on all fours. The seer was impressed that the unfortunate subjects had brought all these conditions upon themselves by their own actions.

Others had sores on their persons, and one such man she saw was in such a dreadful condition as to create indescribable horror, for almost his entire body was covered by sores. He had only one healthy spot in his body; and another, his tormentor (now tormentor, but his victim before) was trying to fasten his nails there in that—healthy spot, while the unfortunate creature was piteously shrieking for mercy. There were others who were fleeing before their enemies whom they had injured on earth. What appeared most wonderful was the retributive justice that was dispensed in that region. We shall describe two or three instances for the benefit of our fellow brethren on earth.

She saw that one man was in chains, while another was dragging him against his will as a man would drag a ferocious bear who had, however, been rendered harmless by some means or other. She was impressed that the man in chains had been a slave-dealer, or a terrible master, while the other who was leading him had perhaps been his slave or victim on earth.

She saw a man stabbed to death. The man, somehow or other, revived and tried to run away, but unsuccessfully, his tormentor catching him again, and again stabbing him to death. This seemed to be the only and incessant occupation of the two.

There was a trial. The culprit was a great man on earth—a judge, a magistrate or a general, or perhaps king who had power to award punishment to his fellows. And this he had done on earth in a ferocious manner to satisfy his brutal instincts. In this trial, however, he was the culprit and his victim sat in judgment over him. One by one they came forward to testify to the wrongs that he had inflicted upon the deponent. Finally he was adjudged guilty, and everyone tried to award the punishment which pleased him most.

Of course it was very hard to determine whether all these scenes which the seer saw actually happened. It is quite possible she was shown some scenes of the other world—of Heaven, of Hades and of Hell—to give her an idea of the correspondence between the two worlds—spiritual and material—and how they were governed.

There was one great moral that the seer could not help drawing from the scenes she witnessed. It is this: If you serve a man, you benefit him and yourself. You benefit yourself by serving him, and you also excite noble feelings in his mind which benefit him. In the same manner, you injure a man you harm yourself and harm your victim. You harm yourself by outraging moral laws and you harm your victim by inflaming his bad passions.

This you treat a man Kindly and when you go to the other world you find that your goodness has not been forgotten. The man whom you have benefited also usually grows up a grateful man and imitates the example of his benefactor. The latter thus gets his reward both in this and the other world.

But A murders B, and thereby does incalculable injury to his own soul. B, in the next world, influenced by revenge, murders A and thereby injures himself. The more ardent B is to take his revenge, the more he harms himself.

It is in this manner that tyrannical masters brutalize themselves and brutalize their victims. Take the case of rulers. If they are bad men they go to hell and carry their victims also along with them, though the latter are released much sooner than the former. The tyrant develops his love power and his feelings of cruelty and his victim is demoralized by vindictiveness.

We have in the above, described Heaven, Hades and Hell as described by the lady. From heaven comes generally all moral and religious inspiration to men on earth; from the second proceed generally the spiritual communications and manifestations, and from the third comes those who obsess men on earth and create other disturbances. What world will you choose for yourself, dear reader, Heaven, Hades of Hell? It is not difficult to go to Heaven or Hell, it is in your power to go to either—to the one or to the other. Cultivate spirituality if you wish to benefit yourself everlastingly.

A Case of Obsession.

Cases of obsession are plentiful, only it is not realized how they can be utilized for the purpose of solving that great problem in which men are so vitally interested, namely, the condition of the soul after death. In short, a true case of obsession will convince the most skeptical that—(1) man does not cease to exist after death, and (2) he has to account in the other world for his deeds on this earth. There is this difference between ordinary spiritual influence and obsession, that in the case of the latter, the spirit takes complete possession of the body of the possessed, and does not leave it unless forced to do so. Sometimes the spirit, in this manner, succeeds in killing its victim. In cases of obsession the spirit having taken complete possession of the body of the victim, can use the mind of the latter as if it were its own, and will, therefore, never commit a mistake in answering questions, unless it has an interest in deliberately misleading the questioner.

It was in the district of Jessore, in my native village, that information was brought to me that a ghost had possessed a young woman, and that the unfortunate husband, a tenant of ours, was anxious that I should go and help him if I could. Understanding that it was most likely a true case I did not delay a moment in arriving at the tenant's house which was about half a mile from ours. I saw the girl lying on her back in the veranda of the hut, one of her hands in the grip of her husband and the other in that of her father. They belonged to the barber caste. The girl was about sixteen and had the reputation of being a very modest, dutiful, industrious house-wife, she alone doing all the house work, having none else to help her. Her husband, who was about 22, did the business of a peddler. The girl was violently struggling to extricate her hands from the grip of her father and husband; was moaning and at intervals demanding the most abominable food that a human being could conceive. The fact is, it was the girl who was moaning while it was the ghost, which had taken possession of her, that was demanding to eat disgusting food.

When I arrived, there was of course a stir; but by a sign I expressed a desire that my presence should be kept a secret from the possessed girl, who from her position had failed to perceive my approach. So I went and sat near her without her knowledge. It was thus that I heard the moaning and the nature of the food she demanded. She said: "Bring me human ordure for I am very hungry. Bring me maggots from putrid sores, well-fried. Bring me decomposed human flesh, etc."

I perceived one thing. It was that whoever demanded the things had a goodly fund of imagination. For, it selected for its food the most abominable of things that could be conceived. I asked the father of the girl in a whisper, why they held her wrists so tightly? They said in reply that otherwise she would hurt herself. How? She would tear her hair and inflict wounds upon her body with her nails and teeth.

I then announced myself to the girl; I told her that I had come to shave her head and whip her for her wicked pranks. I told her, as if in great anger, that she was shamming, as everybody could see. "Keep quiet or if you move I shall have you mercilessly whipped." So saying I ordered the father and the husband to let go her wrists.

This was done; but no sooner done than the girl, as if in great triumph, began to tear her hair. Her wrists were immediately secured again. Finding that she could no longer tear her hair, she stuck her teeth like a leech in her arms as if to drink her own blood. While she was doing this, she was expressing, by moans, the anguish that she was herself suffering from these apparently self-inflicted wounds.

I saw at once that it was somebody else who was tormenting her cruelly, and that it was the girl who was moaning from pain. Who could that somebody be? And then, for a Hindu girl to demand to eat human flesh was impossible. Either she was shamming or somebody was betraying these disgusting tastes through her. I could see that she was not shamming. She had torn a large quantity of hair from her head and made one part of it almost bald; she had also bitten herself to such good purpose whenever she had found an opportunity, that she was bleeding all over. Her blood-shot eyes and her very features all showed that she had become then at least, a furious and fearful maniac.

I began again to threaten her with dire punishment with a view to frightening her. I said, addressing the girl—"Are you a ghost? Do you not know that I am an Ojha (exorcist) of the highest repute and can torment the most powerful of ghosts? Leave the body of this girl immediately, or I shall not only expel you but torment you more mercilessly than you are tormenting the unfortunate girl."

While I was addressing the girl, or the ghost possessing her, (for I was not sure whether it was really a case of obsession or a sudden fit of hysteria or insanity), she for the first time turned her face toward me; and our eyes met. And what did I see? I saw in the eyes of the girl the most malignant being that could be conceived, and that she was looking me through and through. They were not eyes of a pure girl of sixteen, but of a hideous demon. The horrible look, though it was about 9 in the morning and there were hundreds present, gave me a shivering— indeed, I felt, as if I were trembling all over. And the girl said with a mocking laugh, "you expel me? I will expel you. You are shivering with fear and you dare meddle with me?"

I saw it was all over with me as an exorcist. When there is a fight between an exorcist and a ghost, the one with the stronger will always triumphs. An Ojha, at one time, came to an obsessed woman to treat her and no sooner had he approached her than she—a frail woman—a lady—got up in fury and began to kick him. The Ojha did not show the least nervousness, he only smiled and said calmly, after a few kicks had been administered to him: "Now go—I have borne your kicks patiently, but, when in return, I begin kicking, it will go very hard with you." It is thus ghosts are exorcised.

But to continue: An Ojha came in the evening and being then in ill health I could not, to my great regret, attend the proceedings. And the sufferings of the poor girl were so great as also of her relations who attended upon her that I could not very well request postponement till the next morning. How Ojhas expel earth-bound souls who have obsessed human beings will be described hereafter.

It is done by the mere exercise of the will and by hypnotism and possibly other methods.

Well, when the Ojha came, the ghost possessing the girl said that he would never go and do that, on the other hand, if attempts were made to dislodge him from his comfortable home, he would "break the neck of the Ojha." But the Ojha, used to such threats, did not yield and the ghost had at last to go.

The ghost gave this account of himself. He was a "moochi" by caste. The "moochis" are the lowest in the scale of castes in that part of Bengal. They eat carrion, and their touch is considered abomination by the Hindus. Well, he said, he was going by that way when seeing the door open, he entered the body of the girl. To his delight he found that he had again been able to come to the world. He was in a very comfortable position and would never go.

"Why did you treat the girl so cruelly? Did she ever do you any hrm?" His answer was that cruelty gave him pleasure. He had been lorded over all his life; he was now taking his revenge.

"Why do you crave after dirty food?"

Answer: "Do you call them dirty? They are very sweet to me, for I am in a place where the entire surrounding is dirt. It is dirt everywhere and maggots."

There many instances of people in haunted houses being persecuted in this manner. I saw a house near the temple of Madanmohan in Calcutta, which the inmates had to leave because the human ordure used to be thrown everywhere, on beds, on food, plates, etc. Sometimes human skulls, sometimes bones of cows, dogs, cats, etc., would also be thrown.

Why do they do this? It seems, such is their penance for wicked acts on earth. So beware!

This "moochi" ghost told his name, the name of his village, the time of his death, etc., which were all found to be correct. The girl had surely no opportunity of acquiring the information about the earthly life of the ghost.

The Mistakes of Earth Life.

I am not here to speak of the mistakes of my own earth life, but of the mistakes of humanity at large.

As a human being, when residing in the flesh I made many mistakes and have suffered the penalty thereof, and thereby have become qualified and it has been made a part of my duty to address humanity and warn men and women of the fruit of earth-life mistakes as they affect spirit life.

Could each one of my readers review the past and realize the effect of each thought and act on the next or future life, as you must review them there, you would study to make no mistakes in this life.

Realizing the mistakes of my own earth life, and considering the experiences of my spirit life, I would be willing (were it possible) to be re-incarnated and pass another earth life working to enlighten humanity. But without such knowledge of the past to guard and guide my daily life, I should decline. But as no soul was ever reincarnated, that is, again born a babe, and thus re-entered a second time of probation, it is but a waste of time to discuss the subject.

What behooves each individual, especially those claiming to be Spiritualists, is to make the best use of the knowledge and the privileges which they now enjoy.

There are two classes of people who call themselves Spiritualists. First, the few who accept the teachings of Spiritualism and make them the rules or religion of life; who study the old-time rule and seek to obey the eleventh commandment, "Love your neighbor as yourself," i. e., love humanity. Second, the many who simply believe, who think not, care not, but let one day pass as another, and whose motto is "one world at a time," or, "make the most of this life while here and let the future care for itself."

This class of spirits is found in all churches as well as in the societies of Spiritualists, and is continually wanting tests from every medium they meet, though seldom willing to remunerate the medium for the time expended in giving the test. These are the people who make great mistakes; in fact, as they will find in the life to come, their whole earth life has been a great mistake.

This class again may be divided into many classes. Men whose whole life is spent in making money. Men who worship the dollar that bears the motto, "In God we trust." That which money can buy you cannot take with you when called to enter spirit life; but you can love money so well as to have what seems to be money and it will be as a millstone around your neck, dragging you down to earth to wander unseen and unknown in the marts of trade, or change, or amid the business scenes of those who, having taken your place there, are conducting business on the same rules you were governed by.

O the mistakes of the earth life! Where is to be found "The Brotherhood of Man? Where in all the marts of trade does honesty govern? Where does man regard his fellow man's interest and work for the good of humanity? Would man deal honestly with his fellow man, then would the longed-for millennium day draw near and earth be but a suburb of heaven. But so long as man regards his fellow man only as a stepping stone toward the achievement of his own ambition, so long will earth be to him a hell wherein he lives while building a hell—an individual hell in the life to come.

The few of whom we first spoke are "The Salt of the Earth," and but for them the race might cease to exist and make room for a new and better race.

Do you know that the present race is (comparatively speaking) a new and younger race upon the face of this old world? Race after race of men have been born, lived out their time and fulfilled their destiny, passing away to make room for a new and more progressive race—a race which will seek a higher state of spirituality. The present race is the outcome, the fruit of the past; but what is it doing to-day toward making conditions for a future race? Is the Caucasian race progressing as a race, keeping step and leading the so-called lower races of man upward as it should; or is it making a great mistake in dominating and subjecting them to its rule?

In many respects the present ruling race has not attained the point in progression attained by the preceding race, and one reason is that its leaders have adopted many of its progenitors' mistakes, overlooking its many better qualifications.

One great mistake of the present day is denying to woman the position that is rightly hers. Here let me say that when man becomes woman's equal on the spiritual plane he will gladly make her his equal on the material plane. Woman's intuitional nature is superior to man's cunning, calculating power, hence, while being ruled, she is in reality the ruling power.

To recite all of man's mistakes by reason of thus separating himself from woman and dwelling on a lower plane of life, would take more of time than now allotted to me.

Man was placed upon this and upon other orbs in space to become an individualized being, to acquire experience and a name, to fit himself for the next stage or condition of life and enter the path of eternal progression.

Man is not a "free agent." The terms "freedom" and "agent" were never married. Man lives in moral freedom. He has the power of choice. He knows good from evil and possesses conscience—a true guide when honestly followed—and can offer no excuse to himself when in the future life he sits in judgment upon the mistakes of his earth life. When the panorama of his life passes before him he will render righteous judgment upon himself and will occupy that home which his life of mistakes has prepared for him.

Your Sacred Word says that there are lords many and there are gods many, but the god created by Moses and Aaron said, "I am the Lord thy God. Thou shalt have no other gods before me, for I, the Lord thy God, am a jealous god." This was the god after whom David was patterned, "a man after God's own heart," but not an honest god, nor yet an honest man.

Jealousy and its running mate, hatred, are the attributes of finite man, not the attributes of God, and the fruits thereof constitute some of man's greatest mistakes.

Jealous of other gods as man is jealous of his neighbor, of his neighbor's position in life, for ambition has placed another higher in the social scale than he, because one has more wealth and power than he, or because another hath found favor with the woman he desired for himself.

Just in proportion as the fire of jealousy burns, hatred is born, and the child of this union is crime. Crime leads to death and death leads the victim of crime to hell. Hell on earth and hell in the spirit land, for, dear readers, there are many hells, as I well know, both here and over there.

Do not think that jealousy, hatred and crime can be condoned in this life or in the life to come; for before one can come out of the hell built by crime he must pay the penalty thereof even unto "the uttermost farthing."

There are other man-made gods besides the jealous, revengeful god of Moses. Mammon is the god of gods. His attributes are ambition, jealousy, hatred, cruelty, envy, greed and crime, and he has more worshipers than any other god.

Oh, how lamentable are the mistakes of man. This great mistake of worshiping a golden god; a god who demands that man shall forget the interests of his fellow man, his brother, his sister—only as he can use them to forward his own interests; that he shall forget his duty to father, mother and friend, and worship only him, "For I, the Lord thy God, am a jealous god. He transposeth the old rule to read, "Do your neighbor before your neighbor hath opportunity to do you." He inspires and bids you to study the death-bed advice of the old man to his sons: "Make money, my sons, make money honestly if you can, but make money."

"Money is the root of all evil" is an old saying. Some one has blasphemed against woman by placing her name instead of money at the head of this adage, but we cannot so degrade woman, the mother of the race. Woman, who bears the sweetest trinity of titles in the language of man, viz.: Sweetheart, Wife and Mother. Man cannot so cover up his mistakes, but must look to woman as his redeemer or savior from the fruits thereof.

O, could we paint with the pen in living words the panorama of life as it will pass before you shortly after you enter spirit life; or could we give to you the penetrating eye and introduce you into the hall of judgment where you could view another soul sitting in judgment on himself. You would then know of how little worth are the gifts of the great god Mammon. They are but temptations strewn in the path of life, and millstones around the neck in the future life. Could you realize that I, a spirit, a man who once dwelt on earth, a soul dwelling in a body like unto your own, am now speaking to you through the pen and hand of a mortal, showing to mind the great mistake in worshiping this god, methinks you would destroy his altars and worship there no more.

There is this difference between the god of Moses and the god Mammon. The god of Moses did repent him of some of his deeds, for instance that he made man; but the golden god never repents. He clutches his victims in a relentless grasp and gloats over the resultant misery and despair; laughs at man's ambition, avarice and crime while he uses him to lure others to his net. O, man, cut thy chains of gold; be free; declare thyself a man and honor the source of life from whence thou came.

Are there mistakes in life still greater than the worship of the god Mammon? O, yes, for his worship is purely on the material plane. Man is a spirit and cannot worship the golden god in spirit and in truth. Man is a divine being and should respect, obey and reverence the source of all being, but should not worship even The Source of Life.

Man in his ignorance and folly hath created another god, or hath transformed his fellow man, his brother, into the third part of a god, and has thrown all his sins and mistakes upon him. Then, falling on his knees, worshiped him, debasing himself, calling himself a "worm of the dust," the "chiefest among sinners," and other degrading titles, thereby implying that one man alone is divine, or the Son of God, while humanity is depraved and fallen, as proclaimed by Solomon the wise: "For that which befalleth the sons of men befalleth beasts: as the one dieth so dieth the other; yea, they have all one breath, so that a man hath no preeminence above a beast; for all is vanity."

The fable says that man partook of the tree of knowledge through the influence of woman. Except for her advice he would never have known. This awoke the anger of the gods of creation and they said: "Behold, the man hath become as one of us to know good and evil; lest he put forth his hand and take also of the tree of life, and eat, and live forever." The tree of knowledge leads to the tree of life, and truth is the fruit thereof, and although man makes mistakes while seeking knowledge, he will live forever, for no god can take from man his birthright.

Man degrades himself when he seeks a savior no more divine than he. Progression or growth is the only savior from the fruit of the sins and mistakes of earth life. Mistakes which, if he had eaten the fruit of the tree of knowledge, he would not have made. Arise, O man, stretch out thine arm and partake of this fruit, for knowledge leads to life, and truth becomes a savior. Let me assure you that thy "elder brother" desires not thy worship. He dwells with the sages and ancient masters in higher spheres; but your worship and your prayers draw him, as well as other advanced teachers, to earth, where they seek to teach and show you the way to the tree of knowledge and life, and release you from the bondage of ignorance and superstition, dogma and creed, thus releasing himself from the burden of mistakes which his brother man has placed upon his shoulders.

Listen, O man! Eat of the fruit of the tree of knowledge and be free. Be wise; seek for the truth and be saved from all the mistakes of the earth life.

THE BIBLE New and Revised Edition.

Authenticity, Credibility, Morality.

JOHN E. REMSBURG'S GREAT WORK

Ingersoll's desire that somebody should at last tell the whole truth about the Bible has been brilliantly fulfilled. No Freethinker worthy of the name can afford to pass over Remsburg's book in silence. Like Thomas Paine's "Age of Reason," may it, let us hope, find admirers and translators in other languages. And again, like Paine's book may this brilliant work bring to its author the praise of posterity.—Der Freidenker (Milwaukee).

This great work on the Bible by Mr. Remsburg is most valuable—it is an encyclopedia of information in regard to the Bible, and surpasses in importance all other works of the kind now published. It is up-to-date in every particular. Price, $1.25.

"AS IT IS TO BE."

A Very Suggestive Work Which Beams With Spiritual Truths.

This is a beautiful book, by Cora Lynn Daniels, and it scintillates with grand spiritual thought. An idea of this work can be obtained by reading the titles of a few of the chapters therein:

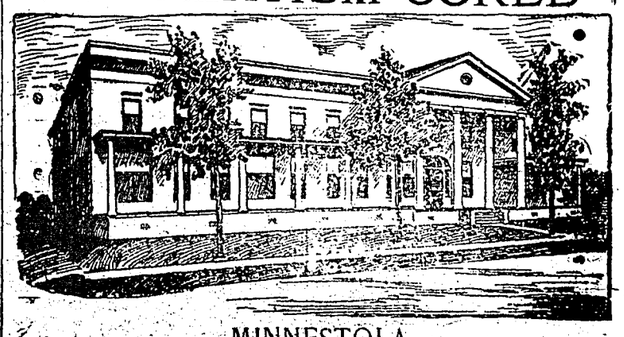
Discovery of a Lost Trail



BY CHARLES B. NEWCOMB,

Author of "All's Right with the World." Cloth, 75 pages. Mr. Newcomb made a distinct success with "All's Right with the World," which continues in the front rank of the Metaphysical books that are now so popular. The great number who have been cheered and strengthened by him will welcome another book by the wise teacher whose words of help are doing so much to make the world better by making men and women better able to understand and enjoy it.

"Discovery of a Lost Trail"

is a simple study of that strange and beautiful thing called life, but found in its scholarly simplicity. It will be in demand by many who have not previously read metaphysical writings. Price $1.50. For sale at this office.

RHEUMATISM CURED

MINNESOTA,

H. D. C. MILLS.

Opposite St. Joseph Sanitarium and Bath House. Mt. Clemmens, Mich.

Hindu Spiritualism.

As presented by the Hindu Spiritualist Magazine, published at Calcutta, India. It illustrates the terrible nature of Obsession which existed long before Modern Spiritualism commenced its manifestations at Hydesville, N. Y. It was common in the time of Christ. In fact, all through the ages Obsession has occurred. Thus we find that the one great evil that confronts angelic ministrations is the evil, ignorant, malicious obsessing spirit. Spiritualists, find the remedy.

Our readers may remember the description that we gave of our own experiments in hypnotism, in Number two, page 98, of this Magazine. We hypnotized a lady of magnificent brain powers, who was at the same time a woman of the highest piety. Our readers may also remember how we were one day frightened at what she said. One day we mesmerized her with unusual vigor, determined to separate her soul completely from the body, if possible. On other days, when after hypnotising her, we asked her a question she would immediately give a reply, but on that day, after we had finished, and asked her the usual questions, she gave no reply whatsoever. To quote from the narrative:

"Thus, when to my question as to whether she had fallen asleep she made no reply, I repeated it more earnestly and loudly. Still I got no reply. Then I felt her pulse,—there was no beating at the wrist! I felt her breast, there was no beating there too! And it seemed as if she had ceased to breathe altogether!

"I was greatly alarmed, and I began to demesmerize her. I knew that I was required to keep myself cool, and never lose my presence of mind in order to be successful; and so with great effort I avoided losing my presence of mind and began to bring her back to normal condition, in the usual way.

"Are you asleep?"

"Yet no answer. At last, after gigantic efforts,—I shall never forget what I suffered on that occasion,—I succeeded in eliciting a reply. She at last replied to my question. She was not asleep, but said she,—

"'I am dead.'

"'Dead? What do you mean?'

"'Yes, dead,' said she, "I have come to where people come after death.

"I was then very much alarmed. I asked her to come back at once. But she refused. She said,—

"'Why should I? Death is nothing, it is only a most desirable change.

"'That may be, but don't you see my position? If you die, will not that break my heart?' I said in the anguish of my soul.

"She did not understand my position at all. She said that she had gone to a world infinite times better; she had gone there easily, and why should I her brother, and loving her so well, be so selfish as to drag her back again to the vale of sorrows?

"I wept and importuned. I told her in reply, that if she did not come back I would possibly be hanged. She at last consented to return. At first there was a feeble beat at the wrist with a feeble attempt at breathing. Then she began to breathe violently and gasp as it were for breath, and at last she acquired her normal and natural condition.

"I resolved never again to mesmerize her until I had learned more of the art, and put my experiences before an expert and asked his opinion. But wonder of wonders, my sister refused to be mesmerized. When dead, she refused to come back, but when she had come back, she refused to be mesmerized lest she died again!

"The fact, is, the instinct of the fear of death, which she had overcome when dead, overtook her again when she had come back to life."

I was so frightened that from that I had to change my methods altogether. When I first made the attempt, I succeeded in mesmerizing her, though partially, in three or four days. To the question, "Are you asleep?" she replied, "Yes, but partially." "Do you see anything?" "Nothing distinct."

Continuing in this manner for a few days more, one day I got the reply that she was seeing something. "What is it?" She replied, "lights." "Whence come these lights?" She replied, "Can't say." "See more carefully, and pray to God more earnestly," I urged. And she said, "The lights come from the bodies of persons. I now see that each of these lights envelopes the body of a man—it indicates the presence of a man in high position in the spiritual world."

We have to explain here that scientific discoveries were not our object. Here was an opportunity for us, to see if I could develop clairvoyance in my subject; but I had not the least inclination that way. We had lost a dear brother, and had been crushed by the calamity. We wanted to know whether he was living and whether we should ever get him back. So when my subject began to see sights, men and things, from her bandaged eyes we had not the least desire to test whether or not she had developed clairvoyance, but whether she had come in contact with the spiritual world. So on every night, (for I mesmerized her nightly) my questions referred only to the spirits. Thus I asked:

"You see lights emitting from the bodies of persons, do you know them?"

"No."

"Are they of this world or of the spiritual world?"

"Don't know, probably they belong to the spirit world."

We had asked her to go to the spirit-world, if she could, question people whom she saw, and bring all the information from there about people, or friends. We wanted specially to know their modes of life and so-forth. Let me describe here, in narrative form, how she secured an entree into the spiritual world and what she saw there. I only give a short description of the experiences that she acquired when hypnotized by me.

One night, just as she had been mesmerized, she saw that some one, whose body was emitting light, was approaching her. He came and accosted her very kindly. He said, "You wish to see spirits, no doubt, but you have not been sufficiently etherealized to be able to do so. I will help you, however." Saying this he handed her a mirror. He told her to watch what she might see in it and the spirit world would be revealed to her. "The mirror that I am giving you," he said, "is called the 'Mirror of Wisdom."

With this mirror in hand she sat and gazed at it; and a most wonderful world was unfolded to her. It occurs to us that after she was mesmerized by us, she was mesmerized again more fully by another (a spirit)—the spirit who gave her the "Mirror of Wisdom" to acquaint herself with the condition of things in the world of spirits. Every night she was given this "mirror" after she had been mesmerized, and she described what she saw of the spirit-world through this "Mirror of Wisdom."

She said there were three classes of people in the spirit world as far as she could judge. The highest were those whose persons emitted light. Indeed, everyone of them was covered by a luminous fluid, some with a very mild effulgence, scarcely perceptible, while some were enveloped by dazzling lights, though they did not dazzle, but rather pleased the eyes, so that a look at it (the light) brought tears of joy. Everyone of them, again, had not the same light to clothe their body; some had yellow, some white, and some of other colors. Now, every part of the body of the blessed spirit was not equally illuminated by the same class of light. The light which enveloped the head was most dazzling, the breast emitted another class of light, and yet the fingers another. Some high spirits, when they laughed, appeared to be "vomiting full moons of gorgeous flowers." It seemed, in short, that after every laughter a flower came out of their mouths which floated for some time in the air and then disappeared. Nay, it seemed, that their smiles illuminated their face and persons. Those who were of the highest position seemed to have their bodies made up of light only: They were, indeed, men of light with a halo of glory round their heads.

They were young and old men and women and their beauty was celestial. Though each had a separate style of beauty, yet it seemed that "each was more beautiful than the other." What struck her most was their purity and piety. Everyone seemed to be absolutely guileless, generous, merciful and good, pure and holy. Above all, every countenance seemed to be beaming with Bhakti or veneration for God. Now, it is impossible to describe how the very sight of the face created such notions in the mind. Yet it did; the mere sight of the face showed that he was angelic. The eye was turned a little upwards and this alone indicated that the thought of God and only the thought of God was in the mind of the spirit, while the entire face showed the owner not only loved everything and everyone, but above all, his Beloved, the God, the Master of his heart. It seemed everyone was communing with God, and the external was nothing to them.

She saw men and women joined together like the Siamese twins. They were loving couples in earth-life. It seemed half of the body of one had entered into half of the other. She further saw another wonder which was that sometimes a man was joined in this manner with two women, one on the left, the other on the right. She was impressed that they were man and wife or man and wives.

Let it be borne in mind that the material world is the expression of the spiritual world. Every material object has its soul, so the spirits too have theirs; again, what we have in this world the spirits have in theirs too. So if we have trees, mountains, rivers, lakes, etc., they have them in the other world. Yet the spirit-world had objects of which there was no counterpart in this world, at least part in this world. Thus, she saw flowers which she had not seen in this world.

The world in which they moved was as beautiful as they themselves were. Every substance emitted light, every tree, shrub creeper did the same. Many flowers that she saw were strange and indescribably grand and beautiful. Such were also the birds. The atmosphere was soothing, bracing and pleasing. It imparted ecstasy.

She swooned away in ecstasy at the sight of this world's beauty. When she recovered, she saw that the scene had changed. She saw that the world of beauty had vanished to give place to the world next in order. She saw spirits of a low order residing in a world something like that of ours. These looked just like men, indeed it is impossible to distinguish them from the men of the world. Only they are too many and too busy, so busy that they seemed to be occupied day and night, in divers occupations, religious, intellectual and physical. Thus, at one place there was an image of God and thousands were worshipping Him with flowers. Others there were who were doing Kirtan dancing, singing and playing the Mridanga. At places an Image was worshiped by a single votary, who sitting before it, was muttering his prayers with eyes shut. Others were doing secular work, teaching boys or giving lectures to an audience. Still another class, who were amusing themselvs with gymnastic exercises, with rope-dancing, with high jumps, and so forth. This world was almost the same as ours, yet there were strange flowers and plants and fruits which are not to be seen here.

She had also an insight of the dark region. Let us call this Hell, and the one first described as Heaven. The two regions differ as poles asunder. In Heaven spirits emit light, in Hell they emit darkness. In the former region people are healthy and beautiful; in the latter they are sickly and ugly. In the region of the blessed, it is all quiet; there is scarcely any sound except that of music, in Hell it is noise and confusion, with the shrieks of the distressed and the loud and angry voice of combatants. In Heaven, walking is dancing, speaking is singing; in the lower regions there is no singing, but weeping. So different is the lower from the higher that even its mastication, as it were, I had, a dreadful stench comes out of the place which is quite nauseating. Whence comes this stench? It is emitted no doubt from the aura of the men and women of the place, from the dirty rags and dreadful ulcers that cover them, and the impure atmosphere that surrounds them.

We said men and women were ugly, but they were more. Some of them were ill-shaped; some had no nose; some were blind; some feathers; some were bald; some were hunch-backed; some could not walk but had to crawl on all fours. The seer was impressed that the unfortunate subjects had brought all these conditions upon themselves by their own actions.

Others had sores on their persons, and one such man she saw was in such a dreadful condition as to create indescribable horror, for almost his entire body was covered by sores. He had only one healthy spot in his body; and another, his tormentor (now tormentor, but his victim before) was trying to fasten his nails there in that—healthy spot, while the unfortunate creature was piteously shrieking for mercy. There were others who were fleeing before their enemies whom they had injured on earth. What appeared most wonderful was the retributive justice that was dispensed in that region. We shall describe two or three instances for the benefit of our fellow brethren on earth.

She saw that one man was in chains, while another was dragging him against his will as a man would drag a ferocious bear who had, however, been rendered harmless by some means or other. She was impressed that the man in chains had been a slave-dealer, or a terrible master, while the other who was leading him had perhaps been his slave or victim on earth.

She saw a man stabbed to death. The man, somehow or other, revived and tried to run away, but unsuccessfully, his tormentor catching him again, and again stabbing him to death. This seemed to be the only and incessant occupation of the two.

There was a trial. The culprit was a great man on earth—a judge, a magistrate or a general, or perhaps king who had power to award punishment to his fellows. And this he had done on earth in a ferocious manner to satisfy his brutal instincts. In this trial, however, he was the culprit and his victim sat in judgment over him. One by one they came forward to testify to the wrongs that he had inflicted upon the deponent. Finally he was adjudged guilty, and everyone tried to award the punishment which pleased him most.

Of course it was very hard to determine whether all these scenes which the seer saw actually happened. It is quite possible she was shown some scenes of the other world—of Heaven, of Hades and of Hell—to give her an idea of the correspondence between the two worlds—spiritual and material—and how they were governed.

There was one great moral that the seer could not help drawing from the scenes she witnessed. It is this: If you serve a man, you benefit him and yourself. You benefit yourself by serving him, and you also excite noble feelings in his mind which benefit him. In the same manner, you injure a man you harm yourself and harm your victim. You harm yourself by outraging moral laws and you harm your victim by inflaming his bad passions.

This you treat a man Kindly and when you go to the other world you find that your goodness has not been forgotten. The man whom you have benefited also usually grows up a grateful man and imitates the example of his benefactor. The latter thus gets his reward both in this and the other world.

But A murders B, and thereby does incalculable injury to his own soul. B, in the next world, influenced by revenge, murders A and thereby injures himself. The more ardent B is to take his revenge, the more he harms himself.

It is in this manner that tyrannical masters brutalize themselves and brutalize their victims. Take the case of rulers. If they are bad men they go to hell and carry their victims also along with them, though the latter are released much sooner than the former. The tyrant develops his love power and his feelings of cruelty and his victim is demoralized by vindictiveness.

We have in the above, described Heaven, Hades and Hell as described by the lady. From heaven comes generally all moral and religious inspiration to men on earth; from the second proceed generally the spiritual communications and manifestations, and from the third comes those who obsess men on earth and create other disturbances. What world will you choose for yourself, dear reader, Heaven, Hades of Hell? It is not difficult to go to Heaven or Hell, it is in your power to go to either—to the one or to the other. Cultivate spirituality if you wish to benefit yourself everlastingly.

A Case of Obsession.

Cases of obsession are plentiful, only it is not realized how they can be utilized for the purpose of solving that great problem in which men are so vitally interested, namely, the condition of the soul after death. In short, a true case of obsession will convince the most skeptical that—(1) man does not cease to exist after death, and (2) he has to account in the other world for his deeds on this earth. There is this difference between ordinary spiritual influence and obsession, that in the case of the latter, the spirit takes complete possession of the body of the possessed, and does not leave it unless forced to do so. Sometimes the spirit, in this manner, succeeds in killing its victim. In cases of obsession the spirit having taken complete possession of the body of the victim, can use the mind of the latter as if it were its own, and will, therefore, never commit a mistake in answering questions, unless it has an interest in deliberately misleading the questioner.

It was in the district of Jessore, in my native village, that information was brought to me that a ghost had possessed a young woman, and that the unfortunate husband, a tenant of ours, was anxious that I should go and help him if I could. Understanding that it was most likely a true case I did not delay a moment in arriving at the tenant's house which was about half a mile from ours. I saw the girl lying on her back in the veranda of the hut, one of her hands in the grip of her husband and the other in that of her father. They belonged to the barber caste. The girl was about sixteen and had the reputation of being a very modest, dutiful, industrious house-wife, she alone doing all the house work, having none else to help her. Her husband, who was about 22, did the business of a peddler. The girl was violently struggling to extricate her hands from the grip of her father and husband; was moaning and at intervals demanding the most abominable food that a human being could conceive. The fact is, it was the girl who was moaning while it was the ghost, which had taken possession of her, that was demanding to eat disgusting food.

When I arrived, there was of course a stir; but by a sign I expressed a desire that my presence should be kept a secret from the possessed girl, who from her position had failed to perceive my approach. So I went and sat near her without her knowledge. It was thus that I heard the moaning and the nature of the food she demanded. She said: "Bring me human ordure for I am very hungry. Bring me maggots from putrid sores, well-fried. Bring me decomposed human flesh, etc."

I perceived one thing. It was that whoever demanded the things had a goodly fund of imagination. For, it selected for its food the most abominable of things that could be conceived. I asked the father of the girl in a whisper, why they held her wrists so tightly? They said in reply that otherwise she would hurt herself. How? She would tear her hair and inflict wounds upon her body with her nails and teeth.

I then announced myself to the girl; I told her that I had come to shave her head and whip her for her wicked pranks. I told her, as if in great anger, that she was shamming, as everybody could see. "Keep quiet or if you move I shall have you mercilessly whipped." So saying I ordered the father and the husband to let go her wrists.

This was done; but no sooner done than the girl, as if in great triumph, began to tear her hair. Her wrists were immediately secured again. Finding that she could no longer tear her hair, she stuck her teeth like a leech in her arms as if to drink her own blood. While she was doing this, she was expressing, by moans, the anguish that she was herself suffering from these apparently self-inflicted wounds.

I saw at once that it was somebody else who was tormenting her cruelly, and that it was the girl who was moaning from pain. Who could that somebody be? And then, for a Hindu girl to demand to eat human flesh was impossible. Either she was shamming or somebody was betraying these disgusting tastes through her. I could see that she was not shamming. She had torn a large quantity of hair from her head and made one part of it almost bald; she had also bitten herself to such good purpose whenever she had found an opportunity, that she was bleeding all over. Her blood-shot eyes and her very features all showed that she had become then at least, a furious and fearful maniac.

I began again to threaten her with dire punishment with a view to frightening her. I said, addressing the girl—"Are you a ghost? Do you not know that I am an Ojha (exorcist) of the highest repute and can torment the most powerful of ghosts? Leave the body of this girl immediately, or I shall not only expel you but torment you more mercilessly than you are tormenting the unfortunate girl."

While I was addressing the girl, or the ghost possessing her, (for I was not sure whether it was really a case of obsession or a sudden fit of hysteria or insanity), she for the first time turned her face toward me; and our eyes met. And what did I see? I saw in the eyes of the girl the most malignant being that could be conceived, and that she was looking me through and through. They were not eyes of a pure girl of sixteen, but of a hideous demon. The horrible look, though it was about 9 in the morning and there were hundreds present, gave me a shivering—, indeed, I felt, as if I were trembling all over. And the girl said with a mocking laugh, "you expel me? I will expel you. You are shivering with fear and you dare meddle with me?"

I saw it was all over with me as an exorcist. When there is a fight between an exorcist and a ghost, the one with the stronger will always triumphs. An Ojha, at one time, came to an obsessed woman to treat her and no sooner had he approached her than she—a frail woman—a lady—got up in fury and began to kick him. The Ojha did not show the least nervousness, he only smiled and said calmly, after a few kicks had been administered to him: "Now go—I have borne your kicks patiently, but, when in return, I begin kicking, it will go very hard with you." It is thus ghosts are exorcised.

But to continue: An Ojha came in the evening and being then in ill health I could not, to my great regret, attend the proceedings. And the sufferings of the poor girl were so great as also of her relations who attended upon her that I could not very well request postponement till the next morning. How Ojhas expel earth-bound souls who have obsessed human beings will be described hereafter.

It is done by the mere exercise of the will and by hypnotism and possibly other methods.

Well, when the Ojha came, the ghost possessing the girl said that he would never go and do that, on the other hand, if attempts were made to dislodge him from his comfortable home, he would "break the neck of the Ojha." But the Ojha, used to such threats, did not yield and the ghost had at last to go.

The ghost gave this account of himself. He was a "moochi" by caste. The "moochis" are the lowest in the scale of castes in that part of Bengal. They eat carrion, and their touch is considered abomination by the Hindus. Well, he said he was going by that way when seeing the door open, he entered the body of the girl. To his delight he found that he had again been able to come to the world. He was in a very comfortable position and would never go.

"Why did you treat the girl so cruelly? Did she ever do you any hrm?" His answer was that cruelty gave him pleasure. He had been lorded over all his life; he was now taking his revenge.

"Why do you crave after dirty food?"

Answer: "Do you call them dirty? They are very sweet to me, for I am in a place where the entire surrounding is dirt. It is dirt everywhere and maggots."

There many instances of people in haunted houses being persecuted in this manner. I saw a house near the temple of Madanmohan in Calcutta, which the inmates had to leave because the human ordure used to be thrown everywhere, on beds, on food, plates, etc. Sometimes human skulls, sometimes bones of cows, dogs, cats, etc., would also be thrown.

Why do they do this? It seems, such is their penance for wicked acts on earth. So beware!

This "moochi" ghost told his name, the name of his village, the time of his death, etc., which were all found to be correct. The girl had surely no opportunity of acquiring the information about the earthly life of the ghost.

The Mistakes of Earth Life.

I am not here to speak of the mistakes of my own earth life, but of the mistakes of humanity at large.

As a human being, when residing in the flesh I made many mistakes and have suffered the penalty thereof, and thereby have become qualified and it has been made a part of my duty to address humanity and warn men and women of the fruit of earth-life mistakes as they affect spirit life.

Could each one of my readers review the past and realize the effect of each thought and act on the next or future life, as you must review them there, you would study to make no mistakes in this life.

Realizing the mistakes of my own earth life, and considering the experiences of my spirit life, I would be willing (were it possible) to be reincarnated and pass another earth life working to enlighten humanity. But without such knowledge of the past to guard and guide my daily life, I should decline. But as no soul was ever reincarnated, that is, again born a babe, and thus re-entered a second time of probation, it is but a waste of time to discuss the subject.

What behooves each individual, especially those claiming to be Spiritualists, is to make the best use of the knowledge and the privileges which they now enjoy.

There are two classes of people who call themselves Spiritualists. First, the few who accept the teachings of Spiritualism and make them the rules or religion of life; who study the old-time rule and seek to obey the eleventh commandment, "Love your neighbor as yourself," i. e., love humanity. Second, the many who simply believe, who think not, care not, but let one day pass as another, and whose motto is "one world at a time," or, "make the most of this life while here and let the future care for itself."

This class of spirits is found in all churches as well as in the societies of Spiritualists, and is continually wanting tests from every medium they meet, though seldom willing to remunerate the medium for the time expended in giving the test. These are the people who make great mistakes; in fact, as they will find in the life to come, their whole earth life has been a great mistake.

This class again may be divided into many classes. Men whose whole life is spent in making money. Men who worship the dollar that bears the motto, "In God we trust." That which money can buy you cannot take with you when called to enter spirit life; but you can love money so well as to have what seems to be money and it will be as a millstone around your neck, dragging you down to earth to wander unseen and unknown in the marts of trade, or change, or amid the business scenes of those who, having taken your place there, are conducting business on the same rules you were governed by.

O the mistakes of the earth life! Where is to be found "The Brotherhood of Man? Where in all the marts of trade does honesty govern? Where does man regard his fellow man's interest and work for the good of humanity? Would man deal honestly with his fellow man, then would the longed-for millennium day draw near and earth be but a suburb of heaven. But so long as man regards his fellow man only as a stepping stone toward the achievement of his own ambition, so long will earth be to him a hell wherein he lives while building a hell—an individual hell in the life to come.

The few of whom we first spoke are "The Salt of the Earth," and but for them the race might cease to exist and make room for a new and better race.

Do you know that the present race is (comparatively speaking) a new and younger race upon the face of this old world? Race after race of men have been born, lived out their time and fulfilled their destiny, passing away to make room for a new and more progressive race—a race which will seek a higher state of spirituality. The present race is the outcome, the fruit of the past; but what is it doing to-day toward making conditions for a future race? Is the Caucasian race progressing as a race, keeping step and leading the so-called lower races of man upward as it should; or is it making a great mistake in dominating and subjecting them to its rule?

In many respects the present ruling race has not attained the point in progression attained by the preceding race, and one reason is that its leaders have adopted many of its progenitors' mistakes, overlooking its many better qualifications.

One great mistake of the present day is denying to woman the position that is rightly hers. Here let me say that when man becomes woman's equal on the spiritual plane he will gladly make her his equal on the material plane. Woman's intuitional nature is superior to man's cunning, calculating power, hence, while being ruled, she is in reality the ruling power.

To recite all of man's mistakes by reason of thus separating himself from woman and dwelling on a lower plane of life, would take more of time than now allotted to me.

Man was placed upon this and upon other orbs in space to become an individualized being, to acquire experience and a name, to fit himself for the next stage or condition of life and enter the path of eternal progression.

Man is not a "free agent." The terms "freedom" and "agent" were never married. Man lives in moral freedom. He has the power of choice. He knows good from evil and possesses conscience—a true guide when honestly followed—and can offer no excuse to himself when in the future life he sits in judgment upon the mistakes of his earth life. When the panorama of his life passes before him he will render righteous judgment upon himself and will occupy that home which his life of mistakes has prepared for him.

Your Sacred Word says that there are lords many and there are gods many, but the god created by Moses and Aaron said, "I am the Lord thy God. Thou shalt have no other gods before me, for I, the Lord thy God, am a jealous god." This was the god after whom David was patterned, "a man after God's own heart," but not an honest god, nor yet an honest man.

Jealousy and its running mate, hatred, are the attributes of finite man, not the attributes of God, and the fruits thereof constitute some of man's greatest mistakes.

Jealous of other gods as man is jealous of his neighbor, of his neighbor's position in life, for ambition has placed another higher in the social scale than he, because one has more wealth and power than he, or because another hath found favor with the woman he desired for himself.

Just in proportion as the fire of jealousy burns, hatred is born, and the child of this union is crime. Crime leads to death and death leads the victim of crime to hell. Hell on earth and hell in the spirit land, for, dear readers, there are many hells, as I well know, both here and over there.

Do not think that jealousy, hatred and crime can be condoned in this life or in the life to come; for before one can come out of the hell built by crime he must pay the penalty thereof even unto "the uttermost farthing."

There are other man-made gods besides the jealous, revengeful god of Moses. Mammon is the god of gods. His attributes are ambition, jealousy, hatred, cruelty, envy, greed and crime, and he has more worshipers than any other god.

Oh, how lamentable are the mistakes of man. This great mistake of worshiping a golden god; a god who demands that man shall forget the interests of his fellow man, his brother, his sister—only as he can use them to forward his own interests; that he shall forget his duty to father, mother and friend, and worship only him, "For I, the Lord thy God, am a jealous god. He transposeth the old rule to read, "Do your neighbor before your neighbor hath opportunity to do you." He inspired and bids you to study the death-bed advice of the old man to his sons: "Make money, my sons, make money honestly if you can, but make money."

"Money is the root of all evil" is an old saying. Some one has blasphemed against woman by placing her name instead of money at the head of this adage, but we cannot so degrade woman, the mother of the race. Woman, who bears the sweetest trinity of titles in the language of man, viz.: Sweetheart, Wife and Mother. Man cannot so cover up his mistakes, but must look to woman as his redeemer or savior from the fruits thereof.

O, could we paint with the pen in living words the panorama of life as it will pass before you shortly after you enter spirit life; or could we give to you the penetrating eye and introduce you into the hall of judgment where you could view another soul sitting in judgment on himself. You would then know of how little worth are the gifts of the great god Mammon. They are but temptations strewn in the path of life, and millstones around the neck in the future life. Could you realize that I, a spirit, a man who once dwelt on earth, a soul dwelling in a body like unto your own, am now speaking to you through the pen and hand of a mortal, showing to mind the great mistake in worshiping this god, methinks you would destroy his altars and worship there no more.

There is this difference between the god of Moses and the god Mammon. The god of Moses did repent him of some of his deeds, for instance that he made man; but the golden god never repents. He clutches his victims in a relentless grasp and gloats over the resultant misery and despair; laughs at man's ambition, avarice and crime while he uses him to lure others to his net. O, man, cut thy chains of gold; be free; declare thyself a man and honor the source of life from whence thou came.

Are there mistakes in life still greater than the worship of the god Mammon? O, yes, for his worship is purely on the material plane. Man is a spirit and cannot worship the golden god in spirit and in truth. Man is a divine being and should respect, obey and reverence the source of all being, but should not worship even The Source of Life.

Man in his ignorance and folly hath created another god, or hath transformed his fellow man, his brother, into the third part of a god, and has thrown all his sins and mistakes upon him. Then, falling on his knees, worshiped him, debasing himself, calling himself a "worm of the dust," the chiefest among sinners," and other degrading titles, thereby implying that one man alone is divine, or the Son of God, while humanity is depraved and fallen, as proclaimed by Solomon the wise: "For that which befalleth the sons of men befalleth beasts; as the one dieth so dieth the other; yea, they have all one breath, so that a man hath no preeminence above a beast; for all is vanity."

The fable says that man partook of the tree of knowledge through the influence of woman. Except for her advice he would never have known. This awoke the anger of the gods of creation and they said: "Behold, the man hath become as one of us to know good and evil; lest he put forth his hand and take also of the tree of life, and eat, and live forever." The tree of knowledge leads to the tree of life, and truth is the fruit thereof, and although man makes mistakes while seeking knowledge, he will live forever, for no god can take from man his birthright.

Man degrades himself when he seeks a savior no more divine than he. Progression or growth is the only savior from the fruit of the sins and mistakes of earth life. Mistakes which, if he had eaten the fruit of the tree of knowledge, he would not have made. Arise, O man, stretch out thine arm and partake of this fruit, for knowledge leads to life, and truth becomes a savior. Let me assure you that thy "elder brother" desires not thy worship. He dwells with the sages and ancient masters in higher spheres; but your worship and your prayers draw him, as well as other advanced teachers, to earth, where they seek to teach and show you the way to the tree of knowledge and life, and release you from the bondage of ignorance and superstition, dogma and creed, thus releasing himself from the burden of mistakes which his brother man has placed upon his shoulders.

Listen, O man! Eat of the fruit of the tree of knowledge and be free. Be wise; seek for the truth and be saved from all the mistakes of the earth life.

THE BIBLE New and Revised Edition.

Authenticity, Credibility, Morality.

JOHN E. REMSBURG'S GREAT WORK

Ingersoll's desire that somebody should at last tell the whole truth about the Bible has been brilliantly fulfilled. No Freethinker worthy of the name can afford to pass over Remsburg's book in silence. Like Thomas Paine's "Age of Reason," may it, let us hope, find admirers and translators in other languages. And again, like Paine's book, may this brilliant work bring to its author the praise of posterity.—Der Freidenker (Milwaukee).

This great work on the Bible by Mr. Remsburg is most valuable—it is an encyclopedia of information in regard to the Bible, and surpasses in importance all other works of the kind now published. It is up-to-date in every particular. Price, $1.25.

"AS IT IS TO BE."

A Very Suggestive Work Which Beams With Spiritual Truths.

This is a beautiful book, by Cora Lynn Daniels, and it scintillates with grand spiritual thought. An idea of this work can be obtained by reading the titles of a few of the chapters therein;

The process of Dying; Light and Spirit; The Law of Attraction; Sense of the Spirit; What Is unconscious Will; Fear; Astrology; The God-Soul of Man; The Drama; A Day in Heaven. Price $1.00.

The Wonders of Life.

By ERNEST HAECKEL, Author of "The Riddle of the Universe." This book is confined to the realm of organic science, and treats of "The Knowledge, Nature, Functions and History of Life." Price, cloth, $1.50.

FROM SOUL TO SOUL.

By Emma Rood Tuttle. This volume contains the best poems of the author, and some of the best popular songs with the music by eminent composers. The poems are admirably adapted for recitations. 225 pages, beautifully bound. Price $1.

WORLD MAKING.

A scientific explanation of the birth, growth and death of worlds. By Samuel Phelps Leland, Ph. D., LL. D. Nicely bound in cloth. Price 75 cents.

The Development of the Spirit

After Transition. By the late M. Faraday. The origin of religions, and their influence upon the mental development of the human race. Price, 10 cents.

RADIANT ENERGY and Its Analysis, Its Relation to Modern Astrophysics, by Edgar L. Larkin, Director Lowe Observatory, Echo Mountain, California. This book treats upon a new branch of research into the laws of nature, and to the student or even an admirer of the modern astrological literature will surely come with great interest. Price, cloth, $1.75.

Womanly Beauty ITS ATTAINMENT OF FORM AND FEATURES

The cultivation of personal beauty, based on Hygiene and Health Culture, by twenty physicians and specialists, and edited by Albert Turner. A valuable book for women and therefore for the whole world. Price in elegant cloth binding, $1.00. For sale at this office.

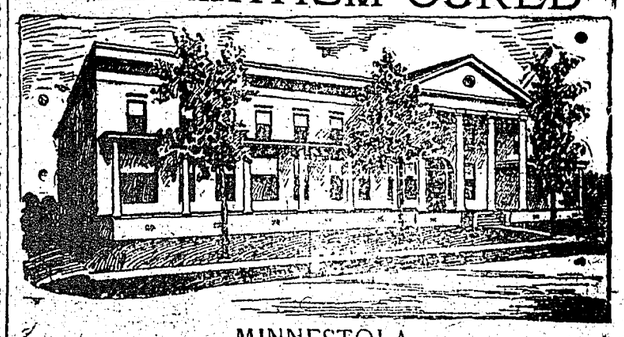
THE WIDOW'S MITE, AND OTHER PSYCHIC PHENOMENA.

BY ISAAC K. FUNK.

A remarkable book of intense interest to all, whether Spiritualists or Materialists, investigators or believers.

The author has embodied in this book an account of his wonderful personal experience, and has culled from other sources the experiences of others, including scientists of world-wide repute, making a volume of great value. 538 octavo pages. Price, cloth, $2.

THE TALMUD Selections from the contents of that ancient book, its commentaries, teachings, poetry, and legends. Also brief sketches of the men who made and commented upon it. By H. Polang. 859 pp. Price, cloth, $1



Discovery of a Lost Trail

BY CHARLES B. NEWCOMB,

Author of "All's Right with the World." Cloth, 12mo, pages. Mr. Newcomb made a distinct success with "All's Right with the World," which continues in the front rank of the Metaphysical books that are now so popular. The great number who have been cheered and strengthened by him will welcome another book by the wise teacher whose words of help are doing so much to make the world better by making men and women better able to understand and enjoy it.

"Discovery of a Lost Trail" is a simple study of that strange and beautiful thing called life, but grand in its scholarly simplicity. It will be in demand by many who have not previously read metaphysical writings. Price $1.50. For sale at this office.

Weighed in the Balance and Found Wanting.

Such is the judgment of the thinking world in regard to the Christian church, if trust can be placed in reports coming to us from every quarter. They must reconstruct their creed along broader lines, else go to the wall.

The political and independent press of the world are the best exponents of public opinion to which we have access. The Morning Star, of Rockford, Ill., is an ably conducted journal, and it relates facts which must awaken thought. Read:—

"Much comment of late has been made on the dwindling of church attendance in nearly all of the denominations, both Catholic and Protestant. Tables of statistics show a very remarkable falling off. Indeed, it is so marked a decline, if the number of worshipers diminishes for some years in the same ratio, it seems not unreasonable to predict many of the churches may be closed. On the other hand, the churches were never so wealthy as now. Never were their finances so flourishing, their real estate so valuable. The sum of church holdings aggregates an enormous amount. Entirely free from taxation, the burdens they bear are very light. What the significance of richly adorned temples from which the people have departed? The causes of this condition of things finds many to offer explanations. The labor advocates say the church has no interest in advocating the cause of the workman, and is given over to the capitalist interest. Therefore, says the Christian Register, labor has left the church. Others assert that the higher criticism of the Bible has shaken the foundations of the ancient faith and left the people outside the church door. Others speak of skepticism, materialism, the craze for amusements, the Sunday newspaper, the Sunday sports—cycling, automobiling. A thousand reasons are given for the lack of interest in the Sunday service—a thousand reasons except the one that seems to explain the matter, at least to some degree; that is the fact that the church fails to meet the needs of the people. The question arises: Is the interest in religion waning in proportion to church attendance? We know knotty points of theology once absorbed a large share of the New England mind. How archaic and old-fashioned such discussions would seem now! People do not sit any longer in the family circle and discuss foreordination and free will, predestination and falling from grace. It would be considered ridiculously antiquated to talk of such things as whets to the intellect and stimulants to the spiritual life. * * Such religious feeling as exists now is different from the crucial ideas of the past. It is broader, less bigoted and narrow, but is more vague and hazy. Agnosticism has entered more largely into the modern mind than we perhaps are aware. Even from the Roman Catholic church, which rests on authority and positive dogmatic teaching, the defections are said to be large, though not so large as from some of the other churches. The time will come, perhaps, when the people will ask for a positive faith, however simple, a set of reasonable affirmations clearly enunciated. It is possible for people to be religious without ever putting foot inside a church."

Gross Negligence.

Those persons who fail to receive answers to letters inquiring the address of publishers of books, and failing to inclose a two-cent stamp for reply, should know the reason of the failure to receive an answer, without further inquiry. Parties asking for letters on their own business should always inclose a two-cent stamp, or better still, inclose a self-directed envelope, stamped, then they can safely count on a prompt answer to inquiries.

Welcome Intelligence.

Judge Tenney, of Madison, Wisconsin, is one of the world's ablest thinkers and writers. Numerous publications have fallen from his pen during the last few years, in which he has dared to express opinions adverse to the dominant faith. His Electrical Theory of the Universe has met the very general approval of scholars, as have his logical and philosophical ideas that there was no beginning of time, and hence cannot have an ending; that on the contrary matter is eternal, though subject to change.

As an interested reader of everything coming into our possession from Judge Tenney's pen, we have been lately largely compensated by reading an article of his in a late number of The Truth Seeker of June 8, wherein as an Agnostic, the Judge reviews the question of immortality at considerable length, during which he says:

"Personally I cannot believe that thought, logic, intelligence and conscience are the product of general forces acting upon different parts of my body. The ultimate force in nature is generally thought to be electro-magnetic. Are the thoughts I am here recording the product of electro-magnetism? That seems impossible. There is a mind, an individuality within, enabled by such forces to express thought. No two persons entertain or express the same thoughts in the same language. There seems a mental individuality peculiar to each, varying far more in conduct, thought and expression than would be the case if blind force alone controlled. This indicates a personal soul presides over and controls our thought and action. Though other forces are concurrent and necessary for the preservation of life, intelligence and conduct do not seem to originate with them. I cannot believe that lightning thinks, reasons, talks, or that it has a conscience or a good moral character! Or that a piece of flesh, alive or dead, through which electric currents are passing, is thinking about something.

"It seems to me there is an individual, intelligent power within us which may be called a soul; that this power, sustained by an appropriate personal environment, is what makes the man. When the man dies, the soul moves out, and by some natural law secures more appropriate quarters in the vast universe, guided thereto by the same law of nature which provided that from which the soul has just departed.

"There is no new matter in the universe. What there is has always existed, though undergoing constant modification. Nor are there any new souls. All are changing conditions and embodiment when nature requires it. Their individuality seems plain to my mind. There is nothing more wonderful about this than there is about the eternal preservation of matter. Both have always been and always will be. That we cannot understand minutely how this can be accomplished is no evidence against it. There are several things we don't know all about yet!

"Aside from these suggestions there are other things well known to us which indicate we are possessed of individual souls, and that these survive the dissolution of the body. I am not a Spiritualist, in the ordinary sense, but there are many well-attested phenomena said to be developed through mediums and others directly, which indicate not only that souls survive the body, but, under favoring conditions, can communicate with the living. On this subject, as upon any others of a mysterious nature, no man can be more skeptical than myself. I am well satisfied much of the so-called spiritual phenomena are absolute frauds, but no more than are the tales in the holy Testaments. It is easy for persons to be deceived by others. I have experienced personally, and had well authenticated accounts from honest acquaintances, which leave no material doubt in my mind of the survival of our spirits."

There is much more to the article, and we have slightly abridged what we have copied, but the general drift of it is in the same direction, and is welcome intelligence to all of us.

The Fountain of Error.

The pernicious effect of Bible teaching is shown in the multi-assassin Orchard's statement, who said after his arrest he was placed in a steel cell, and kept there until he made his confession. Ten days after his incarceration he was visited by McPartland, who began to tell him Bible stories, and of his own experience in Pennsylvania among the Mollie Maguires. He told the story of King David, and how he caused Uriah to be killed in order to get his wife. Though King David was a monster, McPartland said, he repented and became a man after God's own heart. Paul's conversion was elaborated upon. Then McPartland intimated, if Orchard would repent and confess his sins, he, too, would receive forgiveness and a heavenly reward.

We could relate many cases of this character, criminals whose hands were dyed with blood. They played the part of cowards, called their victims from their beds at midnight to point the way to other residences, then struck them down with swords, avoiding firearms because their discharge would frighten other victims they had determined to slaughter. The wretches took their lessons from "good old Gideon," and literally reveled in crime, professedly in the name of humanity, and churchmen crown their leader a hero, and honor him as such.

That cause which demands the spilling of blood in its interest is a false one, and the fame of those acquired by slaughter will dim as the barbaric ages recede.

Ingersoll Again.

"I believe in marriage, and I hold in contempt the opinions of those long-haired men and short-haired women who denounce the institution of marriage. The marriage of one man to one woman is the citadel and fortress of civilization"—Col. Ingersoll.

Look Out! Look Out!!

Next week we will give a full account of the suspension of the Light of Truth, and what has led its editor, Willard J. Hull, to "Backslide" from Spiritualism, and commence work on what he regards as a broader and higher field. The proprietor has sunk $50,000 in his vain effort to sustain the paper and put it on a paying basis. We will also give a new chapter in the history of "King Solomon's Mine." Mr. Hull in retiring says: "As for myself I am clearly and forever done with a seot and propaganda thus instituted, and sought to be maintained, at the expense of a debauched and prostituted mediumship." Look out for next week's Progressive Thinker! wherein Mr. Hull will be "weighed in the Balance."

In Paris, France.

Mr. and Mrs. Richmond Arrived Safely in Paris —Mrs. Richmond's Remarkable Poem on Board of Steamer, Received with Admiring Applause.

To the Editor:—Mrs. Richmond and myself were landed in fairly good shape, after a very rough passage, at Havre, about nine o'clock last Tuesday morning. Leaving Havre about 11 a. m. we had a delightful three-hours ride, through a beautiful country, to Paris. We had little or no difficulty in finding a fairly good hotel at very reasonable rates, very near the depot. We have been doing Paris since, mostly on foot, and have seen many of the notable places here. Mrs. Richmond is on an "auto tour" about the city while I am writing this. Will write you about my impresions of Paris later. But what I wish to write about at present is of a GREAT MANIFESTATION of SPIRIT POWER on the steamship during our passage.

On the passenger list of the steamer Mrs. Richmond and I made a group by ourselves. Then there was a small group of French-speaking Americans, a small group of French people—some of whom spoke English. The balance of the passengers—225—were members of an international Bohemian society on their way to Prague to take part in a great tournament of Olympic games to be held there this summer. They all spoke English, but only one of them could speak French. The crew of the boat were all French, and spoke no English, excepting the captain, and none of them understood Bohemian. The conversation on board was Bohemian and French, so we seemed to have entered a foreign country as soon as we left New York, but could converse with any of the English-speaking passengers when we wanted to.

Sunday evening we were to have a grand entertainment (for the benefit of the Seamen's Hospitals—which is customary on steamships). Mrs. Richmond said she would take part in the entertainment; she might give them a poem. She does not, as is well known, speak French at all, much less Bohemian. I told her I thought it would be useless; that she could not interest that crowd at all. She said she thought Ouina was equal to any occasion, so I went to the committee arranging the program, consisting of Frenchmen and Bohemians, the heads of the committee being professional musicians spoke no English, so I had to explain through the Bohemian who spoke French that Mrs. Richmond would give them a poem, and so her name went on the program, which was printed on shipboard, some very elaborately, that sold as high as $20 (100 francs) apiece.

When the time came for the entertainment, it commenced by a short speech in French, followed by one in Bohemian. Then there were songs in French, Bohemian and English, and violin solos, all of which being very fine were liberally applauded. Then Mrs. Richmond stepped forward, actually looking grand, and announced "Our Voyage Home to Bohemia." And then in a loud voice delivered a poem, interspersed with Bohemian and French words, which I was sure Mrs. Richmond did not know. When she finished there was shouting and cheering and clapping of hands, and applauding, until she stepped forward again and put the finishing touches to the poem in just one stanza. Then there was renewed applause. I have never known Mrs. Richmond to have had such an ovation. It was some time before the people could get settled down to listen to the rest of the program, which was its finest part musically, there being some celebrated artists on the program. A number who are in the habit of crossing the ocean frequently, told me it was the finest entertainment they had ever attended on shipboard. It netted close to $800, and Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond was the feature of the entertainment. The next day she was kept busy receiving congratulations and signing her autograph. The purchasers who paid $20 for the fancy programs wanted her AUTOGRAPH on the programs. One, a wealthy Bohemian from Texas, wanted her to write a poem on the back of HIS program. One young man, Bohemian, told me the elder people were so affected by the poem that the tears were rolling down their cheeks. The French and Americans were equally enthusiastic. They all said "Why! it it was such a SURPRISE.'

If you can put this in readable form I would like to have the account of the entertainment published, so your readers can see what a Spiritualist can do with the aid of the spirits. I will write you my impressions of Paris later. WM. RICHMOND.

The Why of It.

Madison C. Peters tells why preachers fall. He says: "The average minister has only to preach a twenty-minute or half-hour sermon on Sunday, and this, with a mid-week meeting constitutes his week's work. The rest of the days he is often loafing trying to kill time. Even the weekly sermon may not be his own effort. He may be either too lazy or too ignorant to compose a sermon of his own, so he simply treats the congregation to a rehash of some other man's brain, and for this he often receives a good salary. Do you wonder the worst passions of these men become inflamed by their lives of idleness? They are only human. They eat and drink of the choicest products of earth; they visit only the homes of the wealthy, where they are sumptuously entertained; they do not try to keep the body in subjection to the spirit by any kind of restraint or mortification, and so their carnal passion becomes the master of their being, and they fall away from grace, shocking the community and scandalizing the church. I would make all work for their money."

Where all are selfish, the sage is no better than the fool, and only rather more dangerous.—Froude.

There is work that is work and there is play that is play; there is play that is work and work that is play. And in only one of these lies happiness.—Gelett Burgess.

Which?

Confucius, the Chinese philosopher, born 551 years before our era, taught the possible doctrine of loving one's friends, and giving justice to one's enemies; and China, guided by his teachings, looks upon war as a barbarous pastime. The Chinese is the oldest and most populous empire on earth, and has been the most exempt from desolating wars—never one, so far as history relates—for the propagation of its religious views.

Jesus taught his disciples to love their enemies, and they who claim to be his followers are the most warlike people on the globe.

Which of these founders of a system of religious faith and practice is most worthy of our regard?

FRANK M. DONOVAN.

Led to believe that Cynthia would continue to give him the messages he craved, Mr. Haddock carried out the program, made the divorce possible and married Miss Willett as soon as the decree was granted. The crowd was so anxious that he should lose no time that he received a message directing him to proceed to Colorado with Miss Willett, there to wait the decision of the court. When the divorce was granted Mr. Haddock carried out the further orders from the spirit world and the marriage was consummated at once.

At this point the court adjourned with Mrs. Donovan's deposition half read.

Frank M. Donovan.

His Notorious Career in Connection with Legerdemain Spiritualism—He tells a Most Remarkable Story of Deception Practiced under the Garb of Truth—Another Important Object Lesson for Spiritualists Everywhere to Consider.

For nearly twenty years The Progressive Thinker has been a strenuous advocate of the underlying principles connected with SPIRIT RETURN. The importance of that in the world to-day cannot be overestimated; it overshadows everything else. IT STANDS as proof positive of another life, and what of more importance than that? But while SPIRIT RETURN is of such great value to the world, working its impressive way with various modifications into all the sects and cults of this life, and exerting an influence for good that is felt and seen in the churches, at the same time it has attracted to it those who IMITATE the phenomena, and in various ways bring disgrace upon our cause.

Everybody nearly connected with Spiritualism has heard of the notorious Frank M. Donovan, who at one time was exceptionally prominent as a spirit artist, a slate-writing and test medium.

He was a very important feature at Lily Dale and other camps, and the "manifestations" occurring in his presence were regarded as most marvelous, and they were, indeed—but they were simply the result of legerdemain in some one of its many phases, and spirits were in NO WISE CONNECTED THEREWITH.

Donovan is not a medium, but is a PERFECT MASTER in imitating the the genuine phenomena resulting from SPIRIT RETURN, and is thus able to DECEIVE THE GULLIBLE, AND SOMETIMES THE VERY ELECT.

The Progressive Thinker is cosmopolitan; no other paper ever published in our ranks has begun to equal it in the BROAD LILNES it has pursued. IT IS EDUCATIONAL all along the various lines in connection with Spiritualistic and occult matters. Its readers know exactly the status of our Cause the world over—the good and the bad, and that which is sublimely enlightening to every thoughtful mind.

In publishing the following about the adventures and conduct of Frank M. Donovan, we give a DISAGREEABLE PHASE of this great movement, but one that will tend to open the eyes of thousands to the insidious overwhelming legerdemain practices which The Progressive Thinker has long endeavored to eliminate from our ranks. Read what Frank M. Donovan has been doing and saying, as vividly portrayed in the Los Angeles (Cal.) Examiner of June 21, 1907, as follows:

Woman Tells Story of Spirit Conspiracy. — "Professor" Arranged Marriage and Separation of Haddock by "Spooks."

A woman's deposition has eliminated the spirit world from the Haddock trial, revealing, instead of ghostly messengers from the dead, the full details of the most audacious knavery that ever separated a gullible old man from his fortune.

The deposition of Mrs. F. M. Donovan gave the inside information on the real "influences" which controlled the last years of Charles G. Haddock. Mrs. Donovan is the wife of the "medium" who is said to have been the principal factor in the disbursement of the Haddock estate.

The promised sensation was a little long in coming. The same old men who have never missed a minute of this trial were on hand when the court room opened yesterday morning. Wrinkled, tottering, doddering old men, who will soon know all about the other side, but who cannot wait for the revelation, they limped in and took their seats with the same expectant bearing which has distinguished them from the beginning of this remarkable case. The spook trial is a drawing card with the old men, and they got their sensation late in the afternoon.

All the morning and part of the afternoon Frank D. Haddock held the stand. He spoke of his early life, he commented on his grandfather's belief in spirit manifestations, he told how the old man received a message commanding him to go down to the Los Angeles postoffice, where he would meet the woman who was to be his second wife.

Under cross-examination he owned up that he had practiced as a medium, knowing that he had no powers in that direction, and admitted that his work had been raw fakery. And under this sort of testimony the interest flagged.

At last Attorney Barstow began to read Mrs. Donovan's deposition and the old men in the back rows leaned forward, their hands at their ears. Here was rich meat indeed. At last they were to hear something from the inner circle; the story of one who knew how the aged millionaire had been influenced to take new wives and pay for them in sums reaching beyond a President's yearly salary.

Over near the door a very large man with crisp, curly hair, shifted in his seat and mopped his face with a damp handkerchief. It was "Professor" Donovan, listening to an old story and judging frim his expression, not a very pleasant one.

Attorney Barstow's rasping voice reached every corner of the room and slowly the whole plot and the methods by which it was darried out came to light.

Mrs. Donovan was aware of the strange intimacy between her husband and the aged capitalist. They became inseparable. Mr. Haddock had an insatiable desire for messages from the departed spirits. Through Mr. Donovan he received them, written on slates which Mr. Haddock carried away with him.

"Mr. Haddock wanted the messages and of course he got them," was the way the deposition expressed it.

It told of the three-cornered relationship existing between Mr. Haddock, Lee Nelson, the second wife, and Professor Donovan.

In reply to a question as to the part which Mr. Haddock played in this relationship, the answer was short and to the point, telling the whole story in four words.

"He was the victim," the deposition read.

Mr. Haddock was constantly receiving messages through the mediumship of Professor Donovan. According to Mrs Donovan's deposition, the aged millionaire was a very willing dupe. He never questioned a slate writing; only once did he object to obeying a message from the dead.

In the words of the deposition:

"He would no more have thought of disobeying a spirit message than he would have jumped out of that window."

Bit by bit the coil unwound. There were places where Mrs. Donovan's testimony halted and she did not seem anxious to give answers.

The deposition went on to tell how the marriage between Lee Nelson and Mr. Haddock had been arranged by Professor Donovan. It told how the woman and the professor fixed up a spirit message from one who in his lifetime had been Mr. Haddock's attorney. This message advised Mr. Haddock to give Lee Nelson the sum of $50,000 as an "ante-nuptial settlement." Strong proof of Mr. Haddock's faith in such "ghostly" communications is found in the fact that he at once complied, turning over to the woman a block of stock in the Chicago Trust Company, which she afterward sold for $60,000.

In the words of the deposition:

"In view of the marriage Mr. Haddock was to do certain things and all Lee Nelson had to do was to marry him."

The deposition told of the wedding tour of the aged capitalist under special convoy of Professor Donovan and his wife. It was at Colorado Springs that the quartet became a quintet, and Lee Nelson Haddock, already anxious to be rid of her aged spouse, was comforted by the introduction of Cynthia Willett of Denver, already picked out as the third wife of the old man.

The spirits again got busy and arranged the details of a separation between Charles G. Haddock and Lee Nelson Haddock. Even the slight details leading up to this divorce were arranged by slate wrlings, and it was at one of these that Mr. Haddock balked for the first and last time. He did not fancy the part that was assigned to him by his "spirit friends," but when the time came he obeyed instructions to the letter.

In Mrs. Donovan's words:

"I should like to say in behalf of the old gentleman—and he WAS a gentleman—that that was the first time he raised his hand against the advice of the spirits."

Not all these messages came from Professor Donovan. Cynthia Willet was not a slate writer, but she went into trances and thus gave messages to Mr. Haddock. This was while Lee Nelson was still his wife and during a visit to Catalina.

The deposition reads:

"Cynthia Willett had no slate-writing gift. The messages which she was to deliver were planned by the crowd, and Cynthia would then go into a trance and give the old gentleman the message. This happened every day."

Frank M. Donovan, arch-conjurer of make-believe phantoms, and expert in the black arts, yesterday unfolded to the "Examiner" the whole story of his occult influence over the late millionaire Charles G. Haddock; how he had led him into marrying several wives; how he had done the tricks of the slate-writing phenomena at the expense of thousands of credulous people, and how he had succeeded in making the spirits command the aged Mr. Haddock to dispose of his fortune.

The story is amazing. Mr. Donovan declared he would repeat it in court whenever he should be called to testify.

Earlier in the day yesterday the deposition had been read in court of Mrs. Donovan, wife of Frank M. Donovan. It gave a fairly clear insight into the methods by which the aged Mr. Haddock had been deceived and defrauded of his wealth, and its reading created a sensation in the courtroom.

But Mrs. Donovan's expose paled to insignificance beside the things related by her husband to the "Examiner."

With the ingenuousness of an innocent child, Mr. Donovan revealed himself as the man who was the direct cause of the $1,000,000 litigation now being prosecuted in the Superior Court.

Unburdens His Conscience.

Point by point the man unburdened his conscience. Unsparingly he explained the methods used by him to get possession of the old millionaire's money, telling everything and leaving out nothing, not even the most incriminating evidence against himself.

Uncanny apparitions and mysterious communications with specters were demonstrated by Donovan as being the simplest things in the world—just a quick turn of the hand or a clever manipulation of wires, and the startling trick was done.

He and his wife were the spirits, he said, who prompted every action of Charles G. Haddock when the old man came to them and asked to be placed in communication with the spirit of his departed wife.

And the spirit was "produced and made to order," according to the directions of Donovan. First it was a simple reading costing the trifling sum of $2; then there came seances that cost $50. Sometimes as many as thirty sittings were given the old man in one single day and night, and as the "developing" of the credulous millionaire progressed the sums grew larger and larger.

"Haddock was a remarkably intelligent man, shrewd in business, and well posted in science," said Donovan. "Those are the kind that come easy to an up-to-date medium. He wanted to communicate with his dead wife, and the answers I framed for him filled him with such happiness that I could have gotten his whole fortune right there. But a fellow has to be careful in this business.

Got Old Man Under Control.

"Little by little I got him under my control, I mean under the influence of the spirit of his departed spouse, and from that time on I made him do just what I wanted him to do. First I told him (or, rather, the spirits did) that he should go to the postoffice, where he would find a woman, young and attractive, wearing a rose in her waist. That young woman was to be his future wife, as the spirit of Mrs. Haddock No. 1 had ordered him to marry again at the first opportunity.

"Well, the poor old sucker went to the postoffice and there met Lee Nelson, a young woman who was with me in the game, and who played her part as I directed. They became pretty well acquainted; and a short time after their first meeting, the spirits, good spirits they were, ordered him to deed over to this fiancee $50,000 worth of shares in the Title and Trust Company of Chicago."

"Haddock did not hesitate. He gave her the shares and she sold them for $1.20 a share, netting us about $60,000. When he married her a year later he gave her about $3,000 worth of jewelry, $5,000 worth of clothes and several houses, one of them a beautiful residence on Flower street. By the time she had secured about $100,000 through the kind offices of the spirits I realized that it was time to divorce them. The spirits duly instructed him to slap his wife in public and a divorce was promptly obtained on the ground of cruelty.

"Two days later the omnipresent specters made him acquainted with another of my young women friends whose business it was to make him whose business it was to make him fall in love with her. That was Cynthia, a poor dressmaker, who afterward became Mrs. Haddock No. 3. Poor girl, she was really good to him after she had become his wife, and she died from the shock when she was told that the relatives of her husband had brought suit against him.

"Up to the time I left Los Angeles I had complete control over Haddock. I made a good pile of money out of him and then went East to establish myself in a more restful business. I had become terribly nervous during the five years I gave seances in Los Angeles, and a trying business it was, I can assure you.

$1,000 to Develop Son.

"The old man gave me $1,000 one day to 'develop' his grandson, Frank D. Haddock, who is now trying to break the will. The spirits had told him Frank was a natural medium, who ought to be developed. And it was the spirits, too, who told him to pay Frank a monthly allowance of $125 while he was being developed under my direction.

"It was the easiest money I ever made.

"One day, in St. Louis, I was caught in the act. An old fool consulted me about some young woman, another man's wife, I think, with whom he wanted to run away. I managed to see the photograph of the young person and at once ordered fifty small oil paintings made from it at $1.50 apiece. Of course, the paintings appeared regularly between the slates which he brought for the seance and he paid me $500 apiece. I had to order some more, but before I got them the package was opened by the wrong party and the trick was exposed. I had to leave St. Louis in a hurry, you can imagine.

"But now I have given up all these things. I am an honest bottle manufacturer, out in Indiana, and I think it will do the people at large some good to know how Spiritualism is worked.

"I shall repeat this statement in court and demonstrate everything to the satisfaction of the most incredulous."

Mr. Donovan is at the Hollenbeck Hotel. He will be called as a witness by the plaintiffs in the case and promises to give an exhibition of the marvelous power of his telegraphic machine.

Mysterious Spirit Telegraph.

He then proceeded to explain the mechanism of his telegraphic machine with which he fooled hundreds of people into believing that the spirits had heard their questions and announced that he would produce that same machine in the court in order to fool the judge, the jurors, the lawyers and everybody else.

"I will tell them the truth," he said, "and show them how the thing is worked. Any electrician will see the machine is an ingenious fake, just the same as were the slate writings I gave to Haddock and all the others. I had to do it. Haddock and scores of others came to me with the idea that I could do wonders, and I had to satisfy them in order to get their money. I was in the business for the money and I gave the people all the spooks they wanted."

As an illustration of the credulity of some of his patrons, Mr. Donovan gave an incident that occurred in St. Paul shortly after he had left Los Angeles.

"A fine looking young woman came to me one evening," he said, "and told me I was her only salvation. She wrote four questions which were were promptly recorded by my machine. They were:

"'Shall I trust my husband?

"'Can I catch him in flagranti?

"'Would this evening be the right time?

"'Will I succeed?'

Got What She Wanted.

"The answers of the machine were just the kind she was looking for, and I got $50 for the trouble. Three hours later she returned, all flushed with excitement, and placed a heavy roll of bank notes before me on the table. 'You did me the greatest service in the world,' she panted, 'and here is the money for your aid.' I did not count the money. I told her I had used up all my magnetism in her cause and would not be able to give another seance for a whole month, perhaps, an act which was worth much more money than could possibly be in that roll. She then asked me to concentrate my magnetism upon her again for the rest of the night, and that I would not have to regret it. She rushed out and when she came back the next morning she gave me $5000 and said that I was the most wonderful man in existence. Her explanation was that she had Interesting Reminiscences.

In Relation to W. T. Stead, a World-Renowned Investigator of Psychic Phenomena, and of Great Prominence in Political Affairs in England.

In view of the stir made by W. T. Stead in his recent visit to America, in his address before the Peace Conference and in other ways, I have thought it might be of interest to his many admirers if I made use of some notes made concerning this noble agitator during his visit to Chicago in 1893.

I had long been an admirer of his moral bravery and unique literary style, as I had read a good percentage of his ever-flowing contributions to the general press ever since the days of the Pall Mall Gazette editorship, and in all I had read of his psychical experiments and experiences I observed that he held firmly and frankly to the facts of his investigations in the face of the most doubtful and carping enquirers, without fear or favor; therefore I thought it a piece of good fortune when his interest in our published psychic experiences moved him during his busy Chicago visit, to look us up, and meet him in our own home, where we held an entirely informal conversation on our mutual experiences and other matters.

I found him personally, very interesting, looking very like his often published portraits, very genial, natural and cordial in manner, but earnest and enthusiastic when referring to the stand he had felt himself morally obliged to take in regard to public morals and psychical discoveries.

While he earnestly talked, he walked back and forth, apparently intensely interested in his own trend of thought, his large blue eyes occasionally dreamy in expression as he related some of his more fantastic—sounding experiences in psychical fields, and again speaking with fun as he recalled some humorous phase of his crusade against vice in high places, which resulted in his imprisonment.

Mr. Stead is a man either very liable to shock or charm those whom he meets, and my opinion it that he would as willingly shock as charm; it depends upon the point of view of those whom he meets which he does; conventional, superficial-minded people who judge others by their conformity to mere routine codes of propriety in conversation, would most likely feel some surprise at his straightforward frankness of utterance as were the congregation of clergymen whom he startled on his recent visit to this country in the interest of peace by his emphatic use of the word "Damn!" But those thinkers who like to have their own thought stirred and quickened by original thinkers, even if in opposition, would like him.

I confess to having an admiration for his daring courage of conviction, honesty of purpose, and real tenderneess of heart, which makes him venture in the most unexpected fashion whenever he thinks there is real need of reform in abuses of power or law. His is an honest, good face, across which often a gleam of merriment darted, for deep as is his sense of the sadness and mystery of life, is his appreciation of the absurdities and follies of humanity.

His manner is frankly, cordial, dignified and aggressive when he chooses. He is often boyishly exuberant and enthusiastic. He courts no man's favor and fears no one's displeasure. What he thinks he says, in whosesoever company he may be. He is brimful of original theories on all sorts of subjects. He is a great talker, but he is above all a wide-awake journalist, seeking matter to interest his readers, and as he talks sometimes in the most startling way, he is keenly awake to the effect of his theories on his hearers, trying his public apparently in advance. We had opportunity to note this as we met him afterward in different positions. Once as the guest of honor at a large dinner party at which were present also Richard Hodgson, Secretary of the American Psychical Research Society; also Prof. Carl Van Bergen, of Sweden—all the guests more or less interested in Psychical Research, upon which subject Mr. Stead was the leader in convention.

Later we accompanied him to interview—with but indifferent success—several Chicago mediums; and at another time at a private club devoted to the investigation of Psychic mysteries by more or less doubting searchers after evidence, we listened to a discourse on his experiences, by Mr. Stead, who showed all the strength of his own clear conviction in the face of very strenuous questioning by disbelievers.

But my most interesting reminiscence of Mr. Stead's own psychic power I have reserved as a close to his paper. It was as follows:

In the interview at our home he referred to Mr. Underwood's and my own articles on our experiences published in the Arena magazine, and elsewhere, and he wished very much to have me try to get a communication for him through my hand, but as this had never been done when other than our own two selves were alone present, I did not expect anything, but tried to please him, without result. Then he said he wanted I should try after he went away, and he would try to get communication from his "Julia," if he found time, as he had one or two other engagements to meet people at the Auditorium Hotel that evening, and had promised to give a short address at some public meeting.

I fully intended when Mr. Stead left to keep my promise, and sit for automatic writing, but a friend called; then I had some household duties to attend to, and when quite late, I recalled that I had promised my friend, Miss Lilian Whiting, who was visiting Chicago for a few days, that I would meet her the following afternoon at the Chicago Woman's Club; and I had learned from the friend who called that evening that for some reason the Club rooms would not be open on that day. So I wrote her at some little length, telling her of Mr. Stead's call, and other matters, and after Mr. Underwood carried the letter out to the mail box so it would reach her early the next morning, I found it so late, and I was so tired I could not fulfill my promise to try for writing, but went directly to bed instead.

The following evening we arrived at the house where we were to meet Mr. Stead at dinner, a short time in advance of his appearance, with his pleasing eldest son Henry, who accompanied his father on this visit to America.

Mr. Stead, after greeting those present, came directly over to the quiet corner of the parlor where I ws seated, and in his earnest way, asked at once:

"Mrs. Underwood, diff you try for writing from Pharos last night for me, as you promised me you would?"

"No," I replied, "I am sorry to say I did not. I was kept from doing so by other matters."

He looked at me curiously, and then said, "Did you write a letter to anyone last night quite late?"

Then it flashed across my mind about my writing to Miss Lilian Whiting, mainly concerning his call, which was really the cause of my failure to keep my promise to him, and I told Mr. Stead this; "but," I asked, "how came you to know about my writing this letter, which I have scarcely thought about since Mr. Underwood carried it to the box late the night before?"

He then explained that when he returned from addressing the meeting at a late hour, the previous night, when he went to his room at the Auditorium, he thought of my promise, and asked "Julia" to tell him by written answer to his questions, whether I had received any reply from Pharos, and if so, to what purport, and in reply she wrote; "No, Mrs. Underwood did not try. She had household duties to look after; then she wrote a letter to a friend, which took up her time until she thought it too late, as she was tired, and went to bed instead."

I have always thought of this as a splendid test of Mr. Stead's mediumship, for he knew nothing of my domestic arrangements. He did not know of the presence of Miss Lilian Whiting in Chicago, and would, of himself, scarcely think of my writing a letter as any impediment to my fulfilling my promise to him, which promise he had every reason to believe I would try to keep, and which I fully intended to keep.

This incident was all the more interesting to me because of the fact that Mr. Stead, Lilian Whiting and the writer, each independent of the others, at about the same period, had been called through Spiritual forces to give testimony to their knowledge of the truth of spiritual communication to them still in the body; which experiences probably would make messages about the others more easily obtainable. I did not think of this at the time and I have never called Mr. Stead's attention to this proof of his true comradeship with his friends in the unseen, but I have often thought what a strong proof, was this given of spiritual knowledge of our earthly affairs, and I know Mr. Stead will not object to my calling attention to it at this time.

HOW BEAUTIFUL IS LIFE.

(Written for and read to the Spiritualist Picnic, at Elgin, Ill., Sunday, June 23, 1907, by the Author.)

Who can stand before Dame Nature, free from sorrow, pain and strife,
And not say within the spirit, "Oh.
how beautiful is life?"
Who can breathe the air of sweetness that surrounds him in the woods,;
Who can watch the happy song-birds
as they sing and hunt for foods;
Who can feast their eyes in wonderment on grandeur all around,
And not sense a greater spirit than in mortal to be found?

Every tree and every leaflet, seems to speak from heaven above.
With its silent voice of sweetness,
with divinity of love;
Every ray of golden sunlight, every cloud that passes by,
Every scintillating dewdrop, is a blessing from on high.
Every whispering gentle zephyr, with its cooling, soothing wave,
Seems to bring us in the spirit something that our spirits crave.

While we bask in life's resplendence with our spirits filled with glee;
While we mingle in deep pleasure with our hearts from burdens free;
While we shout in very passion and in rapture of delight,
And our spirits are uplifted by a force that leads us right,
Let us give a thought to others who are bowed in awful woe,
And invoke for them more blessings from grand Nature's overflow.

Oh, the glory of grand Nature in the budding, blooming spring!
Oh, the restlessness of spirit in each living, growing thing!
Oh, the life infusing, ebbing and the flowing oversoul!
Oh, the vastness and greatness of the Universal Whole!
Let us bathe our spirits in it and arise from every ill,
And commune with Nature's angels till our souls have had their fill.

Let us join our hearts together in a union free and firm,
And be brothers and be sisters through our life's eternal term;
Let us live the life united with a motive ever true,
And be happy in possession of the love that is our due.
Let us strive to be as noble and as great as life itself,
And place envy, hate and anger, on life's long-forgotten shelf.

Let us spend this day of picnic in the sweetest kind of joy,
Let us make each other better and much freer from alloy;
While all nature teems with grandeur and with gladness everywhere,
And seems pleased to offer to us of her beauties our full share.
Let us smile our admiration into Nature's soul to-day,
And breath fervent thoughts of kindness toward the sad along the way.

A Leaf From Past History.

Destruction of the Inquisition in Madrid, and the horrible things it revealed—Report of Col. Lumanonsk, charged by Marshal Soult to destroy the Inquisition in Madrid.

Being in Madrid in the year 1809, my attention was drawn to the house of the Inquisition. Napoleon had already published an edict for the suppression of this institution wherever his armies were victorious. I reminded Marshal Soult, then Governor, of this decree. He thereupon ordered me to set about the destruction of the Inquisition.

The building was surrounded by a very strong wall, and guarded by about 400 soldiers. Arrived under the walls I hailed one of the sentinels, and summoned the Fathers to surrender to the Imperial army, and to open the doors of the Inquisition. The sentinel who was standing on the wall appeared to converse for some moments with someone in the interior; after which he fired on us and killed one of my men. This was the signal for the attack. I ordered my troops to fire on all who appeared on the wall, but it was soon evident that the combat was unequal.

The walls of the Inquisition were covered with the soldiers of the Holy Office; there was also a parapet on the wall, behind which they could shelter, only partly exposing themselves while they discharged their muskets. Our troops were in the open plain and exposed to a deadly fire; we had no field guns; we had no means of scaling the walls, and the doors successfully resisted all efforts to break them in. I saw it was necessary to alter the mode of attack and had trees hewn and shaped which, when carried to the spot, were to serve us as a battering ram.

Two of these machines were put in the hands of as many men as were necessary to work them properly, and they began to make incessant blows against the walls, without troubling themselves about the hail of shot that one could see raining on them. Soon, with perseverance, and the well-directed blows of the battering ram, a breach was made, and the imperial troops flung themselves into the Inquisition.

Then the Inquisitor-General and the Fathers came out of their retreat with long faces and arms folded as though having heard nothing of the attack and defense, they came to learn what was happening, and said in a reproachful tone to their soldiers, "Why are you fighting with our friends, the French?"

Their intention was to make us believe they had in no way authorized the defense. They hoped that in leading us to think that they were our friends, they might the more easily escape during the confusion of the pillage of the Inquisition. Their ruse was not successful. I kept them under observation, and all their soldiers were made prisoners. We then commenced the examination of this infernal prison.

Where were all the extraordinary things we expected to find? Where were the instruments of torture of which we had heard? Where were the dungeons in which human beings were said to be buried alive? We searched in vain. The Fathers assured us that they had been slandered; that we had seen everything.

I was inclined to cease my researches, persuaded that this Inquisition was different from the others of which we had heard, but Col. de Lille said to me, "Colonel, if you take my advice you will examine this marble floor more carefully, pour water on it, and see if there is not some spot where it penetrates readily." I ordered water to be fetched.

When it was poured on the floor, to the great discontent of the Inquisitors, we carefully examined the crevices to see if there was any infiltration. At the side of one of the marble slabs the water ran away very fast, as though there were a hollow underneath. The officers with their swords and the soldiers with their bayonets tried to clear the interstice and to raise the slab, while others tried to break it with the but end of their muskets. All this time the priests were crying out against the profanation of their beautiful holy house. Suddenly a soldier touched a spring with his musket and the slab lifted of itself. Then the Inquisitors turned pale and trembled in every limb.

Under the raised slab we saw a staircase. I took a taper in order to explore our discovery. At this moment one of the Inquisitors softly laid his hand on my arm and said, "My son, you should not touch that with your bloody hands; that is sacred." "All right," I replied, "I need a sacred torch to search out iniquity; I will take the responsibility."

At the bottom of the staircase we entered a large square room called the Judgment Hall. In the center was a large block on which a chair was fixed; this was where they placed the accused, tied to his seat. At one side of the room was another raised seat called the Judgment throne. This used to be occupied by the Inquisitor-General, while all around were other seats less elevated for the Fathers. From this room we passed to the right and found little cells extending the whole length of the building. But what a spectacle was presented to our gaze! What a mockery these men had made of the gracious religion of the Savior whom they professed to follow! These cells were so many solitary dungeons where the unhappy victims of Inquisitorial hatred were shut up until death delivered them from their tormentors. The bodies were left until they were decomposed, when the cell would be occupied by someone else. In order that the Inquisitors should not be inconvenienced large shafts carried off the infectious odors of the corpses.

We found the bodies of some men who had died quite recently, also skeletons chained to the floor. In several of these cells there were living victims of all ages and both sexes. All these prisoners were without any clothing. Our soldiers instantly released them from their chains, and took off some of their own clothes to cover them with. They would have carried them at once into the sunlight, but on account of the danger of doing so I forbade it, and insisted on their being given every possible attention where they were, and only allowing them to be gradually brought into the light. After visiting all the cells, and opening the prison doors of any who were still alive, we went to examine another room on the left. There we found all the instruments of torture that the genius of man or of demons could invent.

At the sight of them our soldiers became furious, and cried out that all the Inquisitors, monks or soldiers of the establishment, deserved to be put to torture. We did not attempt to prevent them. They immediately commenced the work of torturing the Fathers. I saw four different tortures and then withdrew myself from this terrible scene, which lasted as long as a single individual who was an inhabitant of this ante-chamber or hell remained on whom the soldiers could wreak their vengeance.

Before the poor victims from the dungeons of the Inquisition could be brought without danger into the light of day (the news had spread that a number of these unfortunates had been saved from the Inquisition), one saw all those persons arriving whose friends had been arrested by the Holy Office, in the hope of finding them still alive.

About a hundred were thus given back to their friends, after being buried alive for several years. Wishing to complete the work I had commenced, I returned to Madrid and obtained a larger quantity of powder, which I placed in the subterranean passages under the building. Thousands of interested spectators watched us setting the fire to it. The walls and massive towers of the proud edifice were blown up sky high in fragments. The Inquisition of Madrid existed no longer.

COLONEL LUMANONSK.

[Translated from "France et Evangile," October, 1905, by M. A.]

A CURIOUS INCIDENT.

It Comprehensively Illustrates the Varied Character of Spirit Return—He Saw the Moon Through the Apparition, as Set Forth in that Great Daily, the New York World.

In October, 1885, I was a cabin passenger on board the old Hamburg-American liner Rhaetia (which, I believe, was later sold to the United States Government and used as a transport in the Spanish war), bound from Hamburg to New York. I had only recently become engaged to a young Swedish woman, Miss Erna A—, who also was a passenger on board the Rhaetia. My stateroom was shared with me by the brother-in-law of my betrothed, Consul to Nicaragua from a small European Monarchy; while his wife and her sister Erna occupied the stateroom directly opposite ours. My intended, who was in somewhat delicate health, was to accompany the Consul and his wife to Central America, and remain with them until I had completed arrangements for our wedding and established a household.

The weather was ideal—Indian summerlike; the air balmy. Erna and I spent most of our time on deck, and every evening after tea we would sit comfortably stretched in our deck chairs and watch the square-rigged foremast describe more or less regular hyperbolas on the splendid background of a moonlit sky as the ship swayed gently from port to starboard and back again.

My fiancee, though always sweetly affectionate toward me, seemed to be constantly oppressed by a brooding, melancholy sadness, which I attributed to the frail state of her general health, and although she was not suffering from any specific ailment. On the evening of Wednesday, Oct. 21, we were, as usual, seated in our accustomed place on deck, planning, building air-castles, whispering little confidences, when I suddenly became aware of a frightful change in my fiancee's features. Her eyes opened to an unnatural size; her lips parted, and her face, now ghastly white and drawn, assumed such an aspect of utter horror as I hope I shall never again behold on a human countenance.

I sprang to my feet and instinctively followed with my eyes the direction of her horrified gaze. I saw the figure of a man standing, apparently without support, upon the foretopsail yard, slowly beckoning with his right hand in our direction. It was not at once clear to me how this acrobatic feat could affect my future wife so terribly; but just at this moment the swaying motion of the steamer brought the silhouetted figure of the man directly before the bright moon, and I could see the moon through that apparition as clearly as if but a gossamer veil had intervened!

Before I had even time to grasp the import of this astounding fact, a shriek of terror and anguish from my fiancee's lips caused me to turn to her. She had bent her head to her breast and spread her hands out in front of her as if to ward off an impending attack. I carried her to her stateroom, where she lingered in a comotose state till our landing in New York, a few days later. She died, without having uttered a single word, on the evening of Oct. 28, exactly a week after the fateful apparition. I learned subsequently from her brother-in-law that shortly before I became acquainted with Erna she had jilted, for no apparent reason, a young officer in the German navy, who had been engaged to her for more than a year. The love-crazed young man thereupon committed suicide by jumping overboard from the man-of-war to which he was attached while the vessel was in the Atlantic, possibly not far from the spot where we saw the phantom. In his last letter to Erna, in which he announced his intention to take his life, he bitterly reproached her for what he called her faithlessness, and swore that she would never live to wed another man; that he would come back from the spirit world to claim his bride when the proper time came. This letter of a morbid, over-sensitive suitor was the cause of the poor girl's melancholy and depression. The vision of that spectre on the yard-arm killed her.

As far as I know the strange apparition was not observed by anybody else on board the Rhaetia, although I remember that the first officer was on the bridge at the time. After my first vision of the uncanny thing I was, of course, too much concerned with my betrothed to give a second glance. Besides, I would not have cared to look again. It was too dreadful.

Going to Heaven.

Some of the Beauties of our "Splendid System" of Christian "Salvation," as exemplified in the "Conversion" of Harry Orchard—Trenchant Criticism by Daniel W. Hull.

Nothing so illustrates the peculiarities of Christianity and its injustice in its dispensations of rewards and punishments as the case of Harry Orchard and his relation of his life down to the time of his capture and his subsequent conversion. The sainted murderer had been receiving money, both from the detectives and the officers of the federation of miners (if we may credit his story, and now that he is a saint and "all his sins are washed away," (we are not supposed to doubt it) in payment for murders that he either had perpetrated or expected to perpetrate. He had, besides, been a fraud insurance agent, a thief, a burglar, a bigamist, and a wholesale murderer. He was unconcerned, he says, as to the number of people who were killed or were likely to be killed in the perpetration of any particular murder.

To him it was no more concern than cutting the heads off of so many chickens.

He would have blown up a hotel, killing and mangling every man, woman and child in it, if he could have accomplished the death of Gov. Steunenberg in doing so. The reason he did not was conditions were unfavorable.

He relates all this in the most easy, off-hand way, as if he had shot a bevy of partridges, killing all of them with one charge of shot.

But another swaggering fellow appears shortly after his incarceration, and becomes his comrade, helping him to memorize whatever might escape him. He knew what it was to be in company with murderers, for he was the companion of the "Molly Maguires," among whom twenty murders had been committed, though but three had ever occurred in the neighborhood previous to his advent among them. He wants to reclaim Orchard as a "brand from the eternal burnings," and notwithstanding his vulgarity and profanity he turns evangelist. He tells him about his mother (think of McPartland talking to a man about his mother), and then he talks about the forgiveness of God! David was a murderer; God had forgiven him. Orchard could be forgiven, too; and, notwithstanding all the people he had murdered, and sent unprepared to the other world—to hell, he should be made white as snow, and as pure as the most innocent babe. Ah! that was the kind of religion that suited Orchard, and when he related it, we are told that he wept. He wept not for the twenty-six murders he had committed! It did not concern him that they were now, through his deed, suffering all the torture of hell, calling upon God in vain for mercy! God had saved him! He loved God for that, and he could but blubber, as he thought of the "wondrous power and love of God," who, through the pious labors of the devout Pinkerton spy and detective, had, by the grace of God, been able to reclaim him from a life of sin, since he had got where sin was impossible, and snatch him from the clutch of Satan.

Yes, this man Orchard expects to go to heaven when he dies, or is hung (the latter of which is doubtful if we may judge by the royal treatment he is receiving from the warden, Governor Gooding and McPartland), and play for thousands of years upon a golden harp, which he will have so richly earned through the blood of Jesus; and becoming weary, he may walk to the verge of heaven and bending over its walls look down with his telescopic eyes to the place which required Satan eighteen days to reach when he was thrown out of heaven, and there enjoy the beautiful panorama of souls writhing in torment. There by the grace of God he will be permitted to see all his victims whose lives he so unconcernedly took, and the joyful music of the wail of the damned will salute his ears and thrill his soul with heavenly joy and peace, and his eyes will feast on the writhings of the wretched souls undergoing eternal torture which they might have escaped if they had been murderers and sent to prison where they could listen to the unctuous exhortations of McPartland.

And, with those poor damned souls whom he hurried off to hell, he will see Thomas Paine, Col. Ingersoll, Abraham Lincoln, Gerrit Smith, William Lloyd Garrison, Peter Cooper, and other philanthropists who had spent their lives for the benefit of mankind. And then he will rejoice that HE is saved.

Yes, HE is saved—that is sufficient!

What does the torture of others signify to him? In life he lived for self—he murdered to gratify self; when caught, and all opportunity of selfish conduct was taken away from him, and when there remained before him only death, he took advantage of a spiritual bankrupt law and had HIMSELF SAVED. Now he rejoices because HE is SAVED, but feels no concern about those he hurled off to hell, and in the contemplation of God's mercy to HIM, he blubbers in court.

Reader, all this is handed out to you as piety. Mrs. Steunenberg is attending a Seventh Day Adventist Camp Meeting at Walla Walla, and is praying that "he may be spared to do much good in the world." O, yes; there never has been such material of which to make an evangelist in the world, and God will miss a glorious opportunity if he doesn't interpose in his behalf and save him for evangelical work.

This illustrates the selfishness and baseness of evangelicism. Appeals are made to the lowest and vilest instincts of human nature to enlist interest in religious work, and a large portion of them, those who join church, have no other thought in so doing, than escaping from "the wrath of God." They have no higher purpose in life than looking out for themselves. Save yourself!—never mind about the other fellow! Look out for No. 1.

Heaven will be filled with that class of people, if we may credit those who are exhorting us to "become reconciled to God." Do you want to go along?

David, the murderer of Uriah, will be there!

Constantine, the six-times murderer, will be there!

McParland, the Pinkerton detective, may get into some scrape and get there!

The unctuous murderer, Orchard, will be there!

Won't it be a delightful crowd? Just think of the companionship for eternity of such worthies, and when one gets tired of telling God how great and good he is, or otherwise flattering him, he may sit down and listen to Orchard's murderous history, or He may, for a change, sit down with Constantine or David and be entertained by them, or perhaps McParland, if he gets there, can tell in an unctuous language what schemes he worked to persuade the Mollie Maguires to commit their murders.

And this is religion! or what goes by that name, among the people who claim that they have a monopoly in all that goes by the name of righteousness, virtue and piety in the earth.

SPEAKING IN TONGUES.

Subjective Mediumship and Control as Manifested Among the Membership at Zion City—A Sign of the Times.

Many of our church-going people, despite their outward appearance of serenity and contentment in the faith of their creed, feel deep down in their hearts the inconsistency of an obscure teaching of salvation and punishment by proxy, and thus are left in doubt and uncertainty as to their future and safety, and lacking self-reliance, they are set adrift by every wind of doctrine, hence will grasp at any straw as an Anchor of Hope which may float within their reach.

When Dr. Dowie started his boom a few years ago, it was then the straw of Divine Healing which drew the anxious crowds; but since his inglorious end and ill-fated doom, divine healing received a serious setback, and is being replaced now by the latest fad of a straw anchor, i. e., the speaking in New Tongues.

The leaders of this new fangle seem to be really kind, but are tangle-footed in their mind, and yet great throngs are surging after them, all in search of nothing less than the Holy Ghost, and a full set of New Tongues—the more the better. And many do get the Tongues, with all kinds of gibberish, but as to the Holy Ghost, ghosts or spirits who seize upon this people, their bold but silly claim is as unreasonable as their fanatical zeal is absurd, and disgusting to anyone with some practical knowledge of spirit control, who can realize the serious though lamentable fact that these honest but ill-advised people when speaking in New Tongues are simply the victims of hypnotic conditions, and under SUBJECTIVE CONTROL of earth-bound spirits, from which they would shrink back in horror if they could but see them.

They should be enlightened, if possible, and the fact that a sensitive mind of a sentimental nature, and emotional religion, when unduly excited, will drive the unfortunate one into a delightful ecstasy and thereby open the door for other spirits to enter and take charge of the vacant mind, and this ever with ominous results.

The leaders of this movement should be made to understand that hypnotism and chicanery are practiced on both sides of life, and mostly to the detriment of the subject under control; and that their imagined Holy Ghost is often but a poor Chinaman, or some other ignorant spirit in want of a home, whom they so fervently adore with endless repetition of senseless supplications, which, by the way, would disgust any other decent spirit, either in or out of the flesh; yet, after all, their holy farce is to fulfill a mission. They will prove eventually that life does not end at death, and that the dead do not sleep till a resurrection morn, nor enter hell or heaven on short notice. They prove that spirits, good, bad and indifferent, can and do return. They prove that spirits can and do control and influence mortals. They also will indicate that countless hosts swarm over the earth plane in need of the light of understanding. They indicate that Jesus did not pay the debts they owe, nor had died for their sins that they may go free! They indicate that the blood atonement, as generally understood, is a screaming farce, and they indicate that there is something fundamentally wrong in the world's religious education.

As regards this new worship, they stimulate the silly folly of groaning and moaning by bleating and grunting amid the noisy prayers. This appears extremely ridiculous to the stranger, and is altogether incompatible with a proper sense of sanctification.

Their noisy demonstrations are an imitation of savages of the jungles who work themselves into a ceremonial religious frenzy whenever they wish to establish communion with the world of spirits.

But so long as these deluded mortals refuse to try the spirit, but simply believe that the Holy Ghost controls them, neither the world at large nor themselves will be benefited much by their dangerous fad of New Tongues.

Nevertheless its psychic phenomena represents but a phase of subjective mediumship in Spiritism, and which is engaged in a gigantic struggle for recognition by the dull bigot, the hard skeptic, the insistent materialist, the ever opining telepathist, and the scientific Rip Van Winkles of the Psychic Research Society, and all together indicate the great need of a general and exact knowledge and philosophy of life on both sides of the grave, just such as is taught by the Masters of the Great School of Natural Science in which Buddha, Jesus, Melchisedek, and other sages were initiate; and while I bask contented in the mere reflections of their wonderful wisdom and knowledge, I feel rather humiliated at my own unworthiness to reach out for any of their marvelous powers.

AFFLICTIONS OF THE EYE

Successfully Treated By "ACTINA"

Eyeglasses May Be Abandoned.

There is no need for cutting, dragging or probing the eye for the relief of most forms of disease, as a new method—the Actina treatment—has been discovered which eliminates the necessity of former torturous methods. There is no risk or necessity of experimenting, as many people report having been cured of failing eyesight, cataracts, granulated lids and other afflictions of the eye after being pronounced incurable, through this grand discovery.

Mr. A. O. T. Pennington, special agent Mutual Benefit Life Insurance Co., Kansas City, Mo., writes: "Having used Actina for several years, I cheerfully recommend it for the cure of eye, ear and throat affections. It cured my mother, of cataracts."

Susan Cardwell, Lincoln, Kan., writes "I am 73 years old. I was so blind I could only know persons by their voices. After using Actina I can now thread a needle without glasses."

Mrs. T. F. Morle, Waterford, Wis., writes:—"About two years ago I was taken with iritis in both eyes and nearly went blind and it was thought an operation would be necessary. I sent for an Actina last April and it has taken all the inflamation out and my eyes are now well."

Hundreds of other testimonials will be sent on application. "Actina" is purely a home treatment and self-administered by the patient, and is sent on trial postpaid. If you will send your name and address to the Actina Appliance Co., Dept 312L, 811 Walnut St., Kansas City, Mo., you will receive absolutely free a valuable book, Professor Wilson's Treatise on Diseases.

SIX HISTORIC AMERICANS.

A Book That Every American Freethinker Will Delight to Own.

By John E. Remsburg.

The work consists of two parts, "The Fathers of Our Republic," and "The Saviors of Our Republic." In regard to Paine's religious views, Mr. Remsburg establishes the negative of the following (1) Was Paine an Atheist? (2) Was he a Christian? (3) Did he recant? Page after page of the most radical freethought sentiments are culled from the correspondence and other writings of Franklin and Jefferson, which show that these men were as pronounced in the rejection of Christianity as Paine and Ingersoll. That Washington was not a Christian nor a believer in Christianity. In support of Lincoln's infidelity he has collected the testimony of more than one hundred witnesses.

The book is handsomely bound in cloth, giving fine portraits of George Washington, Benjamin Franklin, Thomas Paine, Thomas Jefferson, Abraham Lincoln and U. S. Grant; also portrait of the author.

This book contains 365 pages, printed on heavy paper, well bound in cloth. Price, $1.25. For sale at this office.

David A. Leisk writes from Houston, Tex.: "I am returning to San Diego for a rest during July and August, and will attend Harmony Grove Camp Meeting. I shall be the guest of Mrs. C. A. Dodge, 3124 C. Street, San Diego, Cal., Please address me there. I have spent a very enjoyable time among the friends of the Spiritualist cause in Houston, Texas, receiving many expressions of regret at my departure. There is an excellent opportunity here for a lover of humanity. Such an one will be kindly received."

To illustrate the far-reaching and deep-seating of the belief in the future life as taught in Spiritualism, we take the following from the Medford, Okla., Patriot: "The last words of Mrs. Ida Saxton McKinley, the widow of our martyred President, Wm. McKinley, were in keeping with those of her beloved husband as he closed his eyes in death. They were, 'Why should I linger, please God, it is thy will, why defer it? He is gone and life is dead to me.'" To very few were there so strong attachments as existed between President Wm. McKinley and his esteemed wife. Death separated them but a few years, when they were re-united beyond this life. Resting side by side their graves will be the mecca of people from all over the world, as the two were known around the earth."

The Kanabec Times of Mora, Minn., has the following: "Through the efforts of the local Spiritualist society the services of Mrs. Catharine McFarlin, of Winona, Minn., vice president of the Wisconsin State Spiritual Association and Mrs. Harrold Courtney of Minneapolis, were secured as missionaries from the Minnesota State Spiritual Association to conduct a series of public meetings in this city. These meetings were held Sunday, Monday and Tuesday evenings of this week in the opera house. On account of the short period of time in which these meetings were advertised and the fact that other special atractions occurred the same evening, the Sunday evening meeting was but fairly attended. However, the two following meetings attracted large audiences and had the ladies continued their meetings for the remainder of the week we believe the large seating capacity of the opera house would have been taxed. The meetings were productive not only of pleasure and entire satisfaction to the believers in Spiritualism, but the skeptic, who attended and listened to the eloquent and instructive lectures and psychic demonstrations, is more loth in his expressions of condemnation. There was nothing about any part of the meetings that exceptions could be taken to by the believers in any creed or the worshipers of any faith. They were interesting, instructive and tended to the betterment of humanity, morally, spiritually and physically. Mrs. McFarlin has a national reputation as a medium and Spiritual lecturer. She is forcible, magnetic and extremely eloquent in her presentation of the philosophy, science and teachings of Spiritualism. She gave a historic account of this phenomenon from its origin and inception into the world down to the present day, and held her audience spellbound by her beautiful oratory. During her lecture Mrs. McFarlin had occasion to refer briefly to the subjects of temperance and woman's suffrage and in this brief reference was presented the strongest argument on these subjects that it has been our pleasure to listen to. In short, Mrs. McFarlin is a brilliant lady apparently endowed with supernatural abilities. Mrs. Courtney, in her psychic demonstrations, succeeded in reaching all to whom the spirit world messages were directed. Her revelations were amazing and highly satisfactory. During her stay here Mrs. McFarlin was the guest of her brother-in-law, Albert and Daniel McFarlin and families.

J. W. B. writes from McKeesport, Pa.: "It seems strange that only one-third of the Spiritualist societies have responded to the call of the Census Bureau of the National Government, and the call of the President and Secretary of our National Spiritualist Association. Is it a lack of patriotism, of ambition? Are you afraid to stand and be counted among the grand Army of Spiritualists? Are you afraid to send in your returns, or are you indifferent to the call? If not, respond at once, or you may be classed with the five foolish virgins, and be too late and hear the same words, "The door was shut," too late. This appeal is to those who have not sent in their returns. Ye Secretaries; Ye Presidents, see to it at once."

Dr. W. VanNette writes from Clyde, Ohio: "In the June issue of The Progressive Thinker is an article, "Golden Nuggets of Truth," by R. A. Dague, which I would like to see printed in leaflet form for free distribution. I will agree to take a dollar's worth as a starter, and think many others would do the same. I have been wanting something of that kind for a long time, and the above mentioned article fills the bill exactly."

Samuel Huntington, Malden, Mass., writes: "At the Sunday evening service, June 2, Mr. Oliver Thomas Newcomb, of Boston, was the speaker and message bearer. He prefaced his work by reading a fine poem, "The Now," after which he chose for his subject, "What Is the Rest?" and "The Now," giving a very instructive address. The speaker then devoted over half an hour to fine message work. Mrs. Annie W. Coggeshall of Lowell, Mass., will be the speaker and message bearer on Sunday evening, June 30. This will be the last Sunday evening service until September 1st, but the wid-week and 11 a. m. and 3:30 p. m.. Sunday circles will continue through July and August."

BEAR IN MIND that the editor of The Progressive Thinker is in no way responsible for the views expressed by contributors. He may, or may not, agree with their respective views.

Inquiries come from the East in reference to a Prof. Geo. H. McNeill, who says that he had a hall on the South Side and held overflow meetings. If any of our readers know anything about the man, please inform us at once, and greatly oblige.

Mrs. Laura G. Fixen has just returned to the City from a lecturing tour in the West. At Kansas City and Lawrence she was greeted with large and enthusiastic audiences. She will soon go to Lily Dale, she being Secretary of the Association.

Ferd Suhrer writes: "On Sunday, June 23, the Fraternal Order of Spiritualists journeyed to Elgin in a special coach on the Aurora and Elgin road, in response to an invitation tendered by the Psychic Research Society of that city. President S. B. West said his society would have as guests on that day societies from neighboring cities, and they were anxious to learn more about the proposed Fraternal Camp Association as outlined by Dr. Caird in The Progressive Thinker a short time ago. On our arrival at Elgin we were met by Brother West, who had thoughtfully provided special transportation to the home of Brother Geo. Congdon, a staunch Spiritualist, who kindly arranged for our reception. After luncheon on the lawn, a meeting was held on the spacious grounds. Brother McDougal, representing the Psychic Research Society of Rockford, said many good things in favor of organization, as did other visitors. Dr. Caird briefly stated the manifold benefits to be derived by the establishment of the Fraternal Camp of Illinois. His remarks interested all. Messages followed and Sisters A. W. Bloom, Lichtig, Caird, and Adams, and Brothers Thompson and Traver, of the Fraternal Order, made many friends by the clear demonstrations of the phenomena. The guides of other mediums also assisted in the message work, which brought the meeting to a close. After having the Fraternal Order photographed we again satisfied the cravings of our material appetites, and an evening session was held. The message work of our mediums was so successful that a number closed engagements with other societies for later dates. There were many inquirers concerning the Fraternal Order and the Fraternal Camp, which, when explained, met with hearty approval and promises of substantial co-operation. Nearly everyone was a subscriber to The Progressive Thinker, but we succeeded in disposing of 150 copies. The affair was an enjoyable one, and many expressed the wish that it might be repeated frequently until the camp was established. Much good was accomplished by our trip, and we expect to visit another city in the near future."

Mrs. Kusserow, Mrs. Weaver, Mrs. Susie Thompson and Mrs Nora E. Hill deserve great credit for their energetic efforts in behalf of the State Association Medium's Fund. They were the principals in the raising of $53.65, recently turned in by Dr. Burgess. Here is a true mark of appreciation, expressed in a tangible, practical manner. Let the good work go on.

Mrs. A. E. Sheets, president of the Michigan State Spiritualists' Society, lectured in Vicksburg, Mich., in the interests of the State work, June 23. She will speak at the Grand Ledge, Michigan Camp, Island Lake, and Haslett Park. She officiated at the nuptials of Mr. Vest and Miss Nellie Stegall, June 12, in Owosso, Mich.

W. Atkins, on renewing his subscription, writes: "I am highly pleased with the course you are pursuing in regard to the fakes and frauds. They have retarded the progress of this grand and good truth more than anything else that has ever come its way. It takes nerve and a will power to combat them. I regret to see a disposition on the part of some who are in our ranks, to eliminate physical demonstrations; you are aware it is on them the whole structure has been reared.

Georgia Gladys Cooley worked in the field, harvesting soul food, at Decatur, Michigan, last Sunday. The enthusiastic people in the cause are determined to see that she does not rest too long from her labors. She is kept on the go, as should be all true workers.

Dr. G. C. Beckwith-Ewell sails from London, England, on the Adriatic, July 3rd, and will remain in America till the early part of October. He will spend his holiday at his country cottage, Rocky Rest Heights, Shelton, Conn.

John W. Ring writes from San Diego, Cal.: "The work seems to prosper here. Mrs. Gillespie and husband made us a lovely visit this week. We have splendid times here, with an abundant fruit and profusion of flowers."

James E. Coe writes; "On Sunday evening, June 23, The Golden Star Spiritual Society had for its speaker, Mrs. Nellie Kusserow, who gave a fine address, and was assisted by Mrs. Clybourn in tests and messages, to a fine audience. Evening meetings during July and August, at Star Lodge Hall, No. 378 South Western Ave."

Geo. E. Cope writes from Oregon: "Like Geo. Thomas of Easton N. Y., I have been interested in what has been said by different ones in your paper about "Water Witching. I cannot agree, however, with Mr. T., in all he says. I have seen the forked stick turn down when held so firmly that the strength of the wood was broken by twisting, as the upper end would turn down, and the part in the hands not allowed to turn, and was then more out of its natural position than before it turned down. Another point: If the holder of the stick has his back to the spot where the crotch turns down, it will turn toward the holder, and if he is facing the spot, it will turn away from him, and the person may be blindfolded, too, and he does not know where it is going. The stick will not turn for me, but I have seen it turn in the hands of different ones, and some of them old well-diggers, and would locate the water before digging by using the crotched stick. I don't think it is superstition, for anyone to believe in "water witching" either."

The Illinois Sunflower Club will have an excursion and picnic to Michigan City, on Saturday, July 13, on the famous new steamship, Theodore Roosevelt, Chicago's greatest ship. It leaves Chicago 10 a. m. and 2:30 p. m. Leaves Michigan City 4:20 p. m. and 7:45 p. m. Tickets, only 75 cts. round trip. Children, 5 and under 12 years, 40 cents. Get your tickets early. Docks: South end Clark St. Bridge. Tickets can be purchased of Mrs. Belle Curtis, 615 Otto street; Mrs. A. W. Bloom, 1113 Lincoln avenue, on the North Side; Mrs. Dr. Cross, 560 E. 55th street, and Mrs. O. B. Wilson, No. 6 East 47th street, on the South Side; Mrs. Peet, 874 W. Madison street, and Mrs. E. J. Bloom, 896 Turner avenue., and Mrs. J. R. Francis, 40 Loomis street, on the West Side, and also at the boat landing. We expect a delightful time, and invite everyone to come and join us. Remember the date, July 13, in the sultry summer time, for what is so healthful and invigorating as a day spent on beautiful Lake Michigan.

Mrs Hilbert closed her meetings for the season, Sunday night, June 30, to re-open the first Sunday in September. Lodge Hall was quite full and the following persons took part in the exercises: Speakers, Dr. T. Wilkins, Mr. Bloom, Mrs. Wilson, Dr. Caird. Mediums, Mrs. Caird, Mrs. Adams, Mrs. Bloom and the pastor, Mrs. Hilbert. It was a warm evening, and with the windows open and the street cars running past, virtually on two sides, it was difficult for both speakers and mediums to do justice to themselves and the audience; but despite all this all seemed to have enjoyed the evening. At the close of Dr. Wilkins' parting words he read the following lines, written during the evening, which were applauded:

As we close our public meetings for for a term of needed rest,
Let us not forget the pleasures with which we oft were blest;
Let us not forget our sister who has labered long and well,
And express our kindly wishes for her resting for a spell.
We have truly learned to love her in the form and in the soul,
And we wish her all the pleasures in life's overflowing bowl.

James Doty, M. D., writes: "Mrs. Mae A. Price of Washington, D. C., gave a very enjoyable lecture to a good audience at the Plymouth Spiritual Church of Rochester, N. Y., Sunday morning, June 23. Mrs. Price's work is greatly appreciated by the society. Her weekly meetings for the benefit of the church are well attended. She is open for engagements with other societies. Address her, 31 So. Washington street, Rochester, N. Y."

THE SEASON AT LILY DALE.

Inquiries are being received not only from the middle West but from Colorado and California about the attractions offered by the Lily Dale Assembly for the summer of 1907. A general answer may prove interesting to many of your readers.

The opening date is July 12, and the closing one September 1; in each instance just one day earlier than the announcement running in The Thinker's current camp meeting schedule.

No other camp in the country offers a program more inviting in variety or stronger in the representative character of its speakers and message mediums. It has been prepared by Spiritualists for Spiritualists. At the same time it brings the candid investigator in direct touch with many of our ablest and most reliable workers.

Where can you find a stronger coterie of instructors for the morning classes than J. Clegg Wright, Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond, W. J. Colville, W. M. Lockwood?

Each one is meaty and masterful in some special feature of soul unfoldment.

Among special teachers none will be more welcome than Mrs. Sarah T. Rohrer, so long known as a contributor to the Home Departments of leading periodicals upon kitchen methods and dining room perfections. Her cooking class, with practical demonstrations of culinary skill, will open August 5 and continue for ten or more days. Maidens, matrons and widows will eagerly avail themselves of her instructions. Husbands—present and prospective—will bless her efforts for their future health and happiness.

A new departure is a School in Vocal Music, for the instruction of pupils in the beginning and advanced grades, under Mr. W. J. Sheehan, a very competent gentleman from Buffalo. Its Chorus Choir will add interest to the public services and prove permanently beneficial to its individual members.

Mr. Geo. L. Humphrey, widely known in metropolitan musical circles of the amusement world and as Bandmaster of New York City's crack Seventh Regiment, of State Militia, has organized the Lily Dale Assembly Band under the direct leadership of Ernest Gordon. The music will be appropriate, catchy, inspiring and finely rendered.

The Thought Exchange and Conferences will be comprehensive in scope and stimulating in effect.

Dances Wednesday and Saturday evenings; card parties on Monday and Tea Parties on Thursday evenings. The bowling Alley and Billiard Tables await their devotees. Fishing, boating, bathing, ball playing, hayrack parties and country rambles may be enjoyed by all.

Something invigorating physically, mentally and spiritually can be found by everyone at Lily Dale.

GEO. B. WARNE.

A NOBLE PROPOSITION.

On Behalf of The Theodore J. Mayer Endowment Fund.

The following quotation from a friendly letter recently received at the office of the N. S. A. speaks for itself and should be an inspiration to a thousand other Spiritualists to do likewise:—

"I have been reading with great interest the pathetic appeals that have appeared in the good Spiritualist papers for contributions to the endowment fund so appropriately named for Theodore J. Mayer. I am in hearty sympathy with this excellent movement, but have lived long enough to know that interest and sympathy do not amount to much if not backed by something more substantial. I want to start a hundred-dollar subscription list this morning, and I believe I can get one or two more of the same kind in my home city. Let me know what you think of this plan. I will send my check for one hundred dollars at any time. Kindly yours,

M. A. McHATTON."

Texas, June 13.

This good sister's offer should thrill the heart of every Spiritualist in America. Surely one thousand of them can afford to give one hundred dollars each to Spiritualism! Our people as a class ARE NOT POOR—they have money for almost everything save for the support of their religion. A bit of consecration at this time would do the work. Let one thousand men and women with devotion equal to that of Sister McHatton step to the front, it means an endowment fund of permanent proportions. If each Spiritualist aside from those who give one hundred dollars each would follow with one dollar each, the Mayer fund becomes an eternal source of revenue and of continued support for our beloved cause. RAISE THE MAYER FUND and there will be no need of further appeals for money through the press. Let the Spiritualists do their work. DO IT NOW, and Spiritualism as a factor in the religious life of the American people becomes a permanent power for good.

Send in your money, your checks for this one hundred subscription list. NOW IS THE TIME TO ACT. Who will be the first to respond? Texas has spoken; what say all the other States in the Union? Let us hear promptly from every Spiritualist in America. Address all letters and make all checks and money orders payable to

PASSED TO SPIRIT LIFE.

[Obituaries to the extent of ten lines only will be inserted free. All in excess of ten lines will be charged at the rate of fifteen cents per line. About 7 words constitute a line.]

Mrs. Lizzie R. Rowell, upon a summer day in June, having spent forty-seven years on earth, while out in her garden, laid aside her earthly garment and donned her spiritual raiment, passing, for the time being, from the sight of a large circle of friends, and of faithful companion and loving son. She came from a long line of Spiritualistic ancestry, dating as far back as the "Forty-niners."

ESTHER THOMAS BOSLEY,
Seattle, Wash.

Mrs. Eva Katherine O'Connor, after fifty-seven years of travel upon this plane, journeyed to her other home, leaving a beloved husband and five children. Thirty-four years ago she and he became pioneers on the shores of Lake Washington, and near its waters she laid away the body grown too weak for the soul to remain longer in it. They were both ardent Spiritualists, and she was the third one of the family for whom the writer had officiated at the last service that could be tendered them here—two services, although strictly Spiritualistic in nature, having been held from the Congregational Church. Neighborly love of thirty-four years' duration, however, had leveled all differences, and in common sorrow all were as one.

ESTHER THOMAS BOSLEY.
Seattle, Wash.

Mrs. Marian Carpenter of Detroit, Michigan, officiated at the funeral of Henry Elza Harris, at Winchester, Indiana, June 21. Elza Harris was an old, staunch Spiritualist, and it was in compliance with his request made two years before, that she came to his home on this occasion. There was an immense crowd of friends in attendance and all appreciated Mrs. Carpenter's address, and expressed a desire to hear her again, many saying that should she speak again within their reach they certainly would hear her. Elza Harris has for years been an appreciative reader of The Progressive Thinker."

A. FRIEND.

The funeral of Reuben Smalley, a pioneer of Spiritualism, occurred at the family home in Vicksburg, Mich., June 21. He leaves two sons and two daughters, all of whom were with him to the last. His aged companion who has been an invalid nearly a year, remains, and through her knowledge of Spiritualism, is enabled to bravely bear the separation, which at most can be only temporary. Mr. Smalley was in his ninety-first year.

Mrs. A. E. Sheets officiated.

BORROWED ILLS.

Why bow beneath to-morrow's ills
If gladness may be claimed to-day?
Why scan the long road up the hills
That still are looming far away?
Your feet may bleed as wearily
You drag your burdens up the slopes,
But here the way from rocks is free—
Why not press on with fair, fond hopes?

The babe, all innocent of sin
That has been given to your care
May bravely strive some day to win
Success that you shall proudly share.

Why sit in doubt or court dismay
While there is gladness you may claim?
Why seek the sorrow of the day
When he will fill your heart with shame?

Why not hope fondly for the best?
The far-off hills may not be high
The child that sleeps against your breast
May never wring from you a sigh.
If God has made the morning bright
I trow He deems them of small worth
Who dread the storms that ere the night
May scatter woes across the earth.

S. E. KISER.

PROF. W. M. LOCKWOOD,

will send you for 5 cents a list of FORTY-SEVEN GODS mentioned in the bible. Every Spiritualist should have the list. Address him at Hotel Victoria; 570 Main St., Buffalo, N. Y.

THE N. S. A.

The Fifteenth Annual Convention of the National Spiritualists' Association Will Be Held in Masonic Temple, F and Ninth Streets, N. W., Washington, D. C., October 14, 15, 16, 17, and 18, 1907.

Day sessions, at 10 a. m. and 2 p. m., will be devoted to business only. A cordial invitation is extended to the public to attend these business meetings, to which no admission fee is charged. Evening exercises will consist of grand programs of varied and entertaining numbers, including vocal and instrumental selections by talented artists; Lectures and Spirit messages at each meeting by many of the most noted and gifted platform workers of the country.

Among those who have been invited and who expect to be present and participate in the evening services are W. J. Colville, Mrs. H. P. Russegue, Mesdames Clara Watson, R. S. Lillie, Zadia B. Kates, Elizabeth Harlow, Elizabeth Lowe Watson, Messrs. Dr. Geo. A. Fuller, J. Clegg Wright, Oscar A. Edgerly, Albert P. Blinn, speakers.

Mediums, Mrs. C. D. Pruden, Katie Ham, Georgia Gladys Cooley, E. W. Sprague, Alice Sexsmith, M. T. Longley, and others.

Come One and All to This Great Convention of 5 Days.

Certificate tickets will not be arranged for this year, but special excursion rates at lower value can be secured from all points by visitors and delegates purchasing tickets for Jamestown Exposition with stop-over privileges of ten days at Washington. Call for these at your railroad offices and stations.

The Ebbitt House of Washington, 14th and F Streets N. W., will be the hotel for our people. The Ebbitt is well located within walking distance of Masonic Temple, and a handsome hotel; its usual rates, American plan, are from $4.00 a day up; our special rates there are $2.50 per day, two persons in a room. Write to the Manager and secure your rooms.

THE ANNUAL RECEPTION will be omitted this year, owing to five days' Convention. The sessions will begin Monday, October 14, at 10 a. m. All are invited.

President.
MARY T. LONGLEY, Secretary.

Lake Pleasant Camp.

All arrangements are concluded for holding the thirty-eighth camp meeting which will open on Sunday, July 28th, with Mr. R. F. Churchill and Mrs. Nettie Holt Harding as the speaker and medium.

The leading soprano soloist of Greenfield, Mass., Miss Edna Shepard, has been engaged to sing at all the services.

The grounds have already been cleared up, fourteen new cottages have been built this season. The railroad station has been entirely renovated and put in thorough condition for furnishing first class board for the many who come to the camp. The Home Comfort House is also open for guests. Rooms can be secured at almost every cottage upon the ground, and several cottages are taking boarders. Almost every cottage is to be occupied by its owner, or is already rented, but comfortable rooms can be secured and excellent board at reasonable prices.

The dancing parties which are being given in the Temple every Tuesday, Thursday and Saturday evening, are well patronized. Mr. Chas. F. Slate, who has the grocery store on the Highlands is doing good business and every indication points to an excellent season for the old camp.

John Glickland has the boat privilege; Harry S. Savage, the baggage; Morse & Savage the ice privilege, and Herbert R. Streeter is located at the telegraph and express office.

Circulars of the meetings can be had upon application to the writer.

The Ladies' Improvement Society will hold its annual fair on August 13 and 14 for the benefit of the association and donations are being sent to Mrs. Alice S. Waterhouse, Lake Pleasant, Mass.

The Independent Liberal Church of Greenwich and the Spiritual Union of Norwich, Conn., have each donated handsome bed quilts to be sold at the fair.

ALBERT P. BLINN, Clerk,

HUDSON TUTTLE.

Address him at Berlin Heights, Ohio.

NOTE—The Questions and Answers have called forth such a host of respondents, that to give all equal hearing compels the answers to be made in the most condensed form, and often clearness is perhaps sacrificed to this forced brevity. Proofs have to be omitted, and the style becomes thereby assertive, which of all things is to be deprecated. Correspondents often weary with waiting for the appearance of their questions and write letters of inquiry. The supply of matter is always several weeks ahead of space given, and hence there is unavoidable delay. Every one has to wait his time and place, and all are treated with equal favor.

NOTICE.—No attention will be given anonymous letters. Full name and address must be given, or the letters will not be read. If the request be made the name will not be published. The correspondence of this department has become excessively large, especially letters of inquiry requesting private answers, and while I freely give whatever information I am able, the ordinary courtesy of correspondents is expected.

B. O. Fenton.—Q. Dr. Chase, in his Medical Receipt Book, says that red chickweed is a sure cure for hydrophobia, and it is said to be used for that purpose in Russia. Is this reliable?

A.—The red chickweed here mentioned is not really a chickweed, but a pimpernell, anagolis avensis. There are no recognized active medical properties in this family of plants or in the chickweeds. It has gained its reputed value after the manner of many or all popular remedies. It is stated on good authority that real hydrophobia is one of the rarest of diseases, and some eminent physicians doubt its having existence. Every dog that is sick and acts peculiar is declared mad. If he runs the street there is a mad-dog scare. If anyone is bitten by a dog, at once the horrors of rabies are pictured in imagination. In many cases this attitude of suggestion leads to the disease. An English physician says that he has had over five hundred cases of persons bitten by dogs, under his care, and not one developed hydrophobia. Such being the case, any remedy given, in which the patient has faith will be successful in diverting attention, and ready excuses can be made should a real case develop. The success of the Pasteur method is from the same cause. Of, say, five hundred cases—following the before-mentioned physician—one may have been bitten by a dog affected with rabies. As the four hundred and ninety-nine would not have the disease had they not taken the treatment, they are, with sounding trumpets, heralded as cured. Of the one who has the malady and dies, it is said he came too late for treatment. The saliva of dogs that have eaten decaying meat or gnawed refuse bones will inoculate with blood poison far more to be feared than rabies, and the toxin used in the Pasteur treatment may, and often does, produce of itself a disease known by the doctors as laboratory rabies—more dreadful than the real ailment. When this happens, the attendant physicians escape the odium by saying that the patient was not brought to the institution in time. A bite of any animal is dangerous because it makes usually a punctured wound, into which foreign substances may be carried, and difficult to cleanse to the bottom. That of a dog may not be more dangerous than that of a horse. In a recent daily there was an item of a teamster taking blood poisoning by striking a mule, in anger, on the mouth, and receiving a wound from its teeth on his hand. Any remedy in which the patient has confidence, of course, is exceedingly valuable in allaying the nervous strain from fear of what the consequences may be, and preventive of attacks brought on by worry and auto-suggestion. At least, any remedy should be recommended that will save victims from taking the toxin treatment, which, of all the quackery and charlatanry since the days of Hypocrates, is in the lead.

E. B. Greene.—Q. Tyndall, in his inaugural address as president of the British Academy of Science, states his views as to the origin of life in the following language: "By an intellectual necessity we cross the boundaries of experimental knowledge and discern in the latent powers of matter the potency and promise of all terrestrial life." In a later work, in a marginal note, he questions the sufficiency of such a statement, and seems to regard that we must look for an explanation in certain causes that exist in the super-sensuous world. Can you cite me the work and page where this latter occurs?

A.—In Psychic Science a passage from Tyndall is quoted, which I presume to be that referred to, as it is in antagonism to the above. It is as follows: "The passage from the physics of the brain to the corresponding facts of consciousness is unthinkable . . . . Were our minds and senses so expanded, strengthened and illuminated as to enable us to see and feel the very molecules of the brain; were we capable of following all the motions, all their groupings, all their electric discharges, if such there be; and were we intimately acquainted with the corresponding states of thought and feeling, we should be as far as ever from the solution of the problem, 'How are these physical processes connected with the facts of consciousness?' The chasm between the two classes of phenomena would still be intellectually impassable."

In plain words, physical science utterly breaks down when it reaches psychic phenomena! It has not a plank to bridge the chasm. In his early days Tyndall said the chasm did not exist, later he stood appalled by its abrupt profundity. The spirit writer made the quotation, and on reference to the book I find he gave no more than the author's name. In my experience I am usually unable to recall a spirit who has given me certain information, for further explanation, even directly afterward, and not having the works of Tyndall at hand, I allowed this to pass without verification. I will add that whenever such quotations are made by spirit writers, I endeavor to verify them, if possible, before publication. It may be asked: Are they always correct? They are always in the thought, but sometimes there is some change in the wording, or transpositions, such as are common in repeated messages.

A GOLDEN SHEAF.

To Our Friends: — October next will bring the 50th anniversary of our marriage, and nearly the 55th of our labor in the field of Spiritualism. In the first years we published a volume, "Blossoms of Our Spring," thinking that should the time come in the autumn of life, we would have a volume fitting the occasion of the closing years, of fruitage. A half century has almost gone by, and this 50th anniversary gives the occasion for the issuance of this volume, which we have entitled A GOLDEN SHEAF. It will be made up of selections from matter not before published, in prose and verse; selections of the best sentences and paragraphs scattered through our various books; a new spiritual song with music; illustrations of fac simile automatically written manuscripts; photogravures of our home, birthplace, and brief autobiographical sketches

We propose to make the book in paper and binding as superior as the price, $1.00, will permit. Every copy will be numbered and contain our autographs.

The number of copies will be strictly limited to the number of subscribers, and the book will not be placed on sale after publication. As we have reached the conclusion to publish at a somewhat late date, if you favor the undertaking you will confer a favor by sending your name, by card or letter, at once (the price is not now wanted).

A list of names of subscribers will be published in the volume.

We thank you beforehand for your favor in inviting our book to your homes.

SEMI-CENTENNIAL MEETING.

The Harmonial Society Holds Its Fiftieth Anniversary Meeting June 15 and 16.

The members and many visiting friends came together in the Free Church at Sturgis, Michigan, to hold the fiftieth anniversary of the Harmonial Society, of Sturgis, by a two-days' meeting, June 15 and 16.

Commencing Saturday afternoon, the meeting was called to order by the president, Thomas Collar. The program included beautiful music, invocation by Mrs. A. E. Sheets, followed by Dr. Geo. B. Warne, of Chicago; Will J. Erwood, of Elkhart; Mrs. A. E. Sheets, of Grand Ledge.

They gave beautiful thoughts of this everyday life—the life we are living now, the life we ought to know about. We feel assured that the life of to-morrow will be in harmony with that which we live to-day. They were listened to with closest attention, all wishing to know more about the beautiful life, of which we are all a part.

Sunday morning the five-minute pictures of life brought living pictures that are within every one of us, of the beautiful life lessons that come to us all. Every moment of the appointed time was profitably occupied. The address by Mrs. A. E. Sheets upon the subject of "This Life" gave us many noble, broad and beautiful truths, placing them before us in her practical and forcible manner. They will help make us all better and truer to the life within. That we may better understand these beautiful thoughts, that we may try and do good to all, giving out the silent thoughts of love and purity.

Afternoon, invocation by W. J. Erwood. Address by Dr. Geo. B. Warne, who took the subject "There is nothing in all the Universe that I am afraid of." It was a fine, clear address, giving many straight, pure and noble thoughts to be considered.

Evening session and closing of the meeting. Opened with music. Invocation by Dr. Geo. B. Warne, of Chicago. The following resolution was presented to the convention by Bro. Thos. Harding and supported by H. C. Rawson:

Resolved: that at the conclusion of the fiftieth annual commemoration of the dedication of the church to freedom of speech, we tender our thanks to Mr. Thomas Collar for the dignified manner in which he has filled the chair at all our meetings during the 15th and 16th of June, 1907. We also recognize Mr. Collar's valuable service in past years at other June meetings.

The resolution was adopted by standing vote and the secretary instructed to engross the same upon the permanent records of the society.

Address by Will J. Erwood, who explained and presented many interesting things that we pass by every day with hardly a thought, telling all that if we would pay attention to little things in our everyday life more of real happiness would be with us. Benediction by Mrs. A. E. Sheets.

Thus closed one of the most interesting annual meetings of the Harmonial Society in many years. H.C.R.

ETERNITY OF THE EARTH.

Electricity the Universal Force. By Daniel K. Tenney. A valuable book of 105 pages. Cloth, 75 cents.

PURE FOOD.

Pure Food and Pure Spiritualism is What is Demanded—Pure Everything Is Now the Watchword All Along the Line.

What is designated as the best pure food law on the statute books of any State will become effective in Illinois.

All experts agree that the law which was approved by Governor Deneen May 14 is the most comprehensive and one of the strongest statutes in existence.

Patterned in many respects after the national pure food law, which went into effect January 1 last, the Illinois law goes to the test of approval with its framers full of confidence that the rigid enforcement promised by the administration will end the condition of Illinois playing the part of the dumping ground for other States where food regulations are enforced.

The pure food law, taken in conjunction with the new law providing for the sanitary condition of ice cream and butterine manufactories, which also becomes effective July 1, is held to place Illinois in the front rank of States which are striving to prevent fraud in the sale and manufacture of food stuffs and food products.

Benefits of Legislation.

Chief among the benefits cited as perthining to the new legislation are these provisions:

Ample methods of enforcing the provisions of the law.

Authorizing a commission which shall establish food standards, something which the national law does not provide for.

Stringent definition of adulteration and of misrepresentation of food, confectionery and liquor, and of substances entering into the composition of food.

Special provisions regulating the marketing of extracts, vinegar, baking powder, milk, lard, lard substitutes, process butter and oleomargarine.

The force of officials to assist in enforcing provisions of the law includes an assistant commissioner who shall be an expert dairyman; a chief chemist, who shall be known as State analyst; an attorney, a chief clerk, five analytical chemists, twelve inspectors, three stenographers and one assistant clerk. The attaches of the food department are to be appointed by the commissioner with the approval of Governor Deneen.

To Enforce the Law.

Commissioner Jones has already taken steps to prepare for active enforcement of the law. The laboratory in the Metropolitan Building in Dearborn street has been engaged and is now being placed in condition for the accommodation of the enlarged force of chemists and inspectors who will have their headquarters there. The State laboratory joins the laboratory to be used by the government experts in the enforcement of the national pure food law.

The term "food," as used in the new law, is defined as including all articles used for food, drink or condiment by man or other animals, whether simple, mixed or compound, and any substance used as a constituent in the manufacture thereof.

Under the law the commissioner and his inspectors and agents are given full power to examine all raw materials used in the manufacture of food products at any time and as often as they see fit for the purpose of determining whether any filthy, decomposed or putrid matter shall have been used in their manufacture.

May Seize Samples

The inspectors are empowered to seize samples of adulterated foods for the purpose of evidence, but there is also provision that the sample seized shall be divided into two equal parts and one of the parts is to be left with the person from whom the sample is seized, officially stamped.

After July 1 confectionery shall not contain terra alba, barytes, talc, chrome yellow, paraffin, mineral fillers or poisonous color or flavor, and shall be deemed adulterated if it contains any ingredient deleterious or detrimental to health, or any vinous, malt, spirituous liquor, compound or narcotic drug.

In the case of food the law provides a schedule of conditions under which foodstuffs shall not be offered for sale, following, in the main, the terms of the national pure food statute.

One of the provisions is that all vinegar made wholly or in part from distilled liquor shall be branded "distilled vinegar," and shall not be colored in imitation of cider vinegar.

All extracts must be labeled conspicuously, and extracts in imitation of strawberries, raspberries, etc., must also be labeled and marked "imitation."

The "watering" of milk is prohibited, and it is provided that persons, firms or corporations receiving milk in cans or bottles shall remove the milk before it sours and immediately wash the vessels. Food shall not be manufactured from impure or unclean milk, and the sale of skim milk is regulated by providing for the proper labeling of cans containing skim milk.

The above shows that pure food is henceforth in Illinois to be the order of the day. The National Spiritualist Association, and the Illinois Spiritualist Association, headed by the ever active and vigilant Dr. G. B. Warne, president, should now take the matter in hand and have laws enacted driving the fakes from our ranks, leaving us Pure Spiritualism in connection with Pure Food.

CLAIRVOYANCE.

Selected From the Writings of Dr. Edwin D. Babbitt, by E. T. D., and Which Graphically Illustrates Some Important Truths.

Clairvoyance is the power of seeing through substances that are opaque to the ordinary vision.

Its explanation: When we see glass or crystal, we are able to do it because, first, the ordinary grade of light is able to polarize the atoms of that substance, and go all the way through it; and secondly, because our eyes are in rapport with this light, and thus are able to perceive what it reveals to us.

Advanced minds have affirmed that there must be more refined grades of light which could penetrate even opaque substances. The so-called science of the day declared that there was only one grade of light, just as many declared there was only one grade of electricity. Now it has been demonstrated that there is an X ray, and the fluoroscope enables them to see through human bodies and other substances.

This X ray must include mainly the odyllic or fluorescent light. Thorough clairvoyance requires the finer psychic light, though the odyllic grade, which is one octave lower, is as high as many clairvoyants have attained to. But all vision requires an eye to do the seeing, and the psychic must be necessary to perceive the psychic light, hence the more interior psychic brain must be well charged with the psychic forces, so that the objects of the coaarser vision may not impede its view. The seeress of Preyorst sometimes thought that she could see with the pit of the stomach, but that must have come from the great nervous activity of the solar plexus in that section, that could receive, and convey the image of outward objects to the psychic eye, which is a little farther inward than the visible eye.

The opinions of materialistic scientists have often been almost childish in their dogmatic and unreasoning character. Dr. Hammond says: "No one has ever read unknown writing through a closed envelope."

"We must believe our senses in such a case," says Dr. Wm. B. Carpenter.

"It is capable of absolute proof," said Dr. Beard, "that no phnomena of this kind have ever appeared in the world, in any human creature, in trance or out of trance." But what is this absolute proof? The following foolish notion of his, founded on deduction, as he terms it, "that no members of the human species can have any quality different in kind from those that belong to the race." In other words one person cannot be more highly evoluted than another in music or color, vision, or anything else. After awhile, however, this same Dr. Beard was overthrown by a friendly lady, Mrs Julia Carpenter, now of Boston, who persisted in reading clairvoyantly whatever he placed before her blindfolded eyes. He then told his experience to such prominent physicians as Dana & Morton, who applied the same term to him that he had so often applied to others, namely: "delusion!" He took them to Mrs. Carpenter, however, and they, too, became astonished as they found out of the absolute truth of clairvoyance.

Rev. Mr. Townshen gives an account of a Doctor at Antwerp who was cornered upon every possible way by a lady who saw and described the colors and forms and numbers of concealed objects. He had declared that if she could do these things he would believe. The doctor admitted that she was right, yet he went away saying: "Very curious, yet still I cannot believe."

William Howitt, in speaking of this, says: "Nor could the Doctor have believed had he received an amount of evidence as large as the Cathedral of Antwerp. How can a stone move? How can a petrified man believe? and the scientific are petrified as a class by the unspiritual principles of the last generation. This education (or mis-education) has sealed up their spiritual eye, and left them only their physical one. They are as utterly disqualified for psychological research as a blind man for physical research."

Henry Hall Sherwood of New York, who published some remarkable works on the Motive Power of the Human System, had a lady who was blind from infancy look clairvoyantly through the human system. Anatomists who heard her revelations with reference to every part of the system were astonished, and often taught accuracy by her knowledge. This did not come from their knowledge impressed upon her sensorium, for she often differed from them and went beyond them. She saw great leading luminous points, or poles of the brain, and smaller poles from the minor organs; also five poles at the heart, centers of light at each ganglion and poles in all the organs of the system. If a point of the body was touched or pinched she could see streams of light flashing up towards the brain. If she wished a greater luminosity of the interior organs, she would tell the doctor just where to place his finger on her spine, while she would place her fingers in front, thus proving the enkindling forces that flow from points, etc.

Spiritualists Entertain National Official.

Monday's midday train brought to San Diego Mrs. Anna L. Gillespie, national superintendent of Lyceum work for the National Spiritualist Association, with headquarters at Washington, D. C.

Monday evening Mrs. Gillespie addressed a fair-sized audience at the Spiritualist temple, most beautifully elaborating on "Knighthood of the Twentieth Century." "We learn that it is much more to live than die. The knight of to-day gives his heart's sympathy and hand's service in daily experience," said Mrs. Gillespie. "Speak your word of encouragement now. If you love your friend, tell him so while he may enjoy it. Live to serve your fellow man."

The discourse was replete with helpful thought and sparkling wit as well, which instructed and entertained the audience.

Mrs. Gillespie is accompanied by her husband, who was one time president of the California State Spiritualist Association. Mr. Gillespie favored the meeting with two vocal selections.

Tuesday at 8 o'clock p. m. at the Temple, the Lyceum, the Busy Bees and the society tendered Mr. and Mrs. Gillespie a reception, and they left on the Owl for the meetings in Los Angeles, San Francisco and points up the coast.—The San Diegan Sun.

Swing Low, Sweet Chariot, Swing Low.

Swing low! 'tis a dear little babe today
To be borne to the land of love away,
To the land of peace and beauty rare,
To the land where loved and loving are.
Swing low, sweet chariot,
Swing low!

Swing low! There are angels waiting round
For your hasting wheels that give no sound;
You will bear the child to the realm of light,
To a home of love and blessings bright,
Swing low, sweet chariot,
Swing low!

Swing low! A mother's heart is sore,
Is sad that a little voice no more—
Will call for the needs of a mother's love,
Will not to her tenderest whisperings move.
Swing low, sweet chariot,
Swing low!

Swing low! You are bearing your message true.
"If they go they can surely come to you;
The way is not barred to the swift return;
The lamp of life shall forever burn."
Swing low, sweet chariot,
Swing low!

Swing low! There's such beauty in Nature's plan,
Such endless joy when the truth we scan,
Such wealth of good on every shore,
For death is but change forevermore.
Swing low, sweet chariot,
Swing low!

Swing low! It is life we find beyond,
Far richer life in eternal bond,
None need to fear the great divide.
There are grander views on the other side,
Swing low, sweet chariot,
Swing low!

Swing low! We have no good-byes to say.
The door is not closed when we pass away.
The wasting form was never the I;
That still is in life, though we may not descry.
Swing low, sweet chariot,
Swing low!

Swing low! In time you will come for us all;
Sometime on each will the new light fall;
Parents and children will meet again,
And their lives flow on in eternal gain.
Swing low, sweet chariot,
Swing low!

MRS. M. A. CONGDON.

Hood River, Ore.

SOMEBODY'S MOTHER.

A Recitation by Arzelia C. Clay, of Grand Rapids, Mich.

The woman was old and ragged and gray,
And bent with the chill of the winter's day,

The street was wet with a recent snow,
And the woman's feet were aged and slow.

She stood at the crossing and waited long,
Alone, uncared for, amid the throng

Of human beings who passed her by,
Nor heeded the glance of her anxious eye.

Down the street, with laughter and shout,
Glad in the freedom of school let out,

Come the boys, like a flock of sheep,
Hailing the snow piled white and deep;

Past the woman, so old and gray,
Hastened the children on their way,

Nor offered a helping hand to her,
So meek, so timid, afraid to stir

Lest the carriage wheels or the horses' feet
Should crowd her down in the slippery street.

At last came one of the merry troop,
The gayest laddie of all the group.

He paused beside her and whispered low,
"I'll help you across if you wish to go."

Her aged hand on his strong young arm
She placed. And so without hurt or harm

He guided her trembling feet along,
Proud that his own were firm and strong.

Then back again to his friends he went,
His young heart happy and well content.

"She's somebody's mother, boys, you know,
For all she's aged, and poor, and slow;

"And I hope some fellow will lend a hand
To help my mother, you understand,

"If ever she's poor and old and gray,
When her own dear son is far away."

And "somebody's mother" bowed low her head
In her home that night, and the prayer she said

Was, "God be kind to that noble boy
Who is somebody's son, and pride, and joy."

CHRISTS OF THE PAST AND PRESENT. By Rev. Moses Hull. A valu

ILLINOIS STATE ASSOCIATION.

What Has It Done for Every Medium and Spiritualist in the State?

It is indeed stupid in any Spiritualist in the State of Illinois, at this juncture, to ask "What has the State Association done for me?" and no wide-awake Spiritualist will ask it, for the question itself implies selfishness and a TRUE SPIRITUALIST IS WITHOUT THAT CHARACTERISTIC, THAT HUMAN CURSE.

Self-protection is a law or principle in nature, and in a business sense there seems a necessity for a certain amount of caution, care, and method, but in the religious or soul sphere there is neither necessity nor excuse for selfishness or avarice.

Are you a medium in the true sense of the word? Suppose there was no organization, and a council or legislature was considering your right to ply your mediumship and make a business of it without complying with the business laws and taking out a license; what could you do alone? Unorganized as a cult or religion, the law would not recognize your individual cult—used as a business—as a religion:

The perfect organization of the Universe, worlds within worlds; order, system, polarity, law, indicates Infinite Intelligence. One person or thing interdependent upon another.

The name "Spiritualism" was applied to the philosophy and the truth of spirit return, as the most expressive to be found—it naturally fell upon it and has ever remained true to its charge. We love it. But unless we do something to push the cause along it isn't to be supposed it will prosper; it isn't reasonable to think because Spiritualism is a truth, a fact, it will grow under that name without some kind of organization to make it permanent.

Spirit return is proving itself in many churches—even the paternal church of Catholicism, and as there is no possibility of our getting it patented to protect the name and cause, we must either make it of real use to the world as a religion, as a moral influence, as an educative institution, or lose its precious name.

Decarnate spirits seem determined to manifest to mortals, irrespective of cult, and the secular press of today is teeming with astounding phenomena along the line of the occult, and if we would protect our laurels we MUST DO SOMETHING—KEEP MOVING.

There are enough earnest, honest believers in the philosophy scattered over this country, if they could be persuaded to come forward from their shells of fear for their popularity—to make Spiritualism the strongest, most prosperous and most popular religious institution in the world.

If Spiritualism teaches morality, honesty, spirituality, love, and that all these are necessary to the soul growth of individuals, here and now, for the progress and benefit of the soul in the state of its freedom from this plane, it is certainly the personification of religion, and is worth maintaining.

Spiritualism doesn't teach envy, jealousy, vituperation and malignancy. It doesn't teach that it is right to love your neighbor to her face and pound her over the back to others. It doesn't teach the art of mud-slinging or tearing down character. It doesn't teach that there is nothing in any other religion to appeal to the souls of men and women; but it does teach that unless you wish to postpone your progress hereafter or here and now, you had better do something else besides settle down with the self-satisfied air of "I have found it all; it is mine;" and simply live out a life of inactivity in that spirit.

The best time to help the cause you have found to represent your ideas is now. It is a bad business principle to wait till you are dead to aid Spiritualism. There are so many ways in law to construe points of a will and to kill the purpose of a sincerely made legacy.

Do your earth work while you are on the earth if you would have it done to your liking.

We are rapidly coming to the front and will soon have many temples of communion and education, shelter, food and care for all our helpless poor; but we must WORK FOR IT, AND WORK TOGETHER.

The cause should be more fully organized. The Illinois State Association should have an auxiliary in every town or city in the state where enough Spiritualists can be gotten together for the officers. It would be so much easier to keep track of our people, and get a proper census.

A few people are getting a move on themselves in regard to the collecting of the Spiritualistic census of this state, but unless still more activity is manifest in this direction Spiritualism will fall far behind the estimate of other times.

Our Mediums' Fund has recently been swelled to an appreciative extent through the activity of Dr. Burgess and the following people and societies:

Golden Rule Society, Nora E. Hill, pastor, $9.25; Mrs. Weaver, $2.25; Circle at Mrs. Kusserow's, $7.25; Harrison and Harrison girls, $9.00; J. E. Coe, $5; Mrs. Clayborne, $3; Nora E. Hill, $7.25; Hyde Park Society, $2.75; Circle and entertainment at Mrs. Nellie Kusserow's $8; Raffle of picture given by Edna Ewbank, $4.50. Deducting $4.60 for ice cream etc., it leaves in all $53.65.

Now this begins to look like there was appreciation in some quarters of the city of Chicago, at least, for the work of President Warne and Dr. Burgess at Springfield. Let the good work go on; there will be more work of the same nature or similar, to be accomplished, and it will be right to have an emergency fund on hand. Not a dollar will be wasted from the cause of truth; be assured of that.

T. WILKINS, Sec'y. I. S. S. A.

IMPORTANT NOTICE.

Having been directed to carry on the work of Editor-at-Large in connection with the N. S. A., I am desirous of obtaining all press notices for or against Spiritualism, and reliable information with regard to attacks upon our movement that may be made by preachers. I respectfully request all Spiritualists to forward the same to me at their earliest convenience.

THE PATHWAY of the Human Spirit, or the Pathway of the Spirit Traced, by Dr. J. M. Peebles.

Did it pre-exist and does it reincarnate again into mortal life? When did it enter the body? What is its form—how does it relate to the soul body? Can it leave the human body and return again? Can it live in and control another mortal body? These questions and many others are asked and answered by the Doctor in this, his latest book, of two hundred pages. Price 75 cents; postage, 12 cents.

SPIRITUALISTS GET $250,000.

Supreme Court Decision Confirms Bequest Made in Will.

The following is special despatch from Bloomington, Ill.:

By the action of the Illinois Supreme court in sustaining the will of the late J. T. Crumbaugh, the wealthy banker of Leroy, this county, Spiritualists of the World, will probably realize on the bequest of $250,000, which he left to the cult.

This is the largest bequest that Spiritualism ever received, and it has attracted wide attention. Crumbaugh became a convert a few years before his death, and when his will was probated it was found that he had left the bulk of his fortune for the construction of a Spiritualistic church in his home city and also for the promulgation and dissemination of the tenets of that belief in the hope of securing converts. He planned to erect a church costing fully $50,000, while the income from the remainder of the estate was to be used for its maintenance and also for the extension of the work.

It was Mr. Crumbaugh's idea to make Leroy the headquarters of Spiritualism the world over and to carry the work of proselyting from there. The relatives, who were ignored in the will, succeeded in having it set aside in the lower court, following an exciting trial. They asserted that Spiritualists had exerted such a peculiar control over the old man that his mind had become affected, and that he was not capable of writing a sane will.

The Cause in Northern California.

After leaving Ashland, Oregon, we visited Cottonwood, Chico and Marysville, Cal but the spring flood had been so bad that, spiritually speaking, there was nothing doing.

At Sacramento we held two public meetings, with small audiences. At Oakland three public meetings, audiences not large; the reason; There was a so-called Spiritual meeting in a large hall, packed to the doors, and their Church Notice in Sunday papers reads thus: First Church of Revelations (Spiritual), every Sunday night, Hamilton Hall, Jefferson and 13th streets, (over Christian Church). Lectures of a very high order by Rev. A. Messages and tests, by the dozen; gives your full name, and your spirit friend's name. Hall always full. Everyone cordially invited. Messrs. Arnold & Dickson, leaders.

They are the fakes who were compelled to leave Salt Lake, Utah, and later were treated the same by the people of Los Angeles, Cal., and today they are holding up the people of Oakland, Cal.

We have been with the San Jose society two Sundays in May, and will be with them five Sundays of June.

The society here is not large, but is growing steadily since the election of new officers.

The Sundays of July we will be with the Santa Barbara, Cal., society, and our address will be General Delivery, Santa Barbara, Cal.

The Grand Ledge Camp, Michigan.

Grand Ledge, Michigan, Spiritualist camp meeting opens July 21. The speakers and mediums engaged this year are among the best known on the Spiritualist platform.

The programme for the forenoons, Sundays and Mondays excepted, will be varied and interesting, consisting of mediums' meetings, conferences, etc. Mediums who are developing, as well as others, will have an opportunity to participate. These exercises are a great aid to those expecting to take up the work.

The fact that Oscar A. Edgerly is being engaged for the fourth season as speaker and chairman of our camp is sufficient warrant of his congenial and affable manner as chairman and entertaining and instructive as a speaker, to insure the successful direction of our present camp.

Mrs. A. E. Sheets, our former president and chairwoman for many years, is so thoroughly established in the hearts of the progressive and initiated public mind that the mere mention of her name as the first speaker upon the list is an agreeable insurance of intellectual eminence in spiritual ethics and oratorical pleasures for the opening session. Her homely welcome to each and all will be a cordial and sympathetic feature in the social environments of the camp.

Mrs. R. S. Lillie, known throughout the length and breadth of America as the "Queen of the Rostrum," is comparatively a new speaker with the patrons of Grand Ledge Camp, but who has been in the spiritual field since (nearly) the advent of modern Spiritualism, but because of the unremitting demand in other fields for her labors have we been unable heretofore to secure the services of this far-famed oratress. That her inspirational gems of thought will be a delightful treat is forecast in her presence with us.

Elizabeth Harlow, who was a new speaker with us last year, proved to be one of our best and will be with us again. She comes highly recommended to the management as having been long in her appointed vocation of saving souls to higher and brighter spiritual aspects of life here while the future of eternity will take care of itself, and none should miss hearing her.

Mrs. A. Atcheson, of Buffalo, N. Y., with us last year for the first time, is a very good and true message medium, has acted as pastor of a Buffalo Society for several years and is highly recommended by them. She will give messages during the greater part of camp. They are always convincing and to the point.

Geo. A. Letford, known from North to South as the Drummer Medium, and one who has done some wonderful work in Georgia and Florida, where he travels, and has made the South more liberal toward Spiritualism, will also be in attendance and follow some of the lectures with messages.

Spiritualist, skeptic, and all friends are cordially invited to attend Grand Ledge Camp. Remember the date it opens, July 21st, lasting until August 18th. Don't fail to attend.

COMMON SENSE By Thomas Paine. A Revolutionary pamphlet, addressed to the inhabitants of America in 1776, with explanatory notice by an English author. Paper, 15 cents.

Letter From Los Angeles, Cal.

To the Editor:—A reception was tendered Mrs. Anna L. Gillespie, the National Superintendent of Lyceums, by the societies of Los Angeles, on Monday evening, June 3. The State Board of the California State Spiritualist Association took the initiative, and every society in the city had one or more representative there, with the exception of the Anti-Fakir society.

Ten affiliated societies in Los Angeles were represented, as well as the president of the San Pedro society. We also had members of the Semi-Tropic Camp Association, and the Spiritualists' Relief Association, and the People's Society, who took part in welcoming the sister to this city, and who are not at present affiliated with the State Association, but are interested in its work and always willing to aid in the work of general good for which it is working. While there are a number of societies in Los Angeles, under the name as Spiritualism, and each holding meetings under their individual charters and according to their own by-laws, when there is a movement of general nature they unite as one, and in consequence a general good work is accomplished, and good feeling established, as well as an opportunity for the many different workers to meet and greet each other, who would in no other way have such an opportunity.

Everyone is now planning for one or more of the camps. The first one to be held in California this year is now open at Summerland, from June 23 to June 30. Escondido, from August 11, to 25. Los Angeles, (Semi-Tropic) August 15 to September 25, and then the 12th Annual Convention of the State Association at Santa Barbara, on the 6th, 7th, and 8th of September. Nearly all the local societies are now affiliating under the charter of the C. S. S. A., and in consequence we hope in the near future to have a more perfect organization. We have at the present time 43 societies in good standing. Some of these through lack of proper workers, in their locality are not holding weekly meetings, but it is hoped in a short time to remedy this matter.

Owing to overwork on the part of the editors of the Occidental Mystic and Western Spiritualist, that publication has been suspended and the subscription list and good will have been turned over to the weekly sheet, "Progress," published at 837½ So. Broadway, Los Angeles, by Howard C. Tripp, and all unexpired subscriptions will be filled by that paper. One or two pages each week will be edited by Mr. and Mrs. Howe in the interest of Spiritualism on the Pacific Coast. More next time; my space is limited.

UNIVERSAL SPIRITUALISM

Spirit Communion in All Ages, Among All People—by W. J. Colville.

This work has two distinctive features: (1st) A resume of the Spiritual faith and practice of Egypt, India, Persia, Greece, Rome, China, Japan, and other ancient nations, not excepting Europe during Christian centuries. (2) A summary of recent experiences in America, Great Britain, Australia, France, Germany, Italy, and other modern lands, all tending to show the persistent continuity of spiritual revelation. Clairvoyance, Telepathy, and Psychic Phenomena in general is dealt with in separate chapters at the end of the volume, making it a highly useful textbook for all who are interested in the great question of human immortality. The Author says: "The libraries contain a large number of extremely valuable works dealing with every imaginable phase of Spiritualism and occultism, but I have searched in vain for a single portable volume, issued at a popular price, which gives a brief and lucid statement of the claims made in all ages and in all countries on behalf of the mighty truth of communion between inhabitants of earth and dwellers disrobed of flesh in the one vast spiritual universe. The enormous and ever increasing interest in "Psychic" problems and the eager, constant demand for historic information coupled with a rational setting forth of intelligible spiritual philosophy, has led me to appear once again before the public with a book." Price $1.00.

OUR CHILDREN.

Hints From Practical Experience for Parents and Teachers.—By Paul Carus.

In this little book "Our Children," Paul Carus offers a unique contribution to pedagogical literature. Without any theoretical pretensions it is a strong defense for the rights of the child, dealing with the responsibilities of parenthood, and with the first inculcation of fundamental ethics in the child mind and the true principles of correction and guidance. Each detail is forcefully illustrated by informal incidents from the author's experience with his own children, and his suggestions will prove of the greatest possible value to young mothers and kindergarteners. Hints as to the first acquaintance with all branches of knowledge are touched upon—mathematics, natural sciences, foreign languages, etc.—and practical wisdom in regard to the treatment of money, hygiene and similar problems. 207 Pages. BARRELS OF AIR BURNED AS FUEL

New, Remarkable Stove—Ohioan's Great Invention—Consumes 395 Barrels of Air to One Gallon of common Kerosene oil making oil-gas—the New Fuel that looks and burns like gas!

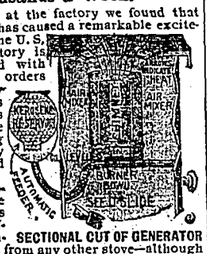
Wood, coal and oil all cost money. ONLY FREE FUEL IS AIR! Unlimited supply—no trust in control. Air belongs to rich and poor alike. We can't burn air alone but see here! Our wonderful stove burns air and gas—very little gas—principally air. Takes its fuel almost entirely from the atmosphere.

A miniature gas works—penny fuel for every family—save ⅓ to ½ on cost—save dirt and drudgery—no more coal or wood to carry—ashes unknown—absolute safety.

SEE HOW SIMPLE! TURN A KNOB—TOUCH A MATCH—FIRE IS ON. TURN AGAIN—FIRE IS OFF! THAT'S ALL.

Astonishing but true—time-tested—proven facts—circulars give startling details—overwhelming evidence.

NO SUCH STOVE SOLD IN STORES—UNLIKE ANYTHING YOU'VE SEEN OR HEARD OF.



A genius of Cincinnati has invented a new, scientific oil-gas generator that is proving a blessing to women folks, enabling them to cook with gas—relieving them of drudgery. Makes cooking and housework a delight and at the same time often saves ⅓ to ½ in cost of fuel.

How often have many of our lady readers remarked that they would give anything to get rid of the drudgery of using the dirty coal and wood stoves—also the smoky oil wick stoves and their gasoline stoves which are so dangerous and liable to cause explosions or fire at any time.

Well, that day has arrived and a fine substitute has been discovered and every family can now have gas fuel for cooking, baking and heating and not have their kitchens a hot, fiery furnace in summer, and be carrying coal and ashes—ruining their looks and health.

Thousands a Week.

Upon calling at the factory we found that this invention has caused a remarkable excitement all over the U. S. —that the factory is already rushed with thousands of orders and evidently the Company's representatives and agents are making big profits as they offer splendid inducements.

SECTIONAL CUT OF GENERATOR

As will be noticed from the engraving, this OIL-GAS GENERATOR is entirely different from any other stove—although its construction is very simple—may be easily and safely operated and is built on the latest scientific principles, having no valves, which is a marked improvement, as all valves are liable to leak, carbonize, clog up or overflow.

By simply moving a knob the oil is automatically fed to a small, steel burner bowl or retort where it is instantly changed into gas, which is drawn upwards between two red hot perforated steel chimneys, thoroughly mixed with air and consumed, giving a bright blue flame—hottest gas fire, similar in color and heating power to natural gas.

This invention has been fully protected in the U. S. Patent Office and is known as the HARRISON VALVELESS, WICKLESS, AUTOMATIC OIL-GAS GENERATOR—the only one yet discovered that consumes the carbon and by-products of the oil.

The extremely small amount of Kerosene Oil that is needed to produce so large a volume of gas make it one of the most economical fuels on earth and the reason for the great success of this Generator is based on the well known fact of the enormous expansiveness of oil-gas when mixed with oxygen or common air.

Oil-gas is proving so cheap that 15c to 30c a week should furnish fuel gas for cooking for a small family.

Kerosene oil from which oil-gas is made may be purchased in every grocery—is cheap and a gallon of it will furnish a hot, blue flame gas fire in the burner for about 18 hours and as a stove is only used 3 or 4 hours a day in most families for cooking, the expense of operating would be but little.

In addition to its cheapness is added the comfort, cleanliness—absence of soot, coal, dirt, ashes, etc.

What pleasure to just turn on the oil—light the gas—a hot fire ready to cook. When through, turn it off. Just think; a little kerosene oil—one match—light—a beautiful blue gas flame—hottest fire—always ready—quick meals—a gas stove in your home.

It generates the gas only as needed—Is not complicated, but simple—easily operated and another feature is its PERFECT SAFETY.

NOT DANGEROUS LIKE GASOLINE

And liable to explode and cause fire at any moment. This stove is so safe that you could drop a match in the oil tank and it would go out.

This Oil-Gas Stove does any kind of cooking that a coal or gas range will do—invaluable for the kitchen, laundry—summer cottage—washing—ironing—camping, etc. Splendid for canning fruit—with a portable oven placed over the burner splendid baking can be done.

Another Important Feature

Is the invention of a small Radiator Attachment which if placed over the burner makes a desirable heating stove during the fall and winter so that the old cook stove may be done away with entirely.

While at the factory in Cincinnati the writer was shown thousands of letters from customers who were using this wonderful oil-gas stove, showing that it is not an experiment but a positive success and giving splendid satisfaction and as a few extracts may be interesting to our readers we produce them:

L. S. Norris, of Vt., writes: "The Harrison Oil-Gas Generators are wonderful savers of fuel—at least 50% to 75% over wood and coal."

Mr. H. Howe, of N. Y., writes: "I find the Harrison is the first and only perfect oil-gas stove I have ever seen—so simple anyone can safely use it. It is what I have wanted for years. Certainly, a blessing to human kind."

Mr. E. D. Arnold, of Nebr., writes: "That he saved $4.25 a month for fuel by using the Harrison Oil-Gas Stove. That his gas range cost him $5.50 per month and the Harrison only $1.25 per month."

J. A. Shafer, of Pa., writes: "The Harrison Oil-Gas Stove makes an intense heat from a small quantity of oil—entirely free from smoke or smell—great improvement over any other oil stove. Has a perfect arrangement for combustion—can scarcely be distinguished from a natural gas fire."

Mr. H. B. Thompson, of Ohio, writes: "I congratulate you on such a grand invention to aid the poor in this time of high fuel. The mechanism is so simple—easily operated—no danger. The color of the gas flame is beautiful dark blue, and so hot seems almost double as powerful as gasoline."

Mrs. J. L. Hamilton, writes: "Am delighted—Oil-Gas Stoves so much nicer and cheaper than others—no wood, coal, ashes, smoke, no pipe, no wick, cannot explode."

Hon. Ira Eble, J. P., of Wis., writes: "Well pleased with the Harrison—far ahead of gasoline. No smoke or dirt—no trouble. Is perfectly safe—no danger of explosion like gasoline."

Chas. L. Bendeke, of N. Y., Writes: "It is a pleasure to be the owner of your wonderful Oil-Gas Stove—no coal yard, plumbing—ashes or dust. One match lights the stove and in 10 minutes breakfast is ready. No danger from an explosion—no smoke—no dirt—simply turn it off and expense ceases. For cheapness it has no equal."

ALL SIZES.

The writer personally saw these Oil-Gas Stoves in operation—in fact, uses one in his own home—is delighted with its working and after a thorough investigation can say to our readers that this Harrison Oil-Gas Stove made by the Cincinnati firm is the only perfect burner of its kind.

It is made in three sizes 1, 2 or 3 generators to a stove. They are made of steel throughout—thoroughly tested before shipping—sent out complete—ready for use as soon as received—nicely finished with nickel trimmings and as there seems to be nothing about it to wear out, they should last for years. They seem to satisfy and delight every user and the makers fully guarantee them.

HOW TO GET ONE

All our lady readers who want to enjoy the pleasures of a gas stove—the cheapest, cleanest and safest fuel—save ⅓ to ½ on fuel bills and do their cooking, baking, ironing and canning fruit at small expense should have one of these remarkable stoves.

Space prevents a more detailed description, but these oil-gas stoves will bear out the most exacting demand for durability and satisfactory properties.

If you will write to the only makers, The World Mfg. Co., 3656 World Bldg., Cincinnati, Ohio, and ask for their illustrated pamphlet describing this invention and also letters from hundreds of delighted users you will receive much valuable information.

The price of these Stoves is remarkably low; only $3.25 up. And it is indeed, difficult to imagine where that amount of money could be invested in anything else that would bring such saving in fuel bills, so much good health and satisfaction to our wives.

MUSIC IS SPIRITUALIZING.

If of the Right Kind Its Tendency is to do Great Good—Boston Woman Believes the Power of Music Will Work Mental Wonders.

That the power of music can change dispositions, cure certain diseases and some kinds of insanity, is the claim of Miss Christine Brown, one-time president of the Emersonian Society and member of some of Boston's representative women's clubs.

Visions of calm, serene, peace-giving waves of sound flowing down the corridors of our prisons and the throb of music so tense with life and the call of the things of the earth, earthly, in the hushed ward where those lie who have lost their desire to live, make one see what the little woman prophet is driving at, and audacious as the conception is, she has the utmost faith in it.

The Originator of the Idea.

Miss Brown is a frail, blue-eyed little woman with softly curling hair and a carriage curiously boyish, so militarily erect is it. One day last week a Sunday Post reporter went out to her home in Dedham and listened while she expounded her articles of faith.

"To begin with, I want to say that I do not believe that music is all-powerful; it is but the expression of perfect harmony, and perfect harmony is the highest form of existence.

"From time immemorial music has had a compelling effect upon the human organism. When our savage forefathers went to do battle they did so amid a harsh clanging of sounds—sounds which stir even the civilized being who hears them for the first time and who has not been able to take in their meaning. The soothing of the crooning lullaby is too old a truth to mention.

Neglected too Long.

"It seems strange to me that these things have not been studied into more. Almost everything has; but this, one of the fundamentals, seems to have been overlooked.

"The really wonderful power of music can be demonstrated by taking a child of perhaps two or three and then playing different music for it.

"Repetition is often needed to get any effect; it is quite essential to get the complete effect. Take a piece of soothing, calm music and play it over and over and over and the child will fall asleep. Play a martial air instead and repeat three or four times, and the child will be all life and animation.

Might Reform the World.

"Now I believe that music could be made to do a vast amount of good. Suppose the reformatories and prisons had musicians employed just as they have doctors and guards.

"Great care would have to be exercised in choosing the musician. He or she would have to be of high character, having an individuality sane and clean and high-minded, with a good deal of the spiritual side developed. I have heard the most beautiful music positively contorted by men and women who were not capable of feeling the fineness and delicacy of the theme, who coarsened it by the clay of their own personalities.

Effect on Criminals.

"If the right person was found and a trial made by letting the right selections be played for six months or a year in a prison I believe that the effect upon the inmates of the prison would be quite noticeable.

"Women are more susceptible to music than are men, and, therefore, the music would have a greater effect. I believe that it would soften many of those men and women who will never be softened in any other way; that it would change them, make them susceptible to better influences and their own better impulses.

As a Cure for Diseases.

"I believe that if the music treatment were to be given in hospitals, wonderful results would be seen. Different music would be needed for different cases.

"In a case where the patient was so sick and weak the incentives to live had departed, stirring earthly music would be necessary, and when sleep was needed soothing music would be infinitely more beneficial than powders. Contagious diseases and broken limbs would not be helped except in a secondary manner by music, but there are many nervous troubles that could be completely cured by the power of music.

Would Help the Insane.

"There are certain kinds of insanity which could be cured by music, I believe, for the music could soothe when that was necessary and stimulate interest when that was necessary. The body is subject to the mind, and when the mind is right the body will become right in time. I should think that melancholia would be very materially helped by cheerful music—at any rate, in its incipient stages.

"If music should be used to form the child's tendencies and keep its mind sane and happy, I believe that the results would be very satisfactory."

Then she leaned forward and spoke slowly, emphasizing each word:

Has Tremendous Power.

"I believe in the power of music. It is a power for good or a power for evil. With the right performer it is one of the greatest powers for good that we have, and I believe that we should each use each power that we have in that direction.

"There are many harsh ways of remedying evil. Some of them make me shudder even to think of. Surely the kindest way is the best way—all other things being equal."

IN A LITTLE WHILE.

In a little while you and I will cease
Warring as we do; we shall be at peace;
I will try no more to belittle you,
You will never sneer at the work I do.

Foolishly we fret, foolishly we vie,
Spurred by rivalry always, you and I;
Ne'er a helping hand nor a friendly smile,
Though we both shall rest in a little while.

S. E. KISER.

We are so vain as to set the highest value upon those things to which nature assigned the lowest place.—Bovee.

SPIRITUALISM.

The Rector of Trinity Church Portland, Oregon, Makes some Astounding Statements in reference to Spiritualism, in "Trinity Chimes," the Church organ.

The Rector has been spoken of as a Spiritualist with more or less frequency; by some with surprise and regret and by others in an attempt to discount his usefulness as a clergyman. Probably in every instance these remarks are made by persons who have no direct knowledge of the subject; who have not given the matter sufficient study to offer an opinion of any value.

The rector has nothing to conceal about his views. He is therefore quite willing to express them. If to believe that discarnate spirits of mortals are living, more or less related to us who remain in the flesh; if to believe that it is possible for some spirits TO REVEAL THEMSELVES and communicate with certain persons still in the flesh, be Spiritualism, YES, HE IS A SPIRITUALIST. If by the term is meant a believer that spirits of the departed progress in the ordinary sequence of life after leaving the body, yes he is. He does not believe in any wild flight through space, either up or down, to some far away planet, immediately after death.

He does not believe in any sudden transformation of character after death. He does not believe that the soul is asleep somewhere until a call to a physical resurrection. He believes in the immediate resurrection of the spiritual body after death.

Why does he believe this? Because the Bible has many references to the spiritual experience of persons who saw visions of living spirits. Among such persons were Jesus, Peter, James, John, Stephen, Paul, and others.

Because scientific investigation in modern times of many phenomena, under the most exacting test conditions, by some of the most renowned scientists, has disclosed the fact that communication with the spirit world is occasionally possible and does occur.

The Spirit appearances of Bible times are thus verified as credible.

No man can be Christian and not be a Spiritualist.

Because men like Sir Wm. Crookes, Alfred Russell Wallace, Professor James of Harvard, Professor Newbold of the University of Pennsylvania, and a host of the world's greatest scientists and scholars are absolutely convinced of the genuineness of the facts, and since their opinions are widely accepted for their scientific value on other subjects, they are worthy of respect on this.

And lastly, because the Rector himself has given the matter careful study and investigation for a number of years, having approached it with skepticism and violent prejudice until at last he was forced to admit the facts since there was no other possible explanation of the phenomenon. Much as is the worth of the testimony of the distinguished men referred to, he refused to believe until he himself had direct evidence so convincing that he would have to deny the evidence of his senses and reason, and believe himself a fool, or accept demonstrated truth.

This may all seem very strange to those who know nothing about it. But ignorance should not be so immodest as to laugh to scorn that of which it knows nothing.

If any condemnation is to come from this confession by the Rector, he is perfectly willing it should. Ere long the whole world will know of the great truth of immortality by demonstration becoming more and more complete.

The foregoing must not be taken as approving of the host of frauds and fakers who traffic upon the credulity of people. The investigation of the subject should be left to experts, as is the case with any problem of science.—Trinity Chimes, Portland, Ore.

THE WORLD IS ADVANCING

A Prominent Irish Lawyer in New England, from a Catholic Family, Expresses His Views in a Lucid Manner, Indicating That the Cords of the Church Can Not Bind Him.

I beg leave to acknowledge with many thinkers, the receipt of clippings from the press, entitled, "How I became a Spiritualist," by Irvin R. Baker, and another very interesting one entitled, "Views and Reviews."

I was, I can assure you, very interested in both papers, and fully appreciate your thoughtfulness in mailing them to me. I am satisfied that the present century will be fruitful in most wonderful events in the great field of Spiritualism.

For many years my astonishment has been great over the untenable position of all the Christian Churches in denouncing and belittling the honest work of true Spiritualists, especially when we know so many splendid men and women of a high order of intelligence and unimpeachable integrity to have committed their lives to so glorious and sublime a cause.

It has also seemed to me a great error in the churches to withhold their support from so great and glorious a cause, especially in view of the knowledge which they must of necessity possess from reading the "Holy Bible," which IS ONE GREAT, GRAND, COLOSSAL COMPENDIUM OF SPIRITUALISM FROM GENESIS TO REVELATIONS.

I recognize the fact all the time that there are fakes and frauds in the army of the world's Spiritualists, but I also believe that the percentage of fakirs and frauds in the Christian churches, "bunching" the clergy and laity together, have the same elements in the great Spiritual society of which you have been for many years an honest, consistent and worthy member, "skinned to death."

In the churches the ministers under the guise of the religion, sanctity, etc., beat the people, and under the same cover and mantle of hypocrisy, the people beat them. In the language of our departed friend, the late Judge Everts of Rutland, it is a clear case of "dog eat dog, and the dog that eats the most dog, is the best dog, and gets the blue ribbon of the world."

But I am satisfied in my own mind that there are not many of them beating the spirit, that is an intangible, indestructible and everlasting, an immortal thing, not unlike the truth itself, inasmuch as neither the one nor the other ever dies.

I believe that our mission here is a mere nightmare, the product of an illusion, or otherwise Spiritualism has its everlasting place in the order of things.

My conception of it in its broadest and grandest sense is that it was without beginning, and it will be without end, and that God is its eternal, everlasting, perfect Center.

I am amazed that the instructions WHICH I HAVE RECEIVED TO AID IN CONDEMNING ITS BEAUTIES, AND ITS ALL-PERVADING POWER and glory, have so signally failed in making me an outcast, an outlaw, in short, an unredeemed criminal.

I earnestly hope, my dear friend, that you are enjoying good health, and that you may continue to for many years to come. I have known you from my earliest boyhood, and have never seen a day when with a knowledge of your upright life and your many splendid qualities of head and heart, I could not find genuine pleasure in emulating your example, the while of the reader, we know they

Thanking you again for your remembrance, and with a most hearty "God bless you and yours," I am always, sincerely your friend,

MRS. INGRAM LAID TO REST.

Funeral Service Conducted by Rev. W. F. Peck, a Noted Spiritualist of St. Louis.

Funeral services were held over the remains of Mrs. Mary A. Ingram at the home of her son-in law, A. D. Allen, 838 State street, Springfield, Mo., at 2:30 o'clock, Sunday afternoon. A large number of friends and neighbors were present.

The religious exercises were conducted by Rev. W. F. Peck, a noted Spiritualist of St. Louis, who delivered an eloquent and touching discourse. Among other things he said:

"From time immemorial man has regarded death as the King of Terrors. All other enemies might be met and fought with some degree of success, but death was invincible, a sure conqueror in the end. Men have exhausted language in depicting the imaginary horrors existing on the other side of the grave. The fear of death arose out of the mystery with which it is enshrouded, out of the cloud of uncertainty which hovered about the tomb. Now and then through the ages a ray of light flashed out of the darkness and the world of seers and prophets brought to the world some slight inkling of the truth but these flashes were so misunderstood and misinterpreted as to be of little value, so death continued to be the haunting dread of the race. A little more than a half century ago began a new series of revelations through slowly but divinely inspired instruments culminating in the establishment of the most perfect system of philosophy and religion the world has ever known. A philosophy which banished superstition, a religion which swept away all fear of the grave by revealing the glorious truth that death is not an enemy, but a friend. A kindly frost which cracks the shell and gives the kernel room to germinate. An open door to a higher and nobler life, a better world.

"A religion which emphasizes to the utmost the truth contained in the venerable injunction, 'Whatsoever a man soweth that shall he also reap.' That the consequence of violated law must be met by him who sins and the debt paid to the uttermost farthing by the one who contracts it. This is the religion of Spiritualism.

"In the light of this religion did our departed sister live for many years. In its comforting knowledge did she meet and welcome the messenger when he came to release her from her house of clay. In its light did she look forward gladly to the time when she should stand, as doubtless, she does stand to-day, hand in hand—with the dear and noble companion of her youth and age on the flower decked shores of the land immortal. There garbed in immortal youth and loveliness she waits patiently the time when we, too, shall follow her to the country where death cannot come and partings are no more.

"To those of our religion these occasions are not days of gloom and mourning. While there is more or less of sadness connected with these partings, yet when our beloved have grown ripe in years and loveliness of character as has she whose mortal form lies here, and they fall before

A MEDIUM IN COURT.

Arrested at Newcastle, Pa.—The Case Is Tried, Eminent Lawyers on Both Sides.

As set forth in the News of Newcastle, Pa., the jury in the case of Mrs. E. H. Marquette, charged with fortunetelling by Rev. J. S. Martin, returned a verdict Tuesday morning of not guilty. The jury divided the costs, amounting to about $100, between the prosecutor and defendant, but Judge Porter ordered the costs stricken off, as to the prosecutor.

It is understood that three ballots were taken in the jury room. On the first the jury stood 2 to 1 for acquittal; on the second vote there was 10 for acquittal and 2 for guilty, and on the third ballot all were for acquittal.

The matter of costs was then taken up. A majority was for placing all the costs on Rev. Martin, but there was one elderly man on the jury who held out against this and a compromise was effected by dividing the costs. It is claimed that the jury was not in sympathy with the way the evidence was obtained.

The case went to the jury Monday evening and after arriving at a verdict the jury sealed it and returned it on Tuesday morning.

Mrs. Marquette did not take the stand in her own defense Monday afternoon, but other witnesses were called to show that Spiritualism is considered by some to be a form of religion.

Rev. Vosler of Columbus, O., was brought here to testify along that line, but objection was raised to some of the more important questions. He said that he was a Spiritualist.

Mrs. William Becker and Mrs. James Peebles of this city and several women from Sharon were called and testified as to their belief in Spiritualism.

Attorney Robert K. Aiken made a strong plea to the jury in defense of his client. He said that while he did not believe in Spiritualism, yet he had more toleration for the religious views of others than some people seem to have.

From the standpoint of a Spiritualist he defined a medium as one who has the power to get into communication with the spirits of the departed. "You and I do not believe in it," he argued, "but there are people who do believe in it and we have a right to respect their opinions."

"Was there anything in Mrs. Marquette's conduct to show that she was not sincere? She insisted that she was not a fortuneteller, but a medium. The defendant's witnesses honestly believe in Spiritualism.

"The Holy Ghost is a spirit. In the good old-fashioned Methodist meetings what is it that causes the worshipers to become filled with enthusiasm and shout 'Glory to God!' What is it but the spirit?

"You could not get a covenantor so full of the spirit from head to foot that he would shout 'Amen.' The spirit does not move him the same way as it does the Methodist. So I say that Spiritualism is also different and those who practice it are not moved in the same way.

"A man dies," the materialist says, that ends it. Another says that the spirit has merely left the body and so we have all kinds of beliefs regarding the spirit until we come to the Spiritualist who believes that all is spirit.

"Rev. Martin in his sermons tells you what becomes of the just and the unjust. Is he foretelling future events? No, not as contemplated by the act of assembly. Even when the contribution box is passed around it does not bring it within the act of assembly.

"Why are so many ministers here this afternoon? It is because this trial involves a question of religion." (There was a shaking of heads by ministers at this statement.)

Mr. Aiken then took up the information claiming that it charged that the future had been foretold by cards, tokens, symbols and by consulting the stars when nothing of the kind was shown in the testimony.

Attorney James Chambers made a very able plea on the side of the commonwealth.

"We do not deny the right of people to their religious beliefs," said he, "neither do we deny the right of individuals to practice their beliefs, so long as they do not transgress our laws. There was once a sect that worshiped the sun. It was their belief that the sun was God. It was a custom at the rising of the sun to sacrifice the most beautiful woman that could be found.

"If one of the —— were here in Pennsylvania he could still believe that the sun was God. He would have a right to his belief. He could even offer up a sacrifice of the most beautiful woman to be found but the laws of Pennsylvania would step in and say 'Thou shalt not commit murder.'

"The case is not a question of religious belief. It is a question of whether or not Mrs. Marquette professed to foretell the future for money. If she did she is guilty under the act."

Attorney Chambers then reviewed the testimony showing what the different witnesses had said along that line. In referring to the information he said that it was simply drawn under the act of assembly and if the words referred to by Mr. Aiken had not been used the information would have been worthless.

Judge Porter also upheld the words of the information in his charge to the jury. He reviewed the evidence at some length showing that the question to be solved was whether or not Mrs. Marquette had professed to tell the future for money. The jury retired shortly after 5 o'clock.

Hate—The Deadliest Poison in the World.

The deadliest poison known to science is hate. Prof. Elmer Gates, of the laboratory of psychology and psychurgy, Washington, D. C., is the man who has found it out [as set forth in the Chicago Tribune, June 23]. At least he is the man who has demonstrated it. Many other scientific sages, however, have appreciated that there is a connection between bodily operations, and they and their works all have been remembered by one Aaron Martin Crane in his studies in "Right and Wrong Thinking." They serve to introduce us to Gates' greater work.

President Hall of Clark University has said that there can be no change of thought without change of muscle. He also suggests the possibility that the right course in thinking might develop muscle as well as the right course of physical exercise.

Prof. J. Mark Baldwin of Princeton says that every state of consciousness tends to realize itself in an appropriate muscular movement.

Prof. C. A. Strong of Columbia University assures us that all mental states are followed by bodily changes; that all consciousness leads to action. This is true of desires, of emotions, of pleasures and pains, and even of such seemingly non-impulsive states as sensations and ideas. It is true, in a word, of the entire range of our mental life. The bodily effects are not limited to the voluntary muscles, but consist in large part of less patent changes in the action of the heart, lungs, stomach, and other viscera, in the caliber of blood vessels, and the secretion of glands.

Every Thought Leads to Action.

Prof. William James, of Harvard University, avers that all mental states are followed by a bodily activity of some sort. The fact is, says he, that there is no sort of consciousnes whatever, be it sensation, feeling or idea, which does not directly and of itself tend to discharge into some motor effect. It may be only an alteration of the heart beats, or breathing, or a modification of the distribution of the blood, such as flushing or turning pale, or else a secretion of tears, or what not. But, in any case, it is there in some shape when any consciousness is there.

Prof. Munsterberg, of Harvard, argues that the slightest thought influences the whole body, and that there never is a particle of an idea in our mind which is not the starting point for some bodily action. He says thinking increases the activity of the minute perspiration glands of the skin. This has been measured so accurately by the proper apparatus that it is possible to determine the activity or intensity of a person's thinking by its effects upon those glands.

Angelo Masso, of the University of Turin, constructed an apparatus by which the body of a man could be balanced in a horizontal position. This was made so sensitive that it oscillated according to the rhythm of the respiration. If one speaks to a person while he is lying on the balance horizontally, in equilibrium and perfectly quiet, it inclines immediately toward the head. The legs become lighter and the head heavier. This phenomenon is constant, whatever pains the person may take not to move, however he may endeavor not to alter his breathing, to suspend it temporarily, not to speak, to do nothing which may produce a more copious flow of blod to the brain. The experiment was once tried on a sleeping man. Some one was about to enter the room, and scarcely had turned the handle of the door than the balance inclined toward the head, remaining immovable for five minutes without the sleeper noticing anything or waking. It was proved by the balance that at the slightest emotion the blood rushes to the head. This work with the sleeping man shows that the thought which is not perceived and does not awaken him is as certain to affect his condition as the thought which he knows.

Mental Effort Disturbs the Balance

Dr. William G. Anderson, director of the Yale gymnasium, has made similar observations upon the athletes of that university with like results. A man perfectly balanced on the table would find his feet sinking is he went through mental leg gymnastics, thinking about moving his legs without making the movements. This shows that it is thinking which sends the blood to the legs when they are entirely at rest. He balanced students before and after their written examinations, and after the examination he found that the center of gravity had changed toward the head, varying in different cases from only a sixteenth of an inch to almost two and a half inches.

Experiments comparing agreeable exercises with those that are not so agreeable showed that movements in which men took pleasure set in motion a richer supply of blood than did those which were not to their liking. Pleasurable thoughts send blood to the brain; disagreeable ones drive it away. The old poet was wise when he wrote: "In whatever you sweat, indulge your taste."

This prepares us for Prof. Gates' extraordinary experiments. He has shown the same motor influence and effect of mind action in an entirely different way. He plunged his arm into a jar filled with water up to the point of overflow. Keeping his position without moving, he directed his thinking to the arm, with the result that the blood entered the arm in such quantities as to enlarge it and cause the water in the jar to overflow. This merely is demonstrating by another method the same facts that were shown by Prof. Masso and Dr. Anderson.

Develop Muscle Just by Thinking.

Prof. Gates went even further than this. By directing his thoughts to his arm for a certain length of time each day for many days he permanently increased both its size and strength, and he instructed others so that they could produce the same effect on various organs of the body. Thus he demonstrated the accuracy of Prof. James' statement that muscle can be developed by a proper course of thinking as well as by physical exercise.

Prof. Gates has shown the causative character of thinking in a long series of most comprehensive and convincing experiments. He found that change of mental state changed the chemical character of the perspiration. When treated with the same chemical reagent the perspiration of an angry man showed one color, that of a man in grief another, and so on through the list of emotions, each mental state persistently exhibiting its peculiar result every time the experiment was repeated.

These experiments show clearly, as indicated by Prof. James' statements, that each kind of thinking, by causing glandular or visceral activity, produced chemical substances which were being thrown out of the system by the perspiration.

When the breath of Prof. Gates' subject was passed through a tube cooled with ice, so as to condense its volatile constituents, a colorless liquid resulted. He kept the man breathing through the tube, but made him angry, and five minutes afterward a sediment appeared in the tube which indicated the presence there of a new substance which had been produced by the changed physical action caused by a change of the mental emotion. Anger gave a brownish substance, sorrow gray, remorse pink, etc., showing, as in the experiments with the perspiration, that each kind of thinking had produced its own peculiar substance which the system was trying to expel.

The professor provided a spring regulated to maintain an even degree of resistance, and so arranged as to register the number of times it had been pressed down. A man was required to make depressions of this spring with his finger until from exhaustion the finger refused to act. this was repeated until Gates was able to determine the average number of depressions which the man could make under ordinary circumstances before exhaustion occurred. Then at different times afterward he was asked to think about some subject which would cause discordant thoughts, such as the saddest thing that ever happened to him, or the man he worst hated, and on one occasion he was asked to read Dickens' story of the death of Little Nell.

Harmony Increases Working Power.

After much thinking on such a topic so that the mind was filled with the thoughts it suggested, he was required to depress the spring. The average number of depressions possible under such mental conditions was much less than he had previously made when his mind was in its usual condition. On the contrary, harmonious thoughts, as of love, peace, or anything good, raised the number of depressions above the average in a similar large proportion. A great number of experiments persistently showed similar results.

Prof. Gates undertook to discover the character of the substances which he obtained by condensation of the breath of his subjects. The brownish precipitate from the breath of angry persons when administered either to men or to animals caused stimulation and excitement of the nerves. Another substance produced by another kind of discordant thinking when injected into the veins of a guinea pig or a hen killed it outright.

Every emotion of a false and disagreeable nature produces a poison in the blood and cell tissues, he declares. "My experiments show that irascible, malevolent, and depressing emotions generate in the system injurious compounds; also that agreeable, happy emotions generate chemical compounds of nutritious value which stimulate the cells to manufacture energy."

Medical books record many instances similar to this from real life. A mother was strong, healthy, vigorous, muscularly well developed, and not especially sensitive nor nervously organized, but rather the contrary. Her babe was in perfect health. Something occurred which threw the mother into a violent fit of anger. Shortly after she suckled her infant. It was soon attacked with spasms and died with convulsions in a few hours—according to the highest authority, the victim of poisoning by her mother's anger.

Anger, hate, or any malevolent thinking causes the secretion of injurious substances, including poisons. The circulation of the blood and all other bodily functions are interfered with by passion or emotion. Laughter or tears and physical conditions involving changes of muscles and of glandular secretions. And their causes are purely mental.

Waste of Brain Force.

After all the clash of great intellects; after all the affirmations of ignorance and stupidity; after all the pros and cons; after all that has been said and written by the correspondents of your paper, to demonstrate (?) the existence of God, WHAT has been PROVED? Nothing, absolutely nothing; for a God, any God, in fact, is just as INCONCEIVABLE as time and space.

Why all their waste of energy and brain force to attempt to prove the existence of something that only exists in the noddle of man?

Col. Ingersoll well expressed the whole situation in a nut shell when he said: "The mystery of man cannot be explained by the mystery of God. THAT mystery still asks for EXPLANATION."

WYLLIE'S "SPIRIT" PHOTOGRAPHS.

None of Which are Genuine Productions.

To the Editor:—I have read with interest Prof. Lockwood's article of last week on so-called spirit photography. The professor criticises two specimens alleged to have been made by one Wyllie of Los Angeles, Cal., and makes the statement that "if Mr. Wyllie knew anything about the mathematical principles underlying optics, chemistry, and photographic formula, he would not care to expose his ignorance of these factors by placing before the public such specimens of his handiwork and proofs of his duplicity as these specimens contain."

Now, being well acquainted with Mr. Wyllie and his work, I wish to say that in a sense the Professor does him an injustice. Wyllie is an old photographer of many years experience, and understands his business thoroughly, and it is a mistake to suppose that the "violation or transformation of the law of optical dynamics," complained of by the Professor, is the result of ignorance on his (Wyllie's) part. To the mass of his patrons and believers this very feature of his work is the proof of its genuineness. One instance in point: While I was a resident of Los Angeles, and shortly after Wyllie opened his studio for "spirit" work, a friend of mine—a devoted Spiritualist—showed me a "most convincing" picture he had received from this spirit photographer. It was a picture of himself with a tremendous bouquet of flowers in his lap. Probably it was the same bunch of flowers that appears in the Professor's specimens. Upon my calling his attention to the fact that the size of the flowers was out of all proportion to the rest of the picture, each being larger that the sitter's head, and expressing doubts as to its genuineness as a spirit photograph, the gentleman vehemently replied: "That is a sure proof of its genuineness. If the picture was a fake, the operator would have been careful to have the figures all in the same focus. But the spirits are doing this work, and doing it in their own way."

Wyllie took his cue from this remark, which was made in his hearing, and as it is an infinite amount of trouble and extra labor to make all the figures he puts upon a plate conform to the law of "optical dynamics," he puts them on in any old way, thus convincing and satisfying his credulous patrons at the same time.

I found subsequently that the view taken of the matter by the party quoted is held also by the majority of his patrons.

There is no question among the most intelligent people who have seen and investigated Wyllie's work as to its character. In hundreds of cases IT CONDEMNS ITSELF, and bears upon its face indisputable evidence of fraud; yet he has a large following, strange to say, and there is no lack of enthusiastic admirers who are always ready to testify, in letters to the Spiritualistic press, as to the wonderful beauty and truth of his work.

The Cause in Philadelphia, Pa.

It is some time since you have heard anything from the 1st Association of Spiritualists of Philadelphia, and I take pleasure in sending you some fine specimens of the present membership, one of the oldest, and the youngest member. The oldest is our beloved and honored president, Capt. Francis J. Keffer, who on the 27th of this month celebrated his eighty-second birthday, and who is a hero of two wars: the "Mexican" and the "Rebellion," and was one of the prisoners in Richmond held for some time as hostage. The youngest is Leroy P. M. Shisler, who at the age of six years proposed, of his own accord, to become a member of the association. He is a grandson of Mrs. Minnie Brown, one of our best public mediums, and of course he is a member of the Lyceum, and takes great interest in it.

Our minister the past season is Rev. G. Tabor Thompson, who about two years ago left the Baptist pulpit to preach the truths of Spiritualism, and he has brought in many new seekers after the truths of our philosophy and phenomena. He is an earnest and forcible speaker, and radical for one so lately come into our ranks. He should be, and is destined to become more widely known, and I am sure he would be well received by liberal-minded thinkers at our camps, or anywhere else. He still takes texts from the Bible, but he gives them the most unique interpretations, and draws forcible spiritual lessons from them all. He is proud to be a Spiritualist and a member of our association.

Our members are so well pleased with his work for the cause that the trustees have voted to engage him for another year, beginning September 1, when we usually begin the lecture season.

To-morrow evening, June 30, he proposes as a subject for lecture "Decline and Death of Christianity Here and Elsewhere," which shows that he has well outgrown the creed of his former church.

Quite a number of new people have joined our association the last year, and matters look very promising for our future prosperity, and for the cause of Spiritualism generally.

TO KANSAS SPIRITUALISTS!

Dear Friends:—At the State Spiritualist Convention recently held in Topeka, the office of State President was conferred upon me.

I am indeed sensible of the high honor it is to represent organized Spiritualism, and to the end that during our year the cause in Kansas may clarify and grow, I beseech all Spiritualists throughout the State to cooperate with the State officers in their attempts to invigorate and extend organized Spiritualism. Let us do something—live for Spiritualism this year!

Your president will be happy to come into acquaintance with the work and workers in the various localities, and to arrange for active service in the early autumn. Let us disseminate tend organized Spiritualism. Let us strengthen organization in Kansas!

Yours for progress,

BESSIE BELLMANN,

Summer Musings

With no public work on hand this summer, and a rural home to loll in, and fields of grass and a garden of truck to witness the materializing processes of nature, and now a rainy day to bring meditations, I wonder what can be said to the Spiritualists who are fortunate enough to have some of their magnificent literature to read and gain its spiritual helping. Our literature, especially the papers and magazines, should one or all be in each Spiritualist's home.

Evolution of God and Christ Ideas.

Such is the title of a valuable book by Hudson Tuttle; and as I meditate about nature, I wonder if any ideas of God or Christ can be within reason that have any relation outside of natural law. Can any divine powers exist in spheres supernatural? Every blade of grass, and leaf of tree, fruit of vine, bush or tree, any attribute of soil or air, or any potency of any expressed form or force, these each and all speak to me here amidst the sunshine or storm, that natural law is the eternal law of the universe in any dimension of space that may belong to the habitat of soul.

I turn to Brother Tuttle's book for any possible conviction of supernaturalism connected with the God and Christ ideas, and I find he has culled from many fields of exploration historical and revealed, and each and all support naturalism. His book is a splendid array of facts connected with this important topic that is invaluable to the student. It may be heavy summer reading, and not conducive to idlings, but the close touch with nature reveals how accurate are the author's conclusions; and he has been these many years such a communicant, hence the refreshing pabulum he gives the reflective mind increases our divine relation to the universe. Listen to him: "As to the Supreme, who blushes in the flower, rounds the dewdrops, flashes in the light of suns, and holds the infinitude of stellar worlds in the meshes of laws expressive of unchanging purpose, there are no atheists." The evolved idea of God, now extant, and superbly promulgated by Brother Tuttle, the spirits and Spiritualists, is assuredly the destroyer of atheism. There is no reconciliation for the reasoning mind with regard to divinity, except by postulations of eternal naturalism. Cosmic processes must be according to eternal processes expressed in primates as ultimates. And these are successive concatenation of cause and effect.

The explorer in naturalism will readily agree that Brother Tuttle tells the truth when he says: "A man physically is a part of the physical universe; spiritually he is a part of the Cosmic Mind—of God. In man all the countless strings are attuned to vibrate to the touch of Cosmic intelligence."

These are sentiments worthy of wide heralding. Reading this book in close touch with nature's fields, where forms and forces are evolving, one cannot avoid its conclusions, nor fail to appreciate its teachings as the greatest of consolation.

O, how much humanity needs to have the myths, dogmas, superstitions and ignorance of the dark ages banished from their thrall over intelligence of this enlightened age! Nothings holds mentality, virtue and spirituality in bondage more than has superstition and supernaturalism. The religion of the future must be and will be postulated in naturalism, and human responsibility will expand with it as atheism flees before the truths of incarnate divinity.

Why should humanity be afraid of new ideas and facts? Priestcraft is responsible for that fear. Science and revelation banishes all fear. Brother Tuttle says: "The older an idea, the greater the probability that it is false." The Christ in each human needs to be developed, and can be until it shines as the sunlight of the soul's morning of conscious immortality. The grand possibilities of each person, and not an incarnation of eternal evil, is the revelation of law and of the spirit denizens of the upper or outer spheres. Listen again to Brother Tuttle: "Boundless capabilities, infinite progress, are the birthright of the human spirit. It does not look without for its redeemer, but within. Man, if redeemed, must redeem himself. Sin cannot be forgiven: it must be outgrown. Here is the ultimate of the christ idea."

Amen! Herald these ideas to the world, O ye advocates of spiritual law and spirit revelation; and then ye will go forth conquering.

These are consoling summer musings that will bring sunshine into the winter of our life. These will help solve the problem of UNIVERSAL SPIRITUALISM AND ITS PROPAGANDA.

Spiritualism is universal, because founded upon truth; and a truth is always universal. Whatever society, state or church needs, the same must be predicated upon truth; hence, as all truth is Spiritualism, then society, state and church must embody Spiritualism in their ethical systems. To secure that in continuous higher expressions should be the desire of every Spiritualist. Why, then, should we as a class be in despair about the success or failure of our truths to be utilized by the masses? All good powers and conditions for human advancement result only by assiduous endeavors of the earnest devotees thereof. By such soulful people has the progress of humanity been developed. They who sit down and wait for progress are not going to see it very soon but all who labor for it will stand a good chance of seeing some of its utilities embraced by their earthly associates. There is only one way toward progress, and to achieve success in life. That way is by endeavor. Despair is destructive, and confidence is constructive. The Spiritualists of this time need confidence. We need to present the evidence of spirit communion to a materialistic people, and we need to give philosophical and logical expositions of their naturalness, and we need to apply these to the ethical utilities of human lives; then Spiritualism will begin to take a firm place in both science and religion, whilst it shall conserve the highest possible utilities of our personal life. We will then have no cause of fear for its propaganda, for it will propagate itself.

What we sadly need is consecrated Spiritualists.

A Good-Will Manifestation

Some of the Spiritualists are constantly talking about the intolerance of the Christian sects. No doubt but much intolerance has been manifested; but perhaps the iconoclasts have created prejudice. There is a difference between argument and abuse; but many people, even some Spiritualists, use abuse as their most effective weapon. Truths and facts logically and charitably presented, will likely attract attention. I am radical in thought, but trust that I am tolerant of others' opinions. All see as they are led to see. The duty of a reformer and teacher is to lead.

My experience with sectarists over our grand country has led me to temporize my sentiments with judicious verbiage, and in a manner to lead to further inquiry. Some people may need sledge-hammer blows, but there are other delicate souls who can only assimilate tender treatment. Study your patient and treat accordingly. I am a resident, when at home, since 1902, of a Methodist community, their church being only across the way. Some of the pastors have shunned me and our house, whilst others have shown some social politeness to us, and one was a continual questioner of Spiritualism. But I, nor any of my family, have advanced to the people here any dissertations about Spiritualism, but all of them learned what our convictions are. People will get curious and hungry if you let them have their own time to ask for the spiritual and mental food they are all aware is needed.

Like a demand suddenly from the outermost to go forth and preach the gospel, came to me a request to come forth and preach it. The pastor and officials of our neighbor church extended to me an invitation to address their congregation Sunday evening, June 30, and I cheerfully accepted. They further generously said: "Speak on any subject you may desire. This neighborly and Christian act has deeply made an impression upon me as a sign of the times that foreshadows the era to be soon at hand when sectarianism shall be swept away and Christian fellowship be a condition of the churches triumphant, when what we call Spiritualism shall have swept the barriers away and its fundamental teachings be revealed as the true teachings of God, Christ and religion.

My subject on the stated occasion will be "A Practical Life," and I hope that these people will realize, as all must soon or late, that even now some good can come out of Nazareth, or any other community, or from any other class of people than those previously called the chosen of God. We shall realize before long that we are all children of one God, and heirs of one immortality.

Will Spiritualism be Absorbed?

A letter just to hand says that the Catholic church is preparing to absorb Spiritualism and its phenomena, and will claim it as their special movement or revelation; also that all other churches will soon accept it. This seems to be a dread by many.

Why should we as Spiritualists object to any or all sects accepting Spiritualism? We are anxious that the people shall all know and enjoy the truth and teachings obtained by spirit communion.

If every denomination should teach and demonstrate it, there would be just as much opportunity for the distinctive organization of Spiritualism as now. Indeed, there would then be greater possibilities for achievement than now exists. As Spiritualists we shall continue to be iconoclastic. There will always be reforms to achieve, and the Spiritualists are and will be essentially reformers. Do not be afraid of being absorbed, but rather rejoice in the prospect of a world's acceptance of the great truths, of which you have been pioneers.

Some Personal Dates.

On July 5 Mrs. Kates and self will have served the cause of Spiritualism for twenty years together as man and wife. We have given these years gladly, and ask that for some more years we may have the good will and help of mortals and spirits to carry on a humanitarian effort for the emancipation of all people from error and sorrow. On July 6 I will personally reach another mile-stone in my earth journey, and will be of an age to get an increase of pension from the United States for service as a boy soldier, and I trust that it will be the only case of me being a pensioner; for while I rejoice in such help to our needy and infirm mediums, I trust to be always able to help myself and save such increment as shall be sufficient for the hurrying approach of old age. Let us all learn how to best conserve the utilities of life, and ever be able and willing to help each other.

CLAIRVOYANCY.

Murderous Deeds Witnessed by an Old Bedridden Lady Two Miles Away.

When traveling in Waukesha Co., Wis., in 1887, I stopped one night at a farmer's house. There, while conversing with him about clairvoyancy, telepathy, etc., he said: "We found that very vividly exhibited in this house at one time. My mother-in-law had for years been confined to her bed. Late one evening she appeared to be sleeping, when suddenly she rose to a sitting posture and exclaimed excitedly: 'Those people will surely kill each other; they are fighting in the most beastly manner.' My wife ran to her and said: 'Why, mother, what is the mater with you? Your wild scream strikes terror through the whole house; what do you see?' The old lady answered: 'Down there at —— Hollow [I do not remember now the name of the hollow, two miles from their house] a man and woman are fighting and trying to kill each other, and I see a number of little houses in that hollow which I have never seen there before.' That was when they were building the railroad. A number of shacks and tents had been built there for the workmen. My mother-in-law had no knowledge of that; but in the morning after she had her vision it was found that one of the workmen, in a drunken spree, had quarreled with his wife and killed her, and that about the time my mother-in-law was so much excited."

That, surely, was clairvoyancy, pure and simple. KYMRO.

TRENCHANT REMARKS AND CONCLUSIONS

Of these two great evils it is, indeed, difficult to say which is the greater.

The Christian errs on the side of knowledge, but the Spiritualist who knowing the truth, sells his birthright for a mess of porridge is certainly a most dangerous person, and can do more harm in one minute than a dozen noble-minded people could accomplish in a lifetime.

It is not a difficult matter these days to find both men and women with broad intellects, but to find a really honest person—one who would not sell the spirit world for a dollar, appears as difficult as in the days of Diogenes.

I have heard more than one medium complain that as they were giving all their life to the spirit world, the least the spirits should do is to look after them.

Can it be possible that any person could be so stupid as to suppose that spirits are engaged in the manufacturing of dollars and cents? If it were so, many loving mothers would certainly assist their own dear children here on earth; but it is not so. Shall we, therefore, decide not to aid in the cause of justice and truth? Better do that than to think for a moment that the spirit world could not get along without us, or that Spiritualism can be advanced by admixtures of fraud. Better, a thousand times better, have no Spiritualism than have a spurious article. If we cannot have the plain, simple truth, let us have nothing.

The spirit world is anxious, yea, very anxious, to help suffering people, but there are many things they cannot do, and there are many other things, which, if they did do, would turn away from them many noble-minded persons. But their object is pure and noble. They have nothing to gain for their untiring efforts, otherwise than to see us happy and prospering. They must have, however, tools to work with. They do not expect perfection from us; they do not expect knowledge, for they are in a position to know the needs of humanity better than we. They do not expect great magnetic qualities, for they have the power to magnetize any subject, time being allowed for that process, but they do expect, and must have, honest, reliable material to work upon. Give them that and they can do wonders.

Where is the man or woman who could take an interest in, and slave for, a person incapable of appreciating their efforts, or whose sole thoughts were on some selfish gain? Yet we expect all of this from the spirits, and much more.

It is hard to witness the Christian's obstinacy in clinging to old worn-out ideas which have not advanced one step in the past generation; but it is certainly more trying to be obliged to witness the many money-making schemes many otherwise respectable mediums condescend to lower themselves to, and all at the expense of our noble cause.

Indeed, it is not to be wondered at that doubt and suspicions should exist as to our integrity of purpose and truth in our claims.

It is our noble religion which suffers the most by our lack of dignity.

Let us unite in our efforts to separate the chaff from the wheat, so that our enemies may see there is really some truth, something real and substantial about our spiritual claims.

FRED DUGGAN.

OUR SPIRITUAL BODIES.

A Spiritual Explanation of Their Character.

The good angel referred to in our last talk appeared luminous to the new-comer, because she glowed from a light, the spiritual light of a noble character within. Consider, friends, this principle, and doubt not that it is active here. The light must have been acquired within before it can be seen by those whom its owner wishes to help, for in the spirit world you see with the eye of the spirit intelligence, and there is no mistake. All is true as represented or expressed. It can be given or taken no other way. You may be dazzled with the effulgence of some spirit light and effluence before you are competent to receive it, or be in harmony with it; but the divine personality is there, and will uplift you.

Now the body of the spirit man is a spark, so to say, of electric force combined with the atmosphere, and therefore the constituents of the body are atmospheric electricity. Luminous to the extent that in association with one another we express ourselves by the outgoing of our personal electricity, called magnetism. By this personal magnetic element are we known to each other. Every magnetism has its personality, or every individual his own personal magnetism.

As to emanation of such magnetism, it is expressed in every conceivable form and degree. The finer and more potent expressions of the delicate qualities we term effluence, which express every emotion that can be expressed by you through the medium of speech, act, eye and feeling. It can well be understood, we believe, if this idea as to our manner of converse and action be rightly conceived, that we have powers of expression far beyond your own, and, let us add, deeper feelings to express.

All of this is so different from what you expected? Well, now, what would you have? A bright and luminous body with limbs such as you were accustomed to, but all perfect; a spiritual material form perfected at once into the image of the earthly body? That is what you expect? If you are disappointed you are disappointed with the truth. The form the spirit man must develop as does a plant.

But let us say to you further, that our forms are celestial. They are forms, to all intents and purposes, adapted to our new estate. Their elements are perfect for the use to be made of them. Why, our spirit forms are delightful as we make them to ourselves and to others. An atmospheric form! Yes, just that. Illuminated with our own character and nature and as we give our light to shine so are we ourselves.

Now all of this impresses you with the idea of our spiritual envelope as constituting what you would be, if definitely described by yourself, a light, translucent form. A form without, perhaps, a distinct impression as to there being features attached thereto; unless it be of a friend, when you would expect a likeness of that person in a spiritual guise.

This last idea is quite correct as to your imagination, for so would they appear to you could you see them now. But as a matter of spiritual fact, there is no such thing.

We are not in any sense of the word a ponderable body; nor do we have any such appearance to each other. We have acquired, as it would seem, a new sense and a new vision. We observe ourselves and each other through the atmospheric halo or clouds that envelop our spiritual entity, and in that sense we are a body, and only in that sense. Therefrom emanates all that we require for recognition, so you will see that for a body, as such, we have no need. Therefore, being no real body, we are what we make ourselves, both to ourselves and to each other, in the finer sense of what the mind and all our high attributes contain and express.

Fix us, then, in your mind as being mind capable of setting forth for observation all of those qualities that your mind may ever entertain; also as being made up of every desire of the heart, every emotion it is possible to conceive of, and say if, to you, with untrammeled possibilities, this kind of body is not a tangible fact. Your mind and its operations; your aspirations are facts to you, are they not? So when they come to be spiritually manifest or materialized into a spiritual essence that can be understood, are we not indeed a spiritual body?

Now consider all of this, friends, and think what can be done by us. For we have the privilege of exerting all of these essences of the mind unhampered by material surroundings or estopped by any means whatever from working out, as we may say, our own salvation, or from helping one another in the forward and progressive movement toward that eternity of time to which you all look forward.

HE IS IMMORTAL.

Yes, there's a horse that can read writing and do sums. "King," said Dr. Boyd, "add up those figures." And King Pharaoh gravely walked over and picked up the numbers one by one that made up the correct total. After the performance the ladies present all rushed up to kiss King, and he stood for it just like a pianist or any other celebrity.

Just when President Roosevelt had Jack London, Ernest Seton Thompson, Charles G. D. Roberts, Prof. Long and other writers of stories of animal life made members of the Ananias Club, King Pharaoh comes to town.

King Pharaoh [as set forth in the New York World] is a horse with a human education—not a mere high-school horse, mind you, but a regular "Siss, boom, ah!" college horse.

All the "nature writers" can now give the august personage of the President the horse laugh.

If a horse with an education can know so much, who shall define the mental processes of the most illiterate of animals.

King Pharaoh should receive autograph letters from the nature writers with their felicitations. Not being physically fitted to use a pen or ply a typewriter, King Pharaoh will be excused from personally acknowledging the letters. But he can read. Oh, there is no doubt about that, he can read; and Dr. Boyd, his tutor and amanuensis, says that King Pharaoh's greatest joy in life is reading over his daily mail.

King Pharaoh is a claybank piebald, half Arabian and half Indian pony.

As a colt he was denied even a kindergarten course or even a primary grade opportunity to learn his leters.

He was a poor horse, his parents had parted before he was born, and it seemed as if his destiny was to be a life of ignorance and toil, when something about this bright young horse attracted the attention of Dr. Boyd, a noted equine educator of Shelbyport, Ky.

King Pharaoh proved an apt and willing pupil.

To-day he could take a post-graduate course in any of the correspondence schools and fit himself for bookkeeping, civil engineering, advertisementwriting, window dressing—anything, but he finds the show business pleasant and profitable.

Aside from the pleasures of contemplation that a well-instructed mind inspires, the value of an education in mere dollars and cents is strikingly exemplified in the case of King Pharaoh.

Before he had an education he was worth $36. Four years of schooling has made him worth $100,000.

King Pharaoh made his bow to the press, public and nature lovers of New York last Thursday night in the Madison Square Garden Concert Hall.

Differing from the usual trained or trick horse, King Pharaoh proved he had a solid, and thorough education by answering questions asked him by persons present, so far as a command can be answered by action.

He added up sums on the blackboard by bringing the figures of the answers from a rack, even "carrying" one, or two, or whatever the digit over might be; he divided, subtracted, chose colors, picked out little girls in pink, fat gentlemen, pretty ladies, ugly men, not only by word of command, but when it was written for him on the blackboard.

King Pharaoh has had a "Dothe-boys Hall" education. When he studies a word he goes and does it.

He was introduced to total strangers and remembered their names for the rest of the evening; for when anyone wrote on the blackboard "Pick up Mr. Smith's hat and take it over to Mr. Jones" he never hesitated.

Anyone could write commands for him and he would obey. He thoroughly enjoyed himself, and worked with neither whip, pointer or command or signal that could be noticed.

King Pharaoh will spend the summer at "Golden City," the new pleasure park at Canarsie. And if you do not believe he knows what you say or can read what you write, don't take our word for it, but go down and see.

Added to the refining charms of culture and education, King Pharaoh has a most pleasing personality, and the ladies say he is "a love."

And King Pharaoh loves sweet words as well as sugar. Besides all this, he is right in the news, because he upholds the contention of the "nature writers" that animals do think!—New York World.

"AS TO SPIRITUALISM."

A Christian Editor Brought to Book for Rank Injustice and Warping the Evidence of a Scientist.

To the Editor, St. Louis Christian Advocate:—My attention has been called to an article bearing the above caption in the issue of your valuable paper of May 8. In the interests of fact, as well as of right and justice, I beg leave to correct some of the glaring misstatements found therein. I do not desire to enter into controversy, but I do feel that the testimony of Sir Wm. Crookes should be presented to your readers just as he gave it, and his conclusions, after four years of painstaking investigation, proclaimed with equal emphasis.

I have before me a book entitled "The Phenomena of Spiritualism," by Sir Wm. Crookes, published in 1874. On page 6 of said work, I find the three paragraphs, the substance of which you quote in your article. May I ask why you stopped with those three? Would it not have been much more in harmony with truth and justice to have quoted the four succeeding paragraphs, and then added the foot note which I herewith append to this article?

"In justice to my subject, I must state that, on repeating these views to some of the leading 'Spiritualists' and most trustworthy 'mediums' in England, they expressed perfect confidence in the success of the inquiry, if honestly carried out in the spirit here exemplified; and they have offered to assist me to the utmost of their ability, by placing their peculiar powers at my disposal. As far as I have proceeded, I may as well add that the preliminary tests have been satisfactory."

In the "Quarterly Journal of Science," July 1, 1871, Prof. Crookes refers to an article published by him in the same quarterly, Vol. VII, page 316, July, 1870, in which he says he stated in the most emphatic manner his belief in the occurrence under certain circumstances of phenomena inexplicable by any known natural laws. He says further, "Opportunities having since offered for pursuing the investigation, I have gladly availed myself of them for applying to these phenomena careful, scientific testing experiments, and I have thus arrived at certain results which I think it right to be published. These experiments appear conclusively to establish the existence of a new force, in some unknown manner connected with the human organization, which for convenience may be caled the "Psychic Force."

Prof. Crookes continued his experiments for a period of four years, at the conclusion of which he declared in the book to which I referred in the second paragraph of this article, that he had found that the aforesaid "Psychic Force" had established thirteen different classes of phenomena. On page 86 of the work in question he begins his enumeration of these thirteen classes, concluding the same on page 98. On page 100 the affirmation is made that these phenomena are caused by intelligent beings, but what these intelligent beings are, is a subject for other theories. From page 102 to page 112, inclusive, Prof. Crookes deals with his experiments with Miss Florence Cook, covering a period of three years. "To imagine," he says, "that the work of the last three years is the result of imposture does more violence to one's reason and common sense than to believe her to be what she herself affirms."

From the foregoing you will see, in common with your readers, that Prof. Crookes has written no indictment of Spiritualism, either as a religion or as a branch of science. In a later work entitled "Researches in Spiritualism," Prof. Crookes does not hesitate to declare himself a Spiritualist. You have quoted him as condemning the system of thought in which he himself believes: I request you to be sufficiently just to him, and to all of his co-religionists, to undo what you did in the unfair article in question. I admit that there are counterfeit mediums, and that many of the phenomena presented in the name of Spiritualism are absolutely spurious. Are there no counterfeit Christians—no spurious manifestations of their faith? Because some Christians are bad, no one has a right to assume that all are, and, Mr. Editor, because some mediums are frauds, neither you nor anyone else has the right to assume that all are. Inference is never evidence, but it is one's duty to trace all inferences to a finality in order that the true cause may be determined. Your assertion that Spiritualism from beginning to end is nothing more than an elaborate system of deception falls to the ground through the testimony of the very witness whom you cited to give evidence against it. To this testimony of Sir Wm. Crookes we can add that of Prof. Alfred Russel Wallace, Rev. M. J. Savage, Rev. R. Heber Newton, Prof. Cromwell F. Varley, Prof. Caesar Lombroso, Col. Albert DeRochas, and a score of others equally as intelligent as are they.

Very truly yours,

HARRISON D. BARRETT,
Editor-at-Large.

TASTE FOR LITERATURE.

The goat a learned soul is he!
He takes a tome upon his knee,
And be it ever so profound,
In rarest lore though it abound,
Expounded by some ancient sage,—
Yet he'll devour it page by page
With careless mien and free.
Were I a goat 'twould make me gloat
In glee!

For as the matter stands with me,
I delve in books unceasingly;
Yet some I read of vast portent
And never know just what they meant.
I fear (with sorrow be it said)
My stomach's stronger than my head:
A dreadful way to be!
That's why I'd gloat were I a goat,
You see.

The goat a cultured taste has he.
And catholic as it can be.
Through libraries he'll browse with zest
And find no works he can't digest.
Though now-a-days there's stuff that's writ
Would give a goat a coughing fit
Or so it seems to me.
But, ah! the goat a husky throat
Has he.

With clever perspicacity
I've learned a thing that startled me.
Since I myself have writ a book
I scan reviews with anxious look—
And all the papers that I read
Have hired a goat to do the deed—
'Tis true as true can be.
And much I've wrote has smote a goat
Or stuck, I fear, within his throat.
Ah me!

A DESIRABLE CONTAGION.

"Honesty Is Becoming a Contagion," Says the Illustrious Newell Dwight Hillis.—"It Is the Golden Age for Which the Fathers Longed.

The geologist tells us that the White Mountains were the first peaks to emerge from the sea; then, little by little, the whole continent appeared, rising above the hot waters of either ocean. That was a great moment when Mount Washington first cleared itself of water, steam and mud and stood forth, crowned with sunlight, the forerunner of a new continent.

But more wonderful still the sudden entrance of conscience and ethics into the industrial and corporative life of the republic. For years, doubtless, the preparatory processes have been going on, but the ethical movement has published itself only in the last few weeks and months. To-day the railroads are posting their rates and withdrawing secret rebates. Alarmed, politicians no longer hawk franchises in the lobbies of the city hall. Recently a wholesale house has raised the price for a certain food product. The reason given is that hitherto each pound package contained fifteen ounces, the other ounce being the pasteboard box.

They have to charge more now, because they give sixteen ounces in return for the pound purchased. The merchant says that the saving of that ounce always paid for the pasteboard boxes and the packing. Now that his firm has become honest he has to raise the price. In his innocence he has confessed that for years his firm has stolen one-sixteenth of the goods from the people who bought them.

Henceforth who can say religion is not worth its weight in gold and coffee and rice and sugar? It seems that the appearance of conscience in trade has wrought out the Pure Food bill, and that henceforth the foods that are adulterated will be marked adulterated, and foods that are pure will be marked pure.

Even more wonderful is the influence of conscience in politics. The time was when the world of politics was a wild waste, a Salton Sea. Now the occasional peak of honesty is emerging therefrom. The peaks may seem solitary and separated, the occasional names being as distant from each other as the star named Sirius and our sun. Nevertheless, conscience has appeared.

In Springfield, Ill., a merchant from a certain city wished a bill put through the legislature. On the surface the bill looked all right, representing the interests of the people; secretly it was in the interest of the merchant, who had sent his paid lobbyists to the State capital. Probably the legislators did not know what was involved, but their leaders reported the bill favorably. On hearing of his good fortune the merchant prepared to take the midnight train for Chicago, but in the late afternoon he decided to drive out and visit Lincoln's tomb. Stopping his carriage, he walked slowly about the monument. When the shadows fell the night found him still looking at the face of Lincoln, with his face turned toward the State House, and his hand holding a roll. At length, in the darkness the merchant returned to his hotel. Giving up his berth on the sleeper, he spent the night in the capital, but all night long he tossed upon his bed. When the day dawned he sent for his representative and told him to withdraw the bill. When his attorney expostulated, saying that the bill would pass, since the work was all done, the merchant insisted. Crowded for his reason, he drove his attorney to the park and cemetery, and there, in front of Lincoln's monument, he bade the driver stop, and, looking up, he said the lobbyist: "I cannot do so mean a thing with Lincoln looking toward the State House and watching me."

Being dead, the martyred President lived and spoke eloquently, pleading for justice and honesty. And in every city and State capital honest men are appearing. Every day witnesses a political uprising in some city. With whips and scourges the public conscience is driving the money changers out of the city councils. The time is near at hand when the city council shall be as honorable and distinguished a body as the chamber of commerce. And this is a new note in the political world.

More striking still the ethical note in the realm of public morals. England can no longer say that the multi-millionaire can do anything he wants to in America. If any European reads the American press the last week he will discover that so far from the people living in awe of the multi-millionaire who outrages the laws of decency and good morals he will close the papers with the idea that the aforementioned Croesus has had all the sewers in forty cities emptied upon his be-diamonded, talkative and much-betrothed neck.

That cell in the prison with its inmate warns all youth that legal ability, all the influence of friends and money, avail nothing to keep a successful lawyer who has perjured himself and helped conceal crime from going to his own place behind the bars.

Man wants money—but when a man is hungry he must not eat coals of fire. And when a man is avaricious he must not seek satisfaction by getting money through crime and fraud. The whole nation is rising up to shake off its former lies, vices and sins. In politics, if a youth wants position and preferment he must plead the cause of the poor. In literature and fiction if the novelist wants to succeed he must portray the triumph of honor and the defeat of sham and humbug. If a magazine wants to increase its circulation it takes up some cause and become a voice for the public conscience. On every side are young men of ability and large mental acquirements who have tried to get on by the low ethical ideals of the politicians of the old school, with the result that these ambitious young men are now utterly discredited and without any hope of future preferment.

Honesty is becoming a contagion. It is an auspicious hour for our people. It is the golden age for which the fathers longed. And this new note of conscience in public life prophesies a new era of happiness and progress for the people of the republic.—New York World.

THE PSYCHOGRAPH

OR

Dial Planchette.

This instrument is substantially the same as that employed by Prof. Hare in his early investigations. In its improved form it has been before the public for more than twelve years, and in the hands of thousands of persons has proved its superiority over the Planchette, and all other instruments which have been brought out in imitation, both in regard to certainty and correctness of the communications received by its aid, and as a means of developing mediumship.

Do you wish to investigate Spiritualism?
Do you wish to develop Mediumship?
Do you desire to receive communications?

The Psychograph is an invaluable assistant. A pamphlet with full directions for the

with every instrument. Many who were not aware of their mediumistic gift, have, after a few sittings, been able to receive delightful messages. A volume might be filled with commendatory letters. Many who began with it as an amusing toy, found that the intelligence controlling it knew more than themselves, and became converts to Spiritualism.

Capt. B. B. Edwards, Orient, N. Y., writes: "I had communications (by the Psychograph) from many other friends, even from old settlers whose gravestones are moss-grown in the old yard. They have been highly satisfactory, and proved to me that Spiritualism is indeed true, and the communications have given my heart the greatest comfort in the severest loss I have had of son, daughter, and their mother."

Dr. Eugene Crowell, whose writings have made his name familiar to those interested in psychic matters, writes as follows: "I am much pleased with the Psychograph. It is very simple in principle and construction, and I am sure must be far more sensitive to spiritual power than the one now in use. I believe it will generally supersede the latter when its superior merits become known."

Spiritualism Wins!

A Law Case of Great Importance Decided in Favor of Spiritualism—A Triumph of of Justice and Right in Illinois.

Mr. Justice Vickers Delivered the Opinion of the Court.

The specific grounds upon which contestants sought to set aside the will, as charged in their bill, are as follows:—

"That the said James T. Crumbaugh, at the time of executing the said instrument in writing purporting to be his last will and testament, was of advanced age, past seventy years, afflicted with disease and was not of sound mind and memory, but, on the contrary, was at the time wholly incapable of understanding the nature and effect of the business in which he was engaged; that at the time of the making of said will the said James T. Crumbaugh was possessed of an insane delusion as to the natural objects of his bounty and the object upon which he attempted by the said alleged will to confer his bounty; that he was insane upon certain religious subjects, and that this insanity, delusion and unsoundness of mind directly affected and controlled the distribution of his property and rendered him wholly incapable of making any just and proper division and distribution of his estate, and that such insanity, delusion and unsoundness of mind continued until the time of his death; that owing to his impaired mind and also to his highly excited feelings in matters pertaining to Spiritualism, the said James T. Crumbaugh was very liable to be unduly influenced by others, and that his mind has been purposely directed and unduly influenced by designing persons, to-wit: Wesley M. Owen, Mrs. Isaac Pemberton, Mrs. Coolidge, Bangs sisters, Mrs. Elizabeth J. Crumbaugh, and various other persons and spirits whose names are unknown, to make such a disposition of his property as he actually did in said instrument of writing, so that, although his mind had become so impaired as to incapacitate him to make a will, this idea of making these bequests to build and maintain a Spiritualistic church and library and leaving his nearest kin unprovided for, remained fixed in his mind, and that the said James T. Crumbaugh was at the time of the execution of said instrument of writing under improper restraint and undue influence from the undue acts and fraudulent practices of these designing persons, and that said undue acts and fraudulent practices consisted in obtaining control of the mind of said James T. Crumbaugh by means of hypnotism, mesmerism, legerdemain, seances, and by working upon the already disordered mind of the said James T. Crumbaugh by means of communications from the supposed spirits, and thus directing the said disordered mind, over which, by these fraudulent means, they had obtained control, in such a way as to cause him to believe that his future welfare and happiness in the world to come depended upon his disposing of his property as he by the said supposed will did attempt to dispose of it, and by causing him to believe that the spirits of his departed friends and relatives ordered him to so dispose of his property, and particularly that "Bright Eyes," the spirit of his dead son, advised and requested such a disposition of his said property, and that this control over his mind was secured by pretenses of friendship toward the said James T. Crumbaugh and by obtaining his confidence, to the end that by and through the means aforesaid this property could be secured for the benefit of the Spiritualist church in general and for the benefit of these same designing persons who expected to profit therefrom."

The issues formed by appellant's denial, in his answer, of all that is material of the foregoing allegations were the questions submitted to and decided by the jury. So far as the issue of undue influence is concerned, considered separately from the alleged delusions of the testator in regard to Spiritualism, but little need be said. While the contention of contestants on this issue is not abandoned, still the evidence introduced in support of such contention is so meager that it cannot be seriously contended that contestant's position on this point is supported to such extent as to require any extended notice by this court. It is apparent from the method of treatment in the respective briefs of the parties that the controversy in regard to Crumbaugh's testamentary capacity is regarded by both parties as the paramount and controlling issue in this case.

Upon behalf of contestants some twenty-four lay witnesses and eight physicians were introduced and testified before the jury in support of the allegations of the bill. No attempt will be made to set out the evidence of these several witnesses in detail. No necessity exists for so doing, and it would unduly extend this opinion if such course were pursued. The non-expert witnesses testify, generally, to a personal acquaintance with the testator varying from a few months to several years, and most of them also say that they had conversed with the testator on the subject of Spiritualism, and many undertake to reproduce the substance of such conversations, and quite a number of the witnesses for contestants express the opinion that the testator was insane on the subject of Spiritualism. From the body of the testimony of the non-expert witnesses a number of facts or occurrences are brought out upon which the witnesses base their opinions of insanity, and which form the basis of contestants' most serious contention that the testator did not possess the sound mind and memory requisite to make a valid will. The facts testified to by the witnesses for the contestants may be summarized as follows:—

The testator had been a Universalist in his religious belief until five or six years before his death. His wife had been a Spiritualist for many years. Prior to the time he embraced Spiritualism he was an ardent Universalist and very much opposed to the views of Spiritualism held by his wife. His views underwent a complete change a few years before his death and he became a pronounced and enthusiastic Spiritualist. He visited distant parts of the country to attend spiritual seances. He made one or more visits to Lily Dale, N. Y., to attend a Spiritualist seance and went to other distant points for the same purpose. On one occasion, when he returned from Lily Dale, he brought a picture with him which he said was the picture of his boy that had died some thirty years before, and also a flower from the spirit land which he claimed had been given him by his son. The picture represented a full-grown young man, which the testator said was the picture of his son who had grown to manhood in the spirit land and that his name in the spirit land was "Bright Eyes." The testator said to one witness that Bright Eyes was his spirit guide and that he attended him and kept him from harm. The testator also had pictures, which he had procured at these seances, of persons who had died long before, and which pictures he claimed had been taken from the appearance of the persons at the Spiritualist seances. The testator also had a picture, made in the same way, of himself in a group with certain deceased persons. It is also shown that the testator told some of the witnesses that Bright Eyes would come to his room at night and bid him good-night; that his mother appeared to him and implanteed a kiss on his cheek many years after she had died. It was also shown that the testator would frequently urge the witnesses to attend Spiritual meetings, assuring them that they could hold communications with their deceased relatives. It is testified to, also, that on one occasion when the testator was in a field where the witness was blowing out stumps with dynamite, a piece of one of the stumps was blown in such a way that it would have struck the deceased if he had not moved just prior to the explosion; that on another occasion the testator fell and his head came near striking a step, and that on another occasion, when the testator was burning brush, his feet became entangled in the brush and he fell and came near falling into the fire. In relating these several occurrences the testator would ascribe his deliverance from the impending danger to Bright Eyes, and told his neighbors and friends that it was Bright Eyes who saved him on these occasions from being injured. On another occasion the testator visited one of his relatives for the purpose of obtaining her signature to some papers which he desired to have executed in furtherance of an adjustment of some pending litigation between certain relatives. There was a state of ill feeling between the witness visited, Mrs. Sarver, and her mother, and she testified that she refused to sign the papers. At this time the testator urged Mrs. Sarver to forgive her mother and become reconciled to her, and said that he had forgiven her mother for the murder of his child. He said that Mrs. Sarver's mother and her husband, who was a brother to the testator, had killed testator's only child many years before; that the manner in which they had become responsible for the death of the baby was, that they had taken a cow from testator's premises, the milk of which had been the baby's food, and that in consequence of being compelled to get another cow and change the milk the baby had died. The testator also said that the cow had been taken away from him in his absence and, without his consent, and that he would have been glad to have bought the cow and paid more than she was worth if they had been willing to leave her with him. It is also testified to that the testator said that he had received a communication from the spirit land explaining the circumstances concerning the death of a neighbor's child, who had been burned to death in a barn. The testator said that the child procured matches from the kitchen and went to the hay-mow in the barn and buried itself in the hay and was smothered to death, and that it was not burned to death, as its parents had supposed. This alleged communication seemed to comfort the bereaved parents, who believed the child had been burned alive.

The foregoing summary of alleged spiritual manifestations embraces substantially all that is testified to by the non-expert witnesses in support of contestants' bill. The evidence also shows that the testator had heart disease, and that he had varicose veins, which caused one of his legs to be black from the knee down, and that he claimed he was receiving treatment for his ailments through spiritual agency, and that he was apparently better, at times, under such alleged treatment; but the evidence shows that if he received any relief at all it was only temporary, and that the general tendency was a decline in his physical condition and that he finally died of heart disease. It is shown by a number of witnesses that the testator would cry when talking about his deceased relations, and sometimes when witnesses would decline to attend Spiritualist meetings he would manifest similar emotions. The substance of the foregoing facts and conditions was embraced in a hypothetical question to contestants' expert witnesses, and they answered that in their opinion, under the facts stated, that the testator was insane on the subject of Spiritualism.

On behalf of the proponents fifty-five non-expert witnesses and twelve experts testified. The non-expert witnesses for proponent were laborers, mechanics, farmers, merchants, ministers and business men, who had known the testator from periods ranging from a few months to all their lives. Many of them were persons who had transacted various kinds of business with the testator. From a general view of the testimony the facts are brought out that the testator was an industrious, economical and successful business man; that he was uniformly methodical and careful in his business habits; that he attended personally to the leasing, renting and management of his farms, made contracts and settlements with his tenants, collected and marketed his rents and personally managed and superintended all the details of his business; that in addition to looking after his farming he gave personal attention to the management of the bank, was its vice-president and a member of the loaning committee, and that he actually and personally participated in the management of the affairs of the bank both before and after the execution of the will in question. These witnesses all testify that the testator was sane, and competent to transact intelligently and understandingly any ordinary business affair. The experts who testified for proponents expressed the opinion that the testator was sane at the time he made his will, in answer to a hypothetical question embodying, in substance, the same facts included in the question propounded to contestants' experts, with facts added which were developed by proponents' testimony. Proponents also offered in evidence the articles of faith as declared in the constitutions and by-laws of the Illinois State Spiritualist Association, as follows:—

"First—We believe in infinite intelligence.

"Second—We believe that the phenomena of nature, physical and spiritual, are expressions of infinite intelligence.

"Third—We affirm that correct understanding of such expressions, and living in accordance therewith, constitute the true religion.

Fourth—We affirm that the existence and personal identity of individuals continue after the change called death.

"Fifth—We affirm that communication with the so-called dead is a fact, scientifically proven by the phenomena of Spiritualism.

"Sixth—We believe that the highest morality is contained in the Golden Rule: 'Whatsoever ye would that others should do unto you, do ye unto them.'"

Dr. George B. Warne testified that he was a practicing physician and professor in Hahnemann Medical College and engaged in the general practice of medicine; that he was a Spiritualist, and had been for twenty years; that he was president of the Illinois State Spiritualist Association and vice-president of the National Spiritualist Association, and a trustee of both corporations. He testified that it was a part of Spiritualistic creed believed by Spiritualists, that spirits communicate with mortals by clairaudience—that is, clear hearing, rapping, moving of tables or moving of furniture, trumpet seance, materialization, writing, spirit healing and materialization and spirit photography. He was asked, "What is the general belief of Spiritualists in regard to progression after death, physically and mentally?" This question was objected to and the objection sustained.

From the foregoing statement it is apparent that there is utterly no foundation upon which a finding of general insanity of the testator can rest. In fact, it is conceded by contestants that the testator was sane on all subjects except Spiritualism. Aside from this, the evidence proves, beyond a reasonable doubt, that in all the relations and affairs of life the testator was entirely rational, and acted with that judgment, prudence and foresight usually exercised by careful and successful men. He was able to amass a large fortune for a man engaged in his line of business, and to invest and manage it so as to avoid losses and preserve it intact until the day of his death. The only basis to be found in this record for questioning the testamentary capacity of the testator is the fact that the testator was a believer in Spiritualism and the claim that this belief amounted to an insane delusion, under the influence of which the testator made the will in question. It must be admitted, under the proofs here, that the testator was an altruist regarding all of the doctrines embraced in the articles of faith of the Spiritualist Association, but that there is any evidence in this record of insanity or insane delusions which cannot be accounted for by reason of Crumbaugh's belief in Spiritualism cannot be maintained. Under the law of Illinois every person of requisite age, being of sound mind and memory, has the power to devise all of his property in any way he may elect; and when the validity of a will is challenged on the ground that the testator did not possess the requisite testamentary capacity, the ultimate and final question is, did the testator, at the time when the instrument was executed, possess the sound mind and memory required by Section 1 of our Statute of Wills?

Courts and text writers have often considered the question what is and what is not a proper test of testamentary capacity. In Campbell v. Campbell, 130 Ill. 466, this court, after an extensive review of many authorities in this and other jurisdictions, laid down the following test: "The true inquiry in every case therefore is, did the person whose testamentary capacity is questioned, have, at the time of making his will, such mind and memory as enabled him to understand the business in which he was then engaged and the effect of the disposition made by him of his property? If he did, he was possessed of the sound mind and memory required by the statute; and all degrees of impairment of the mental faculties, or dementia, whether senile or produced by other causes, which destroy the testamentary capacity, will disqualify, whether it has reached the stage of absolute imbecility or not." Any mere mental aberrations resulting in the sub-normal exercise of the faculties, which do not result in such impairment of the reason, judgment and memory as to render a testator unable to understand the business of making a will and the effect of the disposition to be made of his property, will not vitiate the will. The existence of delusions or delusional insanity, is recognized, both by scientists and legal writers, as a form of insanity which, when shown to have existed in the testator at the time the will was executed and to have controlled its execution, will avoid the instrument. The existence of insane delusions on one subject is not incompatible with sanity on all other subjects. Contestants' position in the case in hand is that the testator was sane on all subjects except Spiritualism, as to which it is contended he had an insane delusion within the legal meaning of those terms, and that the will in question was the result of such insane delusions and is therefore void. It therefore becomes necessary to examine with some particularity, whether, under the evidence, such contention can be sustained.

An insane delusion which will render the sufferer incapable of making a will is difficult to define with exact precision. A delusion is said to be a belief in a state or condition of things the existence of which no rational person would believe. (In re Forman, 54 Barb. 274; Prather v. McClelland, 76 Tex. 574; Schneider v. Manning, 121 Ill. 376.) A delusion has also been defined as "a spontaneous conception and acceptance as a fact of that which has no real existence except in imagination and persistent adherence to it against all evidence." (Smith v. Smith, 48 N. J. Eq. 566; Rusk v. Megee, 36 Ind. 69; Philadelphia Trust and Sav. Dep. Co. v. Drinkhouse, 17 Phila. 23.) Again, the same definition, in substance is given in Potter v. Jones, 20 Ore. 239, (12 L. R. A. 161,) as follows: "A conception that originated spontaneously in the mind without evidence of any kind to support it, which can be accounted for on no reasonable hypothesis, having no foundation in reality and springing from a diseased or morbid condition of the mind." Another form of definition conveying substantially the same meaning is given in Middleditch v. Williams, 45 N. J. Eq. 726, (4 L. A. R. 738,) and is as follows: "If, without evidence of any kind, a testator imagines or conceives something to exist which does not exist in fact, and which no rational person would, in the absence of evidence, believe to exist, he is afflicted with an insane delusion." "Whenever a person conceives something extravagant to exist which has no existence whatever but in his heated imagination, and is incapable of being permanently reasoned out of that conception, he is under an insane delusion in a peculiar, half-technical sense of the term." (Mullins v. Cottrell, 41 Miss. 291; Benoist v. Murrin, 58 Mo. 307; Stanton v. Weatherwax, 16 Barb. 259.) A person who believes supposed facts which have no existence except in his perverted imagination, and which are against all evidence and probability, and conducts himself, however logically, upon the assumption of their existence, is, so far as they are concerned, under an insane delusion. In re Shaw, 2 Redf. 107; in re White, 121 N. Y. 406.

In setting out these various definitions we do not do so with the purpose of giving our approval to each of them, but merely to show the different forms of expression that courts have used to express the legal conception of an insane delusion. Whatever form of words is chosen to express the legal meaning of an insane delusion, it is clear, under all of the authorities, that it must be such an aberration as indicates an unsound or deranged condition of the mental faculties as distinguished from a mere belief in the existence or non-existence of certain supposed facts or phenomena based upon some sort of evidence. A belief which results from a process of reasoning from evidence, however imperfect the process may be or illogical the conclusion, is not an insane delusion. An insane delusion is not established when the court is able to understand how a person situated as the testator was, might have believed all that the evidence shows that he did believe and still have been in full possession of his senses. Thus, where the testator has actual grounds for the suspicion of the existence of something in which he believes, though in fact not well founded and disbelieved by others, the misapprehension of the fact is not a matter of delusion which will invalidate his will. Stackhouse v. Horton, 15 N. J. Eq. 202; Potter v. Jones, supra; Martin v. Thayer, 37 W. Va. 38; Mullins v. Cottrell, supra.

The case of Wait v. Westfall, 161 Ind. 648, (68 N. E. Rep. 271,) is an instructive case on this phase of the doctrine of insane delusions. There the testator believed that he could locate hidden treasure by means of a small metallic ball suspended on a thread. He spent a great deal of his time in going over the fields trying to locate the hidden metallic treasure, and holes were dug in so many places that they became a nuisance and had to be stopped. It was shown that a silver dollar hid under the carpet in a room could be located by the peculiar vibrations of the metallic ball when it was suspended over the silver dollar, and this circumstance offered some basis for the testator's belief that he could locate money buried in the ground by the same means and the fact that there was this basis for the testator's belief, however erroneous or mistaken the conclusion drawn therefrom, distinguished the belief from an insane delusion. It is true that the bare fact that the metallic ball would indicate, by certain vibratory motions, where a silver dollar was, might be by most persons regarded as a very trifling circumstance upon which to predicate a belief that one could find treasure hidden in the earth in the same way, but it serves to show that the belief was not a spontaneous creation of a deranged mind. The following excerpt of the opinion of Mr. Justice Hadley in this case is pertinent to the question now under consideration:

"What tribunal occupied by finite beings is qualified to adjudge false, asserted force of attraction and magnetism or the phenomena of mind, because incapable of demonstration, or that certain supernatural powers and influences do not exist because not in accord with an assumed standard of mental action? In all the ages of the world instruments and devices have been employed in locating minerals in the earth. The fact is notorious that there are many intelligent, conservative persons who claim the power of locating water in the earth by means of a forked stick, and thousands of wells located by them have been dug and are still being dug. It is equally a matter of common report that such a stick will point downward some men and not in the hands of some men and not in the hands of others. Many scholars and successful business men sincerely believe in Spiritualism, and of being able, not by all, but through the instrumentality of a few naturally qualified persons called 'mediums,' to converse with and be advised by the spirits of departed friends, and believe they recognize the voices and handwriting of the dead. Mental phenomena are as various as the hues of the autumnal forest. In Chafin's will, 32 Wis. 564, it is said: 'Dr. Carver, a very intelligent medical witness, who had been in the western mines, testified: I have seen hundreds of men in the mountains who came there on dreams, including lawyers, doctors and priests. Business men here in Monroe have been and searched for minerals under the direction of clairvoyants.' Others believe in Christian science; others in clairvoyance; others in the transmigration of souls, and others in witchcraft. To affirm or deny the truth of these things proves nothing, and demonstrates the individual to be neither a sage nor a fool. Who shall be the judge whether the mind that accepts or reflects them is the truly do not ride broomsticks and practice their evil arts upon us, and that there are no witches, than we have Blackstone, the father of our common law, Chief Justice Mathew Hale, Coke, Sir Francis Bacon, Richard Baxter, John Wesley, Martin Luther, Cotton Mather, and a host of other eminent jurists and savants, against us; encyclopedias; Nevin's Witchcraft in Salem Village; Upham's Salem Witchcraft; Campbell's Lives of the Chief Justices, vol. 2. Early in the history of our jurisprudence much difficulty, for the reason above suggested, was experienced by the courts in fixing a standard of intellect by which testamentary capacity could be determined, and legislative bodies were not inclined to relieve the courts of their embarrassment. For instance, our statute for more than half a century has provided that all persons, except infants and persons of unsound mind, may make a will. Similar statutes have long prevailed in other States of the Union and in England. In construing these statutes the courts of both this country and England were at first disposed to hold that any mind possessed of an eccentricity, aberration or erratic trend, such as amounted to an insane delusion, was not a sound mind within the meaning of the statute, and hence incapable. This doctrine has long since been repudiated by the courts of this country—certainly by this State since Teegarden v. Lewis, 145 Ind. 98; 40 N. E. Rep. 1047; 44 id. 9. Under the law as now settled, capacity is not determined by what one believes nor by the character of the horrid tales he can tell. The test is, putting aside all perversion, peculiarities and hallucinations of the mind, does there remain in the subject an untrammeled intellect, sufficiently strong and rational to know the value and extent of his property, the number and names of those who are the natural objects of his bounty, their deserts with reference to their conduct and treatment toward him, and memory sufficient to carry these things in mind long enough to have his will prepared and executed. See cases collected in Teegarden v. Lewis, Ind. 98; 40 N. E. Rep. 1047; 44 N. E. Rep. 9; at page 103, 145 Ind.; page 1048, 40 N. E. Rep."

In the late case of Scott v. Scott, 212 Ill. 597, we held that a belief in Swedenborgianism and an enthusiasm manifested in propagating that faith furnish no evidence of monomania, insane delusion or insanity. There the testator devised the greater portion of his property to a corporation which was organized for the sole object of printing, publishing and circulating the theological works and writings of Emanuel Swedenborg, and the only evidence of delusion was the belief of the testator in the teachings of the so-called Swedenborg church. In disposing of that contention this court said (p. 603): "The great majority of civilized human beings believe in the existence of a life beyond the grave. Based upon that belief, many religious creeds, differing widely, have been established. The fact that an individual holds any particular belief in regard to a future state of existence cannot of itself be evidence of an insne delusion or monomania. An insane delusion is a belief in something impossible in the nature of things, or impossible under the circumstances surrounding the afflicted individual, and which refuses to yield either to evidence or reason. (Riggs v. A. H. M. Society, 33 Hun, 656; State v. Lewis, 20 Nev. 333; Rush v. Megee, 36 Ind. 80.) We have heretofore said that 'insane delusion consists in the belief of facts which no rational person would have believed.' Nicewander v. Nicewander, 151 Ill. 156; Schneider v. Manning, 121 id. 376.) Such a delusion does not exist unless it is one whose fallacy can be certainly demonstrated, for except such demonstration can be made it cannot be said that no rational person would entertain the belief. Consequently no creed or religious belief, in so far as it pertains to an existence after death, can be regarded as a delusion, because there is no test by which it can be tried and its truth or falsity demonstrated. Gass v. Gass, 3 Humph. 278; Buchanan v. Pirir, 205 Pa. St. 123; Orchardson v. Coeld, 171 Ill. 14."

Tested by the rules laid down in the foregoing authorities, it is clear that the testator in the case at bar was not the victim of an insane delusion, within the meaning of the law. In the light of these authorities let us examine the occurrences which contestants rely on as showing that the testator was controlled by an insane delusion. Take, for example, the fact that the testator said that his brother and sister-in-law caused the death of his only child. The evidence explained what the testator meant. The child was being fed from the milk of a cow belonging to the testator's brother. It is not denied that the owner of the cow took it away from the testator's home without his consent, thereby making it necessary to feed the child upon the milk of another cow. It is not denied that the child sickened and died after the change in its food. Who would say that there was no evidence whatever for the charge that the taking away of the cow was the cause of the baby's death? It is a matter of common knowledge that physicians and careful mothers exercise great care in changing the food for infants, and the fact that the testator may have believed that the change from the milk of one cow to that of another was the cause of the sickness and death of his child has some reason in it. If there had been no such circumstance as the child being fed upon the milk of this particular cow and the whole matter were a figment of pure imagination, then there might be some reason for saying that it originated in a disordered brain. But such is not the proof. It makes no difference, with this view, that the testator believed that the facts in relation to the death of his child had been revealed to him by spiritual communication. There is nothing connected with this circumstance showing that the testator's belief in regard to spiritual communication was any different from the belief of Spiritualists in general. The preservation of the testator from threatened harm in connection with the blowing of the stump, the burning of the brush and his falling near a step are other occurrences which illustrate how, in the mind of the testator, he connected events in his experience with his belief in Spiritualism. His belief in Spiritualism led him to account for his preservation from harm by means of spiritual guidance, while another person no more rational than Crumbaugh, but who did not believe in Spiritpalism, would account for the same phenomena in some other way. The testator did not imagine that he was in a field and that there was a person there blowing out stumps with dynamite and that a piece of the stump was thrown in such a way that it would have struck him if he had not shifted his position, but there was, in fact, such a field, and it were stumps which were being blown out, and the testator was there when an explosion of dynamite occurred, and it is testified to by the witness that a piece would have struck the deceased if he had not shifted his position just before the explosion. Now, all that is left of the transaction, which is not susceptible of proof is the fact that the testator believed that he was led to shift his position by his guiding spirit. To hold that this is evidence of an insane delusion, when reduced to its last analysis, is to hold that a belief in Spiritualism is, in and of itself, an evidence of insanity, and that no one who believes in the articles of faith as promulgated by that organization is competent to make a valid testamentary disposition of his property. There is not in this record a scintilla of evidence of insane delusions in the testator outside of the bare fact that he believed in the general doctrine of the Spiritualist organization. This is not insanity and it is no evidence of a want of testamentary capacity.

In Whipple v. Eddy, 161 Ill. 114, this court passed on the question whether a mere belief in Spiritualism was evidence of insanity. It was there said (p. 122): "The fact that a person is affected with insanity or labors under some delusion, believes in witchcraft, clairvoyance, spiritual influences, presentiments or the occurrence of future events, dreams, mind reading, etc., will not affect the validity of his will on the ground of insanity. (Redfield on Wills, 79, note 9; Chaffee will case, 32 Wis. 557; In re Smith, 53 id. 543; Brown v. Ward, 53 Md. 423). Manifestly, a man's belief can never be made a test of sanity. When we leave the domain of knowledge and enter upon the field of belief the range is limitless, extending from the highest degree of rationality to the wildest dream of superstition, and no standard of mental soundness can be based on the belief rather than another. What to one man is a reasonable belief is to another wholly unreasonable, and while it is true that, belief in what we generally understand to be supernatural things may tend to prove insanity under certain circumstances, it is a well known fact that many of the clearest and brightest intellects have sincerely and honestly believed in Spiritualism, mind-reading, etc.

If it be said that the testator believed that Bright Eyes and the spirits of other deceased friends appeared and held communication with him, in and out of the seance room; that the testator believed in spiritual photography and that he had pictures of deceased persons made in this way; it may be replied that there is in this no departure from the usually accepted faith of the spiritualistic organization, as shown by the articles of faith testified to by Mr. Warne, whose testimony is wholly uncontradicted. It may be said that the testator believed that his son, who died in infancy, had grown to manhood in the spirit land, and that there is no evidence that spiritualists believe in progression or growth after death. This point is not available to contestants, since proponents asked Dr. Warne to state the belief of his association on this point, and the contestants objected and the objection was sustained. Contestants will not be permitted to profit by the absence of evidence which was excluded on their objection.

The expert witnesses who were examined for contestants expressed the the opinion that the testator was insane in answer to the following hypothetical question: "Assuming, Doctor, that James T. Crumbaugh, at the time he signed the supposed will in question, wes seventy years of age; that for the greater part of his life he had been a farmer and very active but for the last fifteen years or more had lived in the village of LeRoy; that he was, and for a number of years had been afflicted with varicose veins, which caused his right leg to become black from his knee to the foot; that he was, and for a number of years had been troubled with heart disease, of which he died a few years later; that about three years before the drawing of the will he became a Spiritualist; that previous to that time he expressed himself as being very much opposed to Spiritualism; that after he became a Spiritualist his social life changed;; that he cared chiefly for the society of Spiritualists; that when talking upon the question of Spiritualism he sometimes became excited and would often break down and cry; that he thought he heard the voices of the dead in the seance room and out of it; that he thought he saw the forms of the dead; that they stood before him and patted him on the cheek; that he thought he had a spirit guide who directed him in his affairs and who came to his bed each night and told him good night; that these conditions existed both before and after the signing of the supposed will; what would you say as to whether or not, at the time of executing the supposed will, he was sane or insane on the subject of Spiritualism?"

It will be noted that the foregoing question embraces nothing in the physical condition of the testator that could have any tendency to affect his mental faculties. While varicose veins and heart disease are included in the question, still these ailments had nothing whatever to do with the man's mind. If Crumbaugh was suffering from physical ailments which had a tendency to produce mental aberration, then such results would be as liable to appear at one time as another and in connection with one transaction or line of thought as another, and, as we have already shown, the testator was in full possession of all his mental vigor before as well as during the three years intervening after the will was made and before his death. It cannot be said with any show of reason that the varicose veins of his right leg, causing it to become black from the knee to the foot, or the further fact that he was troubled with heart disease, had the remotest effect upon the testator's testamentary capacity at the time when the will was executed, or at any other time, either before or after the execution. Equally unimportant and irrelevant are the supposed facts that until three years before the making of the will testator had been opposed to Spiritualism and that afterwards he cared chiefly for the society of Spiritualists. With these trifling and unimportant facts eliminated frim the hypothetical question, there is nothing left in it that is not embraced within the articles of faith which are believed by Spiritualists generally, so that, in effect, contestant's experts testify merely that in their opinion one who believes in the doctrines of the Spiritualist organization is, for that reason alone, insane on the subject. In fact, several of the physicians who testified for contestants frankly admitted that anyone who believed in Spiritualism was insane on that subject.

For instance, Dr. Hart says: "I would say, that regardless of his phys-

TWO IN ONE

A COMBINATION OF

"The Question Settled" and "The Contrast" Into one Volume.

BY MOSES HULL.

This highly instructive and interesting work is a combination into one volume of two of Mr. Hull's splendid works. By this arrangement the cost is such that the reader is enabled to secure the two books combined at the same price as was formerly asked for them separately. This volume contains 462 pages and is handsomely bound in cloth, and contains an excellent portrait of the author.

THE QUESTION SETTLED

is a careful comparison of Biblical and Modern Spiritualism. No book of the century has made so many converts to Modern Spiritualism as this. The author's aim, faithfully to compare the Bible with modern phenomena and philosophy, has been accomplished. The adaptation of Spiritualism to the wants of humanity; its moral tendency; the Bible Doctrine of angel ministry; the spiritual nature of man, and the objections offered to Spiritualism, are all considered in the light of the Bible, nature, history, reason and common sense, and expressed clearly and forcibly.

THE CONTRAST

consists of a critical comparison of Evangelicalism and Spiritualism. It is a most able production, and is a perfect storehouse of facts for those who wish to defend Spiritualism, or find arguments against the assumptions of Orthodoxy.

CREDIT TO WHOM CREDIT IS DUE.

The officers of the Illinois State Spiritualists' Association have never sought to arrest public attention by boasting of what they were going to do, nor sounded bugle blasts to gain notoriety over what they have done.

In spite of all abuse bestowed upon them by the ignorant and malicious, they have moved quietly along with an alertness and wisdom which has made that organization a power for the recognition of Spiritualism in its own State.

The recent decision of the Illinois Supreme Court sustaining J. T. Crumbaugh's Will, is another illustration of efficient service done our cause. When the contestants began the struggle to invalidate that document the attorneys for its defense sent a special message from Springfield to Chicago to ask the active aid of President Warne of the State Association. That gentleman promptly responded by presence, counsel and testimony before the trial court. The appreciation felt for his co-operation in the contest is thus voiced by Owen & Owen, attorneys of record for the Will.

It is interesting in this connection to also note that after the lower court had, by jury, under the very narrow rulings of Judge Myers, decided against sustaining the Will, Mr. C. W. Stewart, of St. Louis, managing member of the Folsom-Stewart family, forwarded both President Barrett of the N. S. A., and Dr. Warne, of the Ill. S. S. A., sneeringly sarcastic "congratulations over the victory won at Bloomington," voicing thereby his glee over the temporary defeat which the court of final resort has now turned into an overwhelming victory for Spiritualism. Stewart's monumental, vile and malicious vindictiveness with which he pursues all who differ from his own conclusions thus receives another puncture, and the general estimate of his reliability will suffer thereby among all fair-minded Spiritualists. He, with all of his self-appreciated astuteness, will find it difficult to make satisfactory progress against the two adverse decisions of Judge Taylor of St. Louis and the Will decision of the Illinois Supreme Court.

Our readers will not forget that Judge Taylor's action was based very largely upon his estimation of the same exhibits which previously influenced the N. S. A. Committee, its official board, and lastly the Minneapolis Convention. Indeed, his old partisan, Bro. E. W. Bond, of Willoughby, Ohio, is credited with having said that he would have done just as the committee did with the same evidence before him.

In connection herewith we append a letter from the attorneys in the case, manifesting their high appreciation of Dr. Warne for his great assistance in the case.

LeRoy, Ill., June 26, 1907.

Dr. Geo. B. Warne, Chicago, Ill.:

Dear Sir and Friend:—It affords us, and especially the writer, no little pleasure to inform you, of what I apprehend you already know, that of our remarkable victory in the Supreme Court in the celebrated J. T. Crumbaugh case. In the hour of our triumph we are not unmindful of those who stood so nobly by us during the hour of battle, and especially when the smoke was the most dense and the hour the darkest; at that time we remember your presence, your counsel, your assistance and your work in our behalf, and although we had never had the pleasure of seeing and knowing you, yet ties were formed then, and you became such a friend during that atttack, as will ever justify us in believing you are made of that metal which surely entitles you to the reward and gift of better things, even that which this cold world and friends cannot give to you.

We enclose herewith a carbon copy of the opinion. We hope you will read and file as a monument of one of your great works. Should you meet Mrs. Gladys Cooley, give her my kindest regards. If I knew her address I should write her of our victory. Respectfully,

OWEN & OWEN.

The Light of Truth Dead!

Its Editor, Willard J. Hull, Leaves the Ranks of Spiritualism—Writes Like One Controlled by a Jesuitical Spirit—Extracts from His Writings Indicate that Something Is Sadly Out of Order with him—Another Hideous Chapter in the History of King Solomon's Mining Scheme.

LIGHT OF TRUTH BOWS TO THE INEVITABLE.

Finis.

With this issue the Light of Truth closes its fortieth volume and goes out of existence, and I as its manager, take my departure for broader fields of endeavor. This is in a figurative sense, for in reality there can be no broader field than that which this paper has occupied in its editorial management, and the work performed. What I mean then by moving to broader fields of endeavor and usefulness, is to close my identity and connection with Spiritualism as popularly understood. In this way I write myself out of a movement that has absorbed my interest and attention for the past 37 years.

A profound respect for the feelings of my friends among the Spiritualists compels me to give a reason for the course I am about to pursue. A few clear-eyed and pure-hearted souls whose friendship and loyalty I prize most highly, and who in their associations with me have learned to know the motives which have always prompted me, are deserving of the reason that impels me to a separation of this kind. As for the mass that "dwells on the Ground of Misunderstanding that stretches away from the Temples of Learning," I cannot hope to receive anything but chidings and rebuffs.

For the benefit then of those who know and love me, and as a further testimony to them that I am sure of my position, and also with the sincere hope that they too will adjust their course in compliance with the power that impels me to adjust mine, I will proceed with the reasons moving me away from this murky mixture of psychical and physical forces and substances known as Spiritualism.

Let it be premised that if a belief in the Fatherhood of God and the Brotherhood of Man, the communion and fellowship of the high spiritual realms, constitutes a Spiritualist, then I may of right be classed as one and I have no desire to remove myself from that belief. Into the nature of man and his relations with the spiritual nature of the invisible world I took my place, as befitted my understanding, at an early age. The first book or writing of any kind that I ever read on the subject of Spiritualism was Robert Dale Owen's "Debatable Land," which was placed in my hands by a sainted sister thirty-seven years ago, when I was a lad of 16. The book produced a great impression on me and I saw in it some confirmation of ideas already forming in my own mind. Subsequently I read Mr. Owen's "Footfalls on the Boundaries of Another World," and I was further led into the study of these matters.

My parents being taken away from me at this time, I was thrown on the world to struggle for what the Master says is the prime motive force of life, Subsistence, and my mind was consequently drawn away from spiritual things. Other disasters somewhat later in youth led my mind to renewed consideration of spiritual things, and I had providential access to Andrew Jackson Davis' "Nature's Divine Revelations, and a Voice to Mankind." This great work and subsequent volumes of the great seer's literary productions under the title of "The Great Harmonia," most of which I read and studied, brought to me at the age of 25 a full and complete settlement of all doubt regarding the divine nature and providence of man in the order of eternal progress and development.

I began even then to see where Spiritualism as a cult or sect might fail, and my studies persuaded me to emphasize in my own mind the distinguishing features of it, which with proper allegiance on the part of those who professed belief in it might sustain it and carry it through the waters of discomfiture in which it was even then making its way.

I am assured now that my perception of the possible failure of Spiritualism as a movement conducted on promiscuous lines of communication between finite spirits in and out of the flesh, was correct. I have always looked disparagingly on the uses of mediumship that place it in the category of other commodities of exchange and barter. We see the effects of this estimate of mediumship everywhere in the degrading prostitution to which it is now subjected, and the precarious situation of those mediums who have sought to keep their mediumship unsullied by the contaminations of barter.

During my career as a public character identified with Spiritualism, I have made it a rule to magnify the essential principles of the spiritual philosophy, and so far as the average mind might be able to grasp and make use of it in life, I have advocated an intelligent and discriminative recourse to phenomena. Unquestionably many thousands of persons have become interested in the ordinary thought, nomenclature, etc., of Spiritualism through these phenomena, but I am prepared to affirm that not more than one in a hundred of them has used these phenomena as stepping-stones leading them toward the summit of the spiritual pyramid.

I became connected officially with the Spiritualist Press, so-called, in 1895, when I took a position with the Light of Truth in Cincinnati, and began my associations with Mr. James B. Townsend, who at that time, and continuing since to the present was and is keeping this publication going. I saw then in the sacrifices and inconveniences to which he was put a field for my best efforts. As I grew to know the man and the impulse that actuated him, I learned of his overmastering and simple desire to benefit his fellowmen by giving them something of the light he had received through mediumship. We have been associated since then in calm and in strife with never a frown nor a harsh word in the work of maintaining the Light of Truth in the field of Spiritualistic enterprises.

As a broad statement of fact, these people calling themselves Spiritualists are not interested in aims and objects as the Light of Truth has been dealing with during the past twelvemonth. Never during my career have I been so impressed with the futility and uncertainty of mediumship when employed in the development of personal interests, having their rise in business and commercial affairs, as I have been during the past five or six years, and the conclusions I have arrived at I hope will be of service to those who pin their faith on the integrity of Spiritualism to the shilly-shally maunderings and mutterings of finite spirits. Of this I am assured, Spiritualism cannot thrive and ought not to thrive on the topics that interest the average Spiritualist and the methods of propaganda instituted to represent and carry it on. As for myself, I am clearly and forever done with it as a sect and propaganda thus instituted and sought to be maintained at the expense of a debauched and prostituted mediumship.

However, I repudiate nothing, and I leave these waters without animosities and without regret. I am admonished that it is not for me to judge. I am told however to take my ship under a new name but without new navigators, new charts, or new compasses, and cruise on higher seas. Let him who tells me this speak again at this juncture in the words he used in his marvelous editorial of 14th July, a year ago, wherein he addressed himself to Spiritualists—

"I have said that you will be the prey of malevolent elements in your own natures. As a closing thought I bring this fact specifically to those who have assumed the name ascribed to the phase of our relationship to mortals, the Spiritualists. You are subject to the impediments of the physical plane, but the larger grace is yours because you have caught reflections of our stewardship through the gates ajar. You have partially solved the problem of Death. Your loved and lost have been returned to you through these beautiful gates. You have had the solace of assuaged grief. You have discovered much. And you have by diligence and ability met and overcome great opposition. But the essence of your inspiration, as a whole, has come from the war-spirit of the Invisible Realms. True, you have had the benefit of counsel from the wise and the beneficent of those spheres. But you have lacked concord and co-ordinate purpose and action. You have taken unto yourselves the slogan of independent thinking. You have prided yourself in the privilege of 'thinking for yourselves' as you term it. You, too, have sought the infallible, and many of you think you have found it in the counsels and commands of finite spirits. In this you have in no wise broken away from methods as ancient as the Sphinx. You have become broken up in your thought and in lines of your procedure, in consequence of these methods. You are at war with one another. You speak unkindly to one another. You are reduced to a position where you are subject to the judgment of the competent. You are no longer criticized. You are judged. Therefore what have you gained? And what do you possess of liberty and wisdom more in abundance than ten thousand other like sects?

"You, then, like all the world, have as yet unclosed your eyes to the pearl of great price. You have missed the infection of our play upon the world's forces. And your spirit inspirers and counselors have missed it. It is blindness superlative for you to assume to be in touch with the Rulers of your world when you are at enmity with one another, and abuse and falsely judge one another—especially marked in this, that you do these things in the name of Holy Gospel. And you must go the way of all others now counted among the hosts that form the deadening forces that stand between us and the object of our pursuit, the immortal soul. Your work will be abortive until you go back and take up the Covenant and enter upon the solution of those issues fraught with the destiny of the world and livid with the flame of our desire to compass. If you would be near us, study these things. Take them into the silence of your inner counsel and weigh them well."

In order that the readers of the Light of Truth could not consider me presumptuous in conclusions I might reach and publish, I set about obtaining the views of leading Spiritualists, and early last spring opened communication with them by correspondence, touching their attitude and what they saw for Spiritualism as an outlook. Replies were forthcoming and my readers know what they were because they have been printed, and in the main add confirmation to my own views. Dozens of these letters I sent out have been unanswered, showing that the recipients of them have no interest in their cause, notwithstanding I put them on the defensive provided they had any defense, all of which I take to mean so much more to the grave shroud of militant spiritism. Some of the parties to whom I addressed these letters replied privately and gave their reasons why their names should not be used in connection with the publication of their letters. From some of these I took extracts. Others manifested such a weak vertabrae in their replies to me, hedging about from one thing to another in non-committal. "Please don't quote me," style that I threw their letters into the waste basket. Enough has been published, however, to give the intelligent reader an idea of Spiritualism as propagated and what the leading thinkers think of it.

The disclosures made during the past year or more by high and wise intelligences in the unseen have made a deep impression on my mind, and I have reason to believe they have stirred the minds of many of my readers. In these disclosures the high aims and some of the plans of the ruling spheres of spirit life have been set forth. They have come as many of them came half a century ago at a grave crisis in the affairs of the world. They have intimated what what I believe and what many other disinterested people believe should be the attitude of Spiritualists toward the creative and providential features of spiritual philosophy. Events transpiring almost daily confirm these disclosures, and it seems to me that Spiritualists (presuming themselves to be a working hypothesis in the world's affairs) should make some pretense of alligning themselves therewith to the extent of discussing them, provided of course they have any interest in Spiritualism further than the helter-shelter, scrambling and wasteful appetite for "tests," the "Lord's prayer," and the "Sweet Bye and Bye."

But aside from a comparatively few letters and some terse and comprehensive comments on them by several Spiritualist writers, these disclosures have had no response in the propaganda of Spiritualism, and not one Spiritist publication in the English language to my knowledge has made any reference to them whatever. One English publication, I believe, has made excerpts from one or two of the communications.

I speak of these things not in a spirit of animadversion or fault-finding, but to show what I really believe to be the indifferent and wholly selfish and self-satisfied condition of these Spiritists, who make such a hue and cry about proclaiming the wonderful things Spiritualism is doing for the world.

So far as my own work in the future, and that what I conceive to be the work of the great Masters and Stewards of almighty Providence, is concerned, the continual iteration and re-iteration of the proofs that man survives death will be regarded as a solecism. There is no longer any need of dilating on the fact that the souls of men, women and children can communicate with mortals—that is, in connection with the aims and objects now in view. Science and philosophy everywhere recognize nowadays the indestructibility of life. Indeed many scientific investigators have outstripped the Spiritualists in their discoveries and researches in cosmic properties.

The problems confronting the spiritual scientists is the application of these proofs to the persistence and insistence of life to the advancement and happiness of humanity. On these lines I shall continue to hold my course, letting go of nothing that is secure in Spiritualism any more than I let go of anything that is secure in any other ism; and I shall refer to Spiritualism just as I shall refer to any other ism that has anything in it supporting the principles of the philosophy of life and the place of man in that philosophy.

In his communication to the publisher under date of June 1st the being who calls himself "One of the Masters" suggested what had better be done, and with the full concurrence of my associates I hereby say that it shall be done, and the great work hitherto sent forth under the name of the Light of Truth will be continued under more auspicious and less irritating conditions. I have felt myself cramped and confined, as many of my readers have felt, and why these supernal and masterful Intelligences should ally themselves with Spiritism has been a puzzle. I can answer it only by reference to the general trend of thought and the hope implied if not expressed that the Spiritualists would act as a consecrated body or phalanx and help these exalted spirits to extend their work in an ignorant and besotted world. As the Master put it, they knew a year ago what we know now and doubtless it was necessary that we have the lesson. At any rate I am willing to learn. That I have made mistakes I freely grant. In my judgment it is a very poor sort of man who goes through life bragging that he makes no mistakes—and there is a crown of failure. If anyone desires to write my epitaph, let him say above all other things, "He still lives."

WILLARD J. HULL.

Willard J. Hull and His Attitude Towards Spiritualism and Mediumship.

(We reproduce in the following several excerpts from Mr. Hull's editorials during the last two years, illustrating the spirit that actuates the man, and his bitter opposition to Spiritualism. Though they have often appeared in the columns of The Progressive Thinker, we publish them again for the benefit of hundreds of new subscribers.)

The above editorial from the Light of Truth of June 29 indicates that Willard J. Hull has left the ranks of Spiritualism, and that the Light of Truth is at last DEAD—DEAD because it catered solely to the fraudulent element, and was continually sending forth vituperative, slanderous remarks against our cause—remarks that ought to have killed the paper long ago. Just think of it, the proprietor has sunk $50,000 in his vain efforts to keep the paper afloat.

Every fraudulent medium who has been exposed in the columns of The Progressive Thinker has received the UNQUALIFIED ENDORSEMENT of the Light of Truth, until at last the paper became an actual stench in the estimation of honest Spiritualists, and at last not a single one of our prominent speakers and mediums would allow their names to be mentioned in its columns.

The Progressive Thinker is not only in REVOLT against Legerdemain Spiritualism, but it is in OPEN REVOLT against this answer to an important question by the Light of Truth. The question submitted to it, and the answer by Willard J. Hull, are as follows:

Question:—"What is the end and aim of mediumship as carried on at present?"

Answer:—"Its aim is Dollars, and its end is Death. Mediums who are really carrying the messages of the higher realms of spirit life to man the mortal can be counted on THE FINGERS OF A SINGLE HAND."

"Only four mediums on earth to-day really carrying the messages of the higher realms of spirit life to man!" ONLY four mediums! What do you think of that pernicious statement?

What think you, honest mediums, your aim is the almighty "Dollar," and your end is "Death"—a disgraceful one, of course. We are in OPEN REVOLT against this statement—that slander hurled against hundreds of honest mediums who are as pure as the angels of light.

So FLAGRANT HAS BEEN ITS ABUSE of our rank and file, and so ardent has it been in its defense of fraudulent mediums, that one is inclined to think that Mr. Hull is obsessed by some crazy spirit.

Another Rank Insult to Spiritualists by Willard J. Hull.

"The Light of Truth is testing the Spiritualists of North America specifically, and the Spiritualists of the world generally.

"This test will go on until the fibre of the goods is thoroughly known and understood.

"For the MOST PART THE STUFF SO FAR TESTED IS EXCEEDINGLY SHODDY. Some of the PACKAGES TIED WITH FANCY STRING AND BABY RIBBON offered for inspection WILL NOT BEAR IT AT ALL.

"A FEW SMALL PACKAGES tied with the ordinary binding cord contain big values. They are the kohinoors among the diamond fields of things Spiritualistic. On them the Light of Truth depends for courage to continue the test."

The above testing of Spiritualists by Editor Hull, for RANK IMBECILITY excels anything we have ever seen in print during the last quarter of a century. Just think of it! Among all the Spiritualists of the United States "There are only a FEW SMALL PACKAGES, tied with only ordinary binding cord, that contain big value."

Spiritualists have been tested by The Progressive Thinker, and as a class they ARE THE MOST INTELLIGENT, THE MOST MORAL, AND THE BEST ADAPTED OF ALL OUR POPULATION TO ADVANCE THE WORLD TO A HIGHER PLANE. Instead of there being only a "FEW SMALL PACKAGES of big value," there are thousands of them, and the above statement is a rank insult to every Spiritualist and medium in the land.

Still Another Rank Insult.

The Light of Truth Says:

"LET IT BE REMEMBERED THAT SPIRITUALISTS AS THEY GO, DO NOT SUPPORT MEDIUMS. IF MEDIUMS HAD TO DEPEND UPON THE TENDER MERCIES OF THE AVERAGE SPIRITIST AND TEST-HUNTER, THEY WOULD STARVE TO DEATH. MEDIUMS ARE SUPPORTED AND PATRONIZED LARGELY BY CHRISTIAN AND INFIDEL ALIKE, OUTSIDE THE RANKS OF THE WARRING, SNIVELING FACTIONS THAT NOW MAKE UP THE RANK AND FILE OF WHAT IS LEFT OF SPIRITUALISM."

There are no qualifications in the above. The charge that our ranks are composed of "Warring, SNIVELING Factions," stands forth prominently. According to the Century Dictionary, "Snivel" means as follows:

"Mucus running from the nose; SNOT. Figuratively, in contempt, weak, forced or pretended weeping; hypocritical expressions of sorrow or repentance in a nasal tone; hypocrisy, cant."

The above definition is comprehensive, and you can select any part of it you desire to, to apply to the declaration made in the above. However, we desire to say that it is utterly false, the statement that our ranks are composed of warring, sniveling factions. Of course there is a difference of opinion (a healthy condition) among Spiritualists, but they are working harmoniously in their efforts to impart to all a knowledge of spirit return, and that is the main factor in what is designated as Spiritualism or Spiritism.

Here is another statement that will receive the hearty endorsement of every fraud in the land:

"In view of the dastardly tricks of fraud-hunters and grabbers, resulting in killing some of the mediums, and injuring others for life, it is in order for physical mediums to absolutely refuse admittance to their seances to any stranger not properly endorsed and recommended by some well-tried friend or friends of the medium. In ths way only can these ignorant and brutish grabbers be kept out of the seance room."—Editorial in Light of Truth, January 27, 1906.

That paper must have been a monstrosity to make the above declaration. There has NEVER BEEN, in the whole history of Spiritualism, a medium killed by being "grabbed"—NOT ONE—nor has there been one grabbed who was in any wise seriously injured.

Was Charley Winans seriously injured when his half-bushel of toggery was taken from him at Hot Springs, Ark.? No!

Was Mrs. Griffin injured in any wise when she was caught posing as a spirit, dressed as an Indian chieftain, in Milwaukee? No!

Elsie Reynolds, when grabbed, dressed in a wig and other paraphernalia, with spectacles on, posing as the spirit of old "Aunt Betsey"—she was not hurt even a little bit.

Was Mrs. French injured when grabbed in Boston, as a spirit, dressed in illuminated apparel? No.

Was Mrs. Bliss-Green injured when grabbed in this city, with a wig on and other paraphernalia, posing as a spirit? Indeed not!

Was Maybee, when grabbed in Michigan, posing as a spirit dressed in artificial toggery, hurt in the least? No! a thousand times NO.

Was one of the Nichols sisters, who was lately grabbed in this city, decked in "spirit" paraphernalia, posing as a spirit, injured? Not in the least.

We might go on indefinitely almost, enumerating those who have been grabbed, did space permit, and the only thing hurt about them was their —FEELINGS!

But the crowning piece of folly on the part of Mr. Hull is his assertion in the DEATH-WAIL AGONY of the Light of Truth as follows:

"Of this I am assured, Spiritualism cannot thrive, and ought not to thrive, on the topics that interest the average Spiritualist, and the methods of propaganda thus instituted and sought TO BE MAINTAINED AT THE EXPENSE OF A DEBAUCHED AND PROSTITUTED MEDIUMSHIP."

The above is the last dirty, contemptible fling of Editor Hull at Spiritualism and mediumship, two potent agents which have done so much to advance the world to a higher plane. Alas! he ought to hide his face in shame!

From the start the Light of Truth has exploited a mining scheme, known as "King Solomon's Mine," named after one of the worst characters of Biblical times, and exploited by Mrs. Stowell, formerly a medium residing in Cincinnati, and whose name was prominently mentioned in connection with an exceptionally unpleasant affair in Pennsylvania, an account of which was published in full at the time in the columns of The Progressive Thinker. This new chapter in connection with the King Solomon's Mine is taken from the June Number of Profit and Loss, a magazine published at Denver, Col., and which is regarded as authority by all engaged in honest mining work. It is as follows:

"King Solomon's Mining Company."

"It appears that this corporation began business some twenty years ago and has its stockholders principally among Spiritualists. It is said to be a promotion of James B. Townsend, publisher of "The Light of Truth," formerly of Lima, Ohio, but now of 703 Plymouth Building, Chicago. The capitalization is $3,000,000, and it is generally understood about $5,000,000 in stock has been sold, sometimes at 50 cents a share, and at other times at 25 cents with a promise that the higher price would be soon re-established. The officers at last accounts were: President, James B. Townsend; vice-president, W. L. Hardin; secretary, W. P. Christie; treasurer, E. F. King; general manager, D. H. Nellis. Three requests to President Townsend that he make a report of the operations and finances of the company has not met with the courtesy of a reply. One of our subscribers at whose request we invited the company to make a statement, writes that he has been unable to get any information direct from the company's office in Chicago. The subscriber sends in a piece of literature issued by "The Light of Truth" calling upon subscribers and readers to join in a "Conference Corner" at a certain hour each week, at which time the thoughts of all were to be brought into communion for mutual benefit. A paragraph of this circular reads: 'To make a beginning, we suggest that all our readers for a few weeks center their mind upon Mr. James B. Townsend, proprietor of The Light of Truth, and president of the Altruistic Trust known as King Solomon's Mines company. As an aid to this mental soul effort we enclose you his picture. Mr. Townsend and his associates are now engaged in a great undertaking and no doubt would be pleased to receive your kind thoughts for their success. In our hearts we know they are succeeding, yet we would be pleased to know that each of our readers send them this helpful thought force.' In June, 1904, President Townsend sent 'To the friends of King Solomon's Mines Company' the following statement: 'I again write a general letter, giving our friends the condition of our enterprise. Owing to the financial condition of the country it has been impossible to sell the company's treasury stock. Under these circumstances, and in the light of the fact that I alone must furnish the money required during the current year, we feel we are doing our part if we succeed in holding our property together and successfully complying with the exactions of British Columbia province. I make frequent trips to our properties during each year, so as to consult with those in charge. The lack of trails, roads and funds interferes seriously with pushing the work. With the presidential election over and the country back to a normal state we will surmount these difficulties. I can truthfully say I have not abated my faith in the successful outcome of our project.' In May, 1904, the secretary in a communication declining to make a full statement of the operations and finances of the company, stated that the company had not made any active effort to sell its stock during the last two years, but had been developng its property, and that it was about ready to begin shipments of ore. He considered the property to be in good merchantable condition and that the company's affairs were in first-class order. As an offset to the above statement that the company was not actively selling stock we quote from the letter of our inquiring subscriber as follows: 'We want to know why it is that the King Solomon's Mining company do not answer two letters asking them for some information as to the workings of their mining concern in which we have 1,000 shares all paid up in solid cash, October 27th, 1902. The letters were dated February 8th, 1906, to the Light of Truth Publishing Co., and on January 16th, 1907, to Mr. Townsend himself, the president of the mining company.' The property of the King Solomon's Mines company is said to be located in Woodbury Creek mining district, British Columbia, and in the Weaver mining district, Yavapai county, Arizona. We have failed to observe any mention in newspapers and mining journals of these sections about its operations. A remarkable feature about the King Solomon's Mines Co. is the admission of its promoters that its affairs are directed by spirits. A personal letter from President James B. Townsennd to an inmate of the Los Angeles Soldiers' Home admits that 'It is not 19 years since the initial steps were taken and the first open work was inaugurated by their (the spirits) direction.' One of the company's chief promoters also confirms this unusual method of running a mining company by consultation with spirits. 'It is true,' Mr. Hull said, 'that the affairs of this company are aided by messages from the spirit land. The design is to get up before the world an altruistic object lesson, and King Solomon's Mines belong to a group of enterprises which are a creation of the invisibles, with the intent of demonstrating how spirits and mortals may co-operate in harmonious action. The plans for the working of the mine and the site of the mine itself were revealed through spirit messages. We keep a medium at the mines all the time and work as directed through messages received by him.' This statement of Mr. Hull was made and published in London, where he went, it is presumed, to interest capital in the enterprise"

"May 15, 1907."

The above is no doubt a correct statement in reference to "King Solomon's Mines," and it is enough to MAKE ONE'S BLOOD RUN COLD TO READ IT. Hundreds of Spiritualists have been ruined by investing in this mining scheme as exploited by Mr. Townsend, proprietor of Light of Truth, aided by Willard J. Hull, the editor, and Mrs. Stowell the medium. Expecting big returns from the investment in the mining stocks, homes have been mortgaged, and many have been impoverished thereby. They cannot get even a letter of inquiry answered, but are treated with SILENT CONTEMPT by the coterie who have handled their hard-earned money. It is enough to make angels weep to think of the hardship brought upon them. "Thank the Lord" that Willard J. Hull has left the ranks of Spiritualism, as his voice and pen has thrown a black cloud over it that will require some time to remove.

LETTER FROM DETROIT, MICH.

Testimonial of High Esteem Presented to Rev. Mary A. Stein.

To the Editor:—The Spiritual Earnest Workers of Detroit concluded their regular Sunday evening services on June 23. The hall was crowded, and the lecture by the guide of our pastor, Rev. Mary A. Stein, was of the usual high order. The messages through Mrs. Dr. Fish, Mrs. Line, Mrs. Hurni, and the Pastor, were well received and recognized. Our president and pastor, who is about to journey to the Pacific coast for a few months' vacation and to fill engagements at the camps, was tendered a reception by the members of the society at their hall, 333 Mich. Ave., on the evening of June 27, which was a real love feast to all present, felicitations being interchanged between the pastor and the friends, followed by a bountiful repast, interspersed by scintillations of wit and humor, and a fine musical program. Mrs. Dr. Fish, our worthy vice-president, in a few fitting remarks in behalf of the society, presented the pastor, as a token of love and esteem, a beautiful brooch, set in garnets in the form of a heart, cross and anchor, emblematical of Faith, Hope and Charity—qualities possessed in no small degree by our esteemed pastor, to whom so much credit is due for her unflinching devotion to the society and to the cause of Spiritualism in its purity.

Upon the presentation of the brooch the following poem, composed for the occasion by a member of the society, was presented to the pastor:—

We've gathered here to honor one
Who's been to us a friend,
Who's been a credit to our cause,
And loyal to the end.

Three years she's been our guiding star
To illuminate the way,
And guide our steps through paths of peace
And joy the livelong day.

The task was hard, but you've been true,
You've worked with might and main,
And oft when few were near to help,
You've gone through storm and rain.

And now united here we stand,
To bless the day you came,
And join the angels from above,
Your virtues to proclaim.

This little token of our love,
We offer, sister dear,
And with it goes our earnest wish,
That joy be yours this year.

And in our parting prayer we ask,
That angels may attend,
And scatter roses in your path,
And ever be your friend.

A WONDERFUL TEST.

A Spirit Voice Saves a Person From a Dangerous Surgical Operation.

Until May 25, 1904, I knew absolutely nothing of Spiritualism. My health had been very bad for some time, and I and my family realized that nothing could save my life unless it be an operation, and I had decided to submit to it as a last resort. This was about May 15, 1904. After so deciding, my daughter, Mrs. Clara Binder, and I went to bed in one room, and in a short time a voice was heard by my daughter, saying, "Tell your dear mother not to think of undergoing an operation, as it would probably mean death. Then the voice described my ailment, and also told of a medicine I should get and take, and no operation would be needed.

My daughter could not get the full name of the medicine, but a bottle with the medicine in was shown to her. The next morning I found out entirely by accident what the medicine was, got it, and took it for three days, suffering terribly all the time. The third night we went to bed, and in a few minutes the voice was heard again, and said, "I am your grandmother. Tell your dear mother I have my arms about her neck now, and tell her this hour she will get better," and I did get better at once. I suffered no more and commenced to gain in strength right away. Then I said to my daughter: "You have a wonderful gift, and from this time on I will leave no stone unturned until I find out what it is."

On the 25th of May an acquaintance called, and spoke of going to a Spiritualist meeting, and was wonderfully impressed with the presence of my sainted mother near me. I got no test, but learned of a trumpet circle to be held the next evening, and at this, my first circle, I got a message of love from my father.

My suffering was caused by kidney disease, and I will gladly give full information to anyone who wishes to know more, and who will enclose a stamp for reply.

This is only a beginning of my experience. I have learned so much, and been blessed in so many ways by the knowledge of spirit return, that nothing in this world could change my mind, even if I stood entirely alone in the belief.

The Illumined Life

As Vividly Portrayed in an Inspired Lecture Delivered in Schmidt's Hall, Washington, D. C., by Alfred H. Terry.

When we descend on to this planet, we come from a world of spirit. Our environments here depend on our stage of progress. We all come from different stages of unfoldment of the past. We are like miners, who go out into the West from different parts of the world, when the gold craze takes them. They mine, they go down deep into the earth to get the precious metal, and thus enrich themselves, and ever thereafter live in comfort and luxury. So we descend into this great mine of earth to work out a life, and seek for its treasures of experience, and so return, taking all the precious jewels we can find, even our lives, which have become illumined, or perhaps darkened, in the struggle.

Illumined with what?

Radiant with Truth, for Truth is the eternal Light of the world, and through all ages of the past, and through all eons of the future, it will give forth its light to mankind. As through the darkness of a forest, one golden sunbeam filters down into the dry leaves on the dark ground, so in the world to-day spiritual sunbeams are here piercing through the obstacles the cloudy environment of the external world, carrying radiance, glory and light. Your life may be lonely; your skies hang heavy with clouds; the sun may not seem to shine for you, but your sun is there just the same, and you will radiate the light your spirit absorbs, through every mortal environment. You may be passing through sickness and trouble, but your mind is free as the birds that sing in the tree tops. It can soar far above the influences that rest upon your physical world. It can come en rapport with its God, and thus receive benediction, a fuller, stronger influence to lift it out of the swamps of despair, the forests of despondency, into the bright, green Valleys of Truth. Though manifesting in a material body, it is free. Freedom must come in thought before it can come in material environment. The despair that rends you is in your mind. As soon as this is discovered, human souls are like the arena at Rome—lighted only from above. If you look up, the rays of sunshine will be there, even as the stars would be visible if you were standing in a well looking toward the skies. The light of Truth is a messenger that speaks of the eternal Light beyond.

This Web of Life, spinning day by day, how often we weave on, groping in the darkness with no guiding light except a tiny voice within, which bids us ever "go on, go on, though present signs display." So we weave on and push farther; and some sit still and spin not.

And why?

Because they have entangled their own webs with that of others, and they sit discouraged and despondent, and the longer they sit there the closer they wind their web around them. The Guiding Voice has become tired. It has knocked upon the door of the heart, which has not been opened, until some guiding angel, clothed in flesh, has the power to break through that environment and let in the light. There many such messengers on this planet, who are performing their good offices alone. But a truly good deed does not need to be heralded afar. All the angels in the spirit world realize that such as these are working hand in hand with them for humanity.

Other mortals, while weaving their own web, are ever looking to see how they can help another to weave his web, which is the best of all works—to unfold all that is good within us, by ever doing good to others. He who gains recognition of Divine Truth, scatters seeds of sunshine each time he expresses it, and these seeds will germinate and grow, until they burst forth in a flower, to bless his own life as well as others.

Earth represents a vast wilderness with rocks and trees, with perhaps a Great Dismal Swamp, and all the conditions of a wilderness. We have to push through the undergrowth, cut and scratch our hands on the rocks, penetrate tangles hard to pass through and work long to get out into God's sunshine, to some clear oasis where we drink of the clear crystal water, but after we have passed through all these difficulties and leave them behind, as we look back we discover how the struggle has strengthened us. We had no idea we could climb so high and endure so much. We had no idea we could go so long without drinking of the clear water. The hard experience has shown us our power, and if we were called to pass through the wildnerness again, it would be far less difficult. Spirits, as well as mortals, often say: "I am so glad I had that lesson; the experience was a hard one, a severe test, but I found after it had passed by that I was stronger; I had a firmer foundation to stand upon." Let the Web of Life we are weaving be sweet, strong and clear. See that it is individualized, and so strong that those other webs which might come in contact with our own will seem, by comparison, too delicate and weak to hinder our progress, but only enable us to help them along the path.

Life's highway is many-sided. It has a shady side and a sunny side, and few mortals walk habitually where the sun shines, where they feel the Light of the Spirit within themselves. The rays grow stronger as we use them for good purpose. We then absorb the full benefit of all the spiritual glory within our souls. Mortal minds are apt to see only the evil and pass the good by. They criticise and pick flaws in a person in whom there is much good to speak of. Our neighbors and friends pick us to pieces, three or four times a day, or every time they happen to think of us, until it seems remarkable that we are what we are; but we all have an Infinite Power behind us, to uphold and encourage us. When we do good, and evil is thrown in our face like mud, it cannot stain us, because it does not wound the face. But like an arrow sent to the target and hitting the bull's eye, so good words of Truth sink deep into the heart of those who hear them. Then send forth good thoughts, and your life will be more beautiful, as the rain-drops from heaven descend on the rose petals and fringe them with diamonds to enhance their beauty. As they are divinely breathed forth by a divine artist to a state of perfection, so it is with good deeds, a good life; even its thoughts stand forth as sunbeams in the world of mind; and like the flowers of the spirit world, they never fade.

How strange it is that such a beautiful expression of divinity as a flower should not last longer on this plane. Strange why nature could not endow it with more enduring life. We note the bud form and slowly expand into the rose, and then in a few hours its petals are fallen, the flower gone, whereas in spirit life, after the rose is fully blown, it rolls back again into the bud, to unfold again with still greater loveliness.

Life is but a picture we are painting to-day, and when it is wiped off the canvas, it will seem like a house we once occupied, which stands forth clear-set with diamonds of great and good deeds, symbolizing jewels won, or our crown, a higher degree of perfection in our soul. One little hour is all that life is. Hold not of such great importance the day that is not bright; reflect your own spiritual light upon it. There is no darkness that light cannot penetrate; no dense materialism that the power of the soul cannot descend into, like the red light of the sun, and make it sweet, clear and pure. So as we pilgrims tread life's path, the higher influences from above bend over us and crown us with their love. To all the Cup of Life is offered. Drink deep of it, and then carry to the reservoir again; it will be filled. Then drink again in full measure and pass on through life's gateway, where conquering souls will bid you welcome into spheres above.

In all stages of life we see motion. Nature is ever climbing upward toward higher conditions. True progress is made when we add the good of yesterday to the good of to-day, until our days become a cluster of gems, to be guarded and cherished. All the good and beauty of the present time we have accumulated from past experiences. To progress is to constantly step onward, guided always by that which is highest and best. Look not to men for upliftment and strength. Look to God. Do not imitate even the progress of your neighbor. You have a pathway particularly your own. You have a strand of life to follow; do not entangle it with other threads. Do not copy the success of another. Aspire for good, and good shall reach you. Remember that you and you alone are responsible for your progress. Concentrate upon yourself, and this does not mean selfishness. Reflect the best. Make that which you give forth to the world full of love and beauty.

Imagine a grand mountain with its lofty peak reaching far above the clouds, but around its base is a dense forest, then higher up are shrubs, green moss and grass, while here and there a pure white flower gleams out. The mountain is symbolic of life. The dense forest symbolizes the ignorance that we have to surmount, the tangled growth of vegetation where no fruit is yet brought forth; then comes the soft green grass and the flowers, as we develop our spiritual nature, and finally we reach the summit of the snow-capped mountain, and like the bird that soars from his mountain home into the ether above, so we are ready to soar to other worlds and realms. We are all now climbing that mountain; some of us are still in the forest. We all begin at the base, and we shall all reach the top; but all this struggle is for the purpose of aiding our development. It is our School of Wisdom, which teaches us to overcome all obstacles here, to realize that matter is naught, that spirit is all in all; and the progress of this life shall fit us for that grander progress which awaits us in the future life.

Therefore open the eyes of the spirit. Let not the conditions of the flesh so dull your senses that you will not understand life. Look through the eye-glasses of spirit. Ignorance will be overcome. The spirit in yourself will rise to the surface like the bubbles on the sunlit surface of a lake. We are bubbles of purity on the sea of life. We are sparks from the Infinite Anvil, and shall give forth of our radiance to the world. Always carry seeds of peace, strength and health. Sickness has to-day a clutch upon your land, but at last humanity has begun to awaken to its true life. We are not here to wade through error, to sink deep in sin, or to bow down to the ground with illness and pain. But disease will die; the result of ignorance and error will flee away from this mortal world, and life shall be as it should be. This is not an impossible ideal. The greater life lies within you. Take the key of the spirit and unlock the treasure within. Make every step one of progress, onward and upward. Progression is like a great and beautiful golden bridge, over which the race marches on to immortality. The keystone in the arch bears aloft the inscription of eternal life. Each step brings you nearer to the Great Beyond, from whence you can look back and see your acts in their full-blooded beauty. As within the diamond rests every color of the rainbow, so within ourselves lie all possibilities to become living messengers to the Divine Fatherhood of God.

The soul is the eternal part of us. What is spirit? The offspring of the soul, as the sunbeams which flood the world are the offspring of the sun. So from the soul, the primal element, the perfect being, the spiritual potency, goes forth to represent it on earth, to taste many experiences, and thus bring back to it a gratifying unfoldment. So we are souls, and we are spirits. Spirit may be likened to a sculptor who models his clay to any form he has in mind, so we are the clay which our spirit seeks to mold into a perfect image. When perfection has been reached, the clay is thrown away; it was only needed to bring out the power of the conscious mind, and then pass on from this intellectual plane into the land of souls. The spirit breaks many models and passes through many embodiments before it reaches a state of perfection. Every life is recognized for its true worth.

This remarkable power in us which is the soul, is the true entity, which always has been and always will be—an idea hard, perhaps, for mortal minds to grasp. But we never can think of ourselves as dead. We cannot imagine a time when we did not live, yet on this mortal plane our life is but a few short years. But each year or each day means so much to our spiritual unfoldment. As the earth calls from the sun its heat and light, so we call down from the soul life and radiance, and thus bring forth flowers of spiritual beauty. Look upon your soul as the sun, the creative power, on which you live. Draw it deep into your consciousness, that every corner of your mind may be illuminated with its divine light, until your voice may thrill with the music. Every time you look on the sun, see symbolized there the sun, that means your own soul. Realize the life that is immortal now, as in the eternal years that lie beyond. Drawing this life into your own consciousness, you become creators of good. We are all creators of bad many times, and of good sometimes. Every word we speak lives on and brings about some result, to blossom forth into expression of its power or truth. Therefore remember you are creators of your own life. As you draw near the soul center, that which you create will be good.

Seek, then, the Light; hold to it as you do your breath. All the error of this mortal world is but a fog, which seems very thick and heavy with the eyes of earth, but with the true gaze of the spirit, we see straight through it. There is never a fog that is not dissipated by the bright rays of sunshine, never a thunder storm that is not illumined by the lightning, and so in your life, the light of the spirit is like the lightning, which breaks into the darkest night. One flash of God's light can break the very heavens of your sorrow. Then look within your heart all the glories of the heavens above.

Blame not the conditions of earth if your life is not what you would have it. In your past life you will find the source of your present condition. Past mistakes persistently leave their blots and stains. Act so that you would not be ashamed to see your every deed burn in the heavens for all mankind to behold. When your own face is radiant with truth, behold! falsehood will fly from you; but when you are animated with false motives, falsehood, with all its power will roll in upon you and seek to work out its purpose on this plane. Willing with open arms to receive the truth, the illumination and light of true spiritual unfoldment will come, the radiant glory of your soul will shine through your eyes, the light beyond all imagination.

This is your mission. You have come here to live, to act and to do good, and if you do not thus live, you waste your years, and make the necessity that you come again. Then do something with your life. Make up your mind you will bloom, and not be a weed to choke all growth. Be an ideal of God, and then life will be godlike to you. You will become an incense lamp, one glad, grand instrument, as you should be, to give forth light to mankind.

No God can bring you to the goal you seek; no devil can prevent your reaching it. Within you and you alone lie the necessary ability and power. We so often meet the world in a mask; we sit there crouching behind it; we hide ourselves under a cloak. Drop the cloak. Be yourself. It is the only way you can develop individuality or spirituality. The ideal of a pure life here, while still in the mortal, carries more power than to conquer a kingdom. Every error in your own nature can be placed beneath your feet; therefore curse not destiny, curse not blind fate or your ill luck, but realize that you and you alone are responsible for everything that reaches your life today. You are an instrument of your own soul, and an instrument of the divine to bring about this plan. This is only one stage of many lives that are to come; our every act casts a reflection on the future, will bring a record to our souls.

You are a creator, you are a conqueror. In painting Life's picture, you bring forth its coloring from your own souls, for it must symbolize the soul in upward progress. In the gallery of your souls hang the pictures of many lives of immortal glory. But your hand must guide the brush. The background of this painting of your life is often dark, sombre and dreary, yet it is the shadow which brings forth the foreground clearly. Your life at present may be the background, which will later receive more brilliant colors and work out your design. Therefore be not discouraged. Take a firmer hold of your brush, make bolder strokes, work rapidly. Let the light of spirit illumine your countenance and lend an added power; then with a step of mastery you will advance on Life's pathway, soaring far above these environments. Then live not in the body. The force, the fire that manifests through it, is you, and you will always be. The clay is but a lump through whose windows the soul will shine. Then let its glory through the bright light of Spirit.

You did not come from God only to become a conqueror. If you are a weakling, you make yourself a weakling. God helps those who help themselves. Until you do help yourself, no God will help you. The very thought that puts grand ideals in your mind is the prophecy of their fulfillment. The angel of your soul tells you that you are a divine spark of perfection, that there is no death, that you are eternal. You are simply being trained, worked out, to be still stronger and brighter when you have arisen. We do not have to be diseased. It may come and pierce us, but we can put it out. So with all the darkness and struggles of our life that come to us almost like demons; we pass through these material depths to make us stronger. Otherwise there would be no virtue in being good—it would be so easy; but when we are scathed through temptation, or crawl year after year, to pass around some obstacle, with our very soul-strings torn, and then rise superior to this mortal plane, then we are the angel; our angelhood rightly won, even though we have gone through almost hell to reach it. Then life is radiant with the glory of the conqueror, and we pass on to conquer added worlds rolling off in space, the illuminated light of the future. There shine the gems we have gathered here; there the good thoughts we have held here illumine the glories that burst upon us. We find waiting there our dear ones, who gladly lead us forth into the light, away from pain and sorrow, and we realize that our life has been rich, has indeed been "well done."

Therefore let your mind rise from earthly things; it is a child of the spirit. This world is only a stage, and you are the player. If the part to which you are assigned, or the costume you are wearing, is not to your taste, change it. It is within your power. The light of the Great Spirit is yours. Use it. Absorb its illuminating power. As the sunbeams in the natural world unfold the leaves and bring forth the flowers in their beauty, so the eternal light of God can bring forth within you rare flowers of the spirit. Draw its wealth, its brightness, its radiance, into your souls and you will be yourself a God.

Don't Allow Your Children to Attend the Orthodox Sunday School.

Under the head of "Strictly Optimistic," in number 916, is a letter written by Mrs. Pomeroy, of California, asking of her friend Mrs. Stookey of Seattle, "What harm is coming to the children who are going to the orthodox Sunday School? Are they learning anything bad? Are their morals being corrupted in any way? Is it not better they should go there than nowhere at all?" Mrs. Pomeroy states she has two boys reared in orthodox Sunday Schools.

We are surprised that intelligent Spiritualists do not comprehend the harm which is done to their children by attending orthodox Sunday Schools.

Are children encouraged to think, to use reason, when in answer to questions they are told, "All things are possible with God"—so contradictory are the teachings! God is said to be love, all kindness, and yet deeds are attributed to God which no natural parent could do—perfectly fiendish!

Children are impressible. These early impressions are permanent. Can false impressions be erased easily? Does not the priest defy you after he has trained children to a certain age?

We understand that orthodox Sunday Schools teach a majority of ideas opposed to Spiritualism. True, they may not emphasize descriptions of hell, etc., but the teachers are very human, and do they respect your religion? We have known such persons to sneer and make light of Spiritualism to their pupils.

"Jesus paid it all," eleventh-hour repentance, etc., are antagonistic to individual responsibility, which is taught and practiced by Spiritualists.

Suppose there is no lyceum in your town, parental instruction can be given. To take the children into the country, close to the heart of Mother Nature and there impart knowledge of the simplest leaf or flower, is to provide the best of Sunday Schools.

A NEW EVANGELISM.

It is Needed, to Convert the Orthodox to True Christianity.

Orthodox Christianity is held by the religious masses to be infallible in its divine origin, but the student of ancient history and bibliography well knows that this cannot be substantiated by even a shadow of truth. The Golden Rule was promulgated by Buddha in India, by Confucius in China, by Pythagoras in Greece, Prometheus and many other redeemers, saviors and mediators, ages before the advent of the Christian era.

The beautiful story of the life, sufferings, teachings, temptations, miracles, and death of Christ, is simply a duplication of the same history of Christna, hundreds of years before Christ is said to have been on earth. This is too well known to even demand the proofs.

The orthodox religion is held up to the world as the embodiment of all that is pure, holy, peaceful, loving, long-suffering, harmonious and happy, but on the contrary, history shows us that for hundreds of years it has been the religion of bigotry, envy, strife, malice, bloodshed, and all the evil passions the human heart is susceptible of. It has cost many millions of lives; it is estimated that the Crusades alone cost over a million lives; and yet it accomplished virtually nothing.

The teachings of Christ, as handed down to us through the Scriptures, were grand and beautiful in their sweet simplicity, as were all the teachings of this nature before this time; but what a vast difference there is between his teachings and the teachings of that religion that was built up for him in his name. The sweet, loving precepts of the lowly Nazarene have nothing in common with the latter. His teachings are heavenly in their pure conceptions, and are soul-purifying and uplifting in their sweet grandeur—full of love and hope, faith and good works, not vaunted up, doing good at all times when and where possible; while the latter is debasing to the human soul that is touched with its influence, and while it has carried civilization to many nations, yet it has also carried to them the torch of destruction, torture, murder, rapine, and, in fact, all the known evils of so-called civilization.

Most of these nations were pure in their daily lives, and entirely innocent and happy but what are they to-day? After hundreds of years of orthodox teachings and civilization, as a rule, they have advanced in knowledge and retrograded in morality. No doubt they would have advanced in civilization just the same if they had never seen or heard of a missionary, but they would have been minus the evils of orthodox teaching.

Orthodoxy has been responsible for many millions of murders that have been committed in the name of Christ, not only in the wars that it has fostered and waged, but the dungeon, the stake, and hundreds of other devices of torture and death. The millions that have perished in the religious wars that have been waged in the name of Christ are but a moiety of the lives that have been sacrificed in this cause by the orders of the church.

Christ could not have done this, neither could his true followers; but it was done by the teachers of the false religion that was built up in his name, and this religion has been divided into more than one thousand different sects, all having different creeds and each claiming to be the only one that is right, and that all the others are totally wrong.

There is but one kind of light that emanates from the sun, giving life, health, strength, and well-being to the whole universe, and its powers are at all times the same, until perverted and modified by the devices of man. The teachings of Christ were the same as had been promulgated for ages before him, and were of the very highest order for the good of humanity, but they were greatly modified by Paul and the Apostles, and they have been constantly twisted and curved into this and that shape by the different fathers and ministers of orthodoxy until there is hardly a vestige of the original left.

Many of these same ministers know absolutely nothing of the Bible outside of their particular creeds—just what is taught them. They pretend to believe every word of their particular creed, but down deep in their hearts they do not; they are simply following that calling for a living; it is their trade, and they are trying to make an honest (?) living. Many of them have never been converted to Christianity, and what the church needs to-day, more than anything else, is the true conversion of the ministers that proclaim the glad tidings.

This is a hard saying, but the world at large knows that it is only too true. There is a larger per cent of ministers in the penitentiaries of this country than of any other class of professional men; this of itself speaks volumes.

Who will start a revival among the ministers of the church and convert them to true Christianity? It is a crying need that should be looked after at once, for the good of humanity.

LOVE.

Oh, the mystery, oh, the gladness
Waiting in celestial spheres!
Where no parting, pain or sadness
Floods our eyes with blinding tears.
All the joyous peace abiding, filled with sweetest charity,
All are equal, true and tender: Love sees no disparity.

Swift on wings of mercy speeding
When they hear a suffering cry,
Angels now are softly hov'ring,
though no earthly help is nigh.
Let us then, our souls uplifting, welcome give with grateful heart,
In the world's redemption aiding angels bright to bear their part.

Yes, they look to us to help them
knit the cord of Love Divine,
Which unites our Earth and Heaven with a strong magnetic line;
Up and down this Angels passing carry blessing from above,
Comfort, Peace, and Heavenly Wisdom, yet the chief of all is Love.

Love of country, home and kindred,
love of sister, husband, friend,
Mother love so true and tender, all enduring without end!
All these loves must merge in union with our source, for God is Love.
Grant us, Lord, Thy benediction!
May we less unworthy prove.

Some Things Important to Think of.

There are three things which clearly apprehended and well considered, will be of stupendous benefit to mankind. The first is clear apprehension of truth.

I. Truth is its own authority; that is the conception of truth is its revelation. There is nothing real but truth, and nothing but truth can save humanity. The unreal is nothing, and nothing can save nobody. The power is not in truth per se; it is in him who conceives and utilizes it. It depends on no man's ipsi dixit. No one can create nor destroy truth.

It is error conceived as truth, and acted upon as such that is the cause of the evils that have their rise in human agency. Knowledge is one thing; the conception of things is another thing. Reason is the only interpreter of truth; that is the recognition of the relation of cause and effect. They are the only things in existence, the one the cause of all things, the other the effects of causes. The non-recognition of this relation is the great sin of omission; and its consequences give rise to the conditions precedent that lead to the sin of commission.

2. Absolute purity of heart and life is the richest of human possessions, and the only method of its attainment is implicit obedience to the highest intuitions of the soul. (Davis). Every unfair dealing, every act of deception, every impudent word is in so far impurity of life, which will inevitably follow us with its consequences; for we must reap what we sow, and every act of disobedience of the dictates of conscience is treason to the soul, robbing us of purity, and impoverishing the soul. The sentiment of Pope, it is well to consider:

"What conscience dictates to be done,
Or warns us not to do;
This, teach me more than hell to shun—
That, more than heaven pursue."

We can do no wrong with impunity. What we pursue, thinking it to be good, if the result is not good, what was pursued was not good.

3. Bad feelings can never be changed to good feelings. They must be burned out by the fires of suffering. When better feelings dominate the life, the suffering begins and continues until in some way, the wrongs committed are made right; for in the course of human destiny, at some time and in some way, ever will justice be done. Reward, self-awarded, and punishment self-inflicted are sure to follow as destiny is sure. It is because we do not know this, that we suffer; and in so far as we know this we enjoy. Therefore these things above mentioned, clearly apprehended and well considered are of stupendous importance to mankind.

They are not apprehended and considered, which if they were inconceivable benefits would accrue to humanity. Why are they not? This is a momentous question, demanding immediate answer. There are two reasons why. Our early teachings, supported by public sentiment, are one reason why we do not know. Our lack of knowledge of human nature, and of the laws of mental action, is the other. We are not to blame for either mental condition. The first was unconsciously thrust upon us, so to speak, in the formative period of our lives—infancy, childhood, youth, and adolescence. The second had its rise in the prevailing errors we have inherited from our ancestors, which we take in as we acquire our mother tongue.

A careful review of the above will appeal to the experience of every thinking mind. What we know we must learn, and as a condition precedent we must desire to learn those things. E. J. SCHELLHOUS.

My Grandfather's Warning.

'Twas early winter, and a light snow
Had fallen covering all the earth below.
He, on his horse was riding through the place.
A man appeared to him on foot,
who did keep pace,
The man with pick and shovel on his back
Walked just ahead, the horse kept in his track.
In passing by the steps of graveyard bare,
Grandfather's horse kept on; the man
stopped there,
Ascended slowly, walking out of sight.
Remember this occurred in broad daylight.
Then he wondered, wondered more,
Why he had not heard before—
Why he had not heard the bell
As it tolled the funeral knell
Of the one that passed away
And whose grave was made that day.
Wondered, wondered, more and more
Why he had not heard before.
At that time, so long ago,
Every one in town would know
Who was dead by tolling bell—
Man and woman, and child as well.
So he thought he would ride to town
And ask who's dead, of people around.
He met some people who ought to know.
As he neared the town, and told them
so.
They did not turn their horses about,
They were so eager to find out,
But kept close to grandfather's side,
Not caring how far they had to ride;
If they only knew who filled that grave
Time nor horses they would save.
At length they came to the churchyard drear, Stopped at the gate, looked far and near
For footprints in the new-fallen snow,
But found no track, high nor low.
Dismounted, wandered o'er the ground,
No sign of grave or digger found.
They knew no mortal had entered
there,
For they had searched with greatest care.
Ere spring had come or winter fled
Grandfather Moore was with the dead.
This as a warning has been told
And wondered at till it is old.
They did not knew at that early hour,
That warnings were given by spirit power.
I lingered often by his grave,
And memorized the verse they gave—
It seemed so solemn and so sad.
These were the lines the headstone had:
"O! ye who read with little care,
And go away and leave me here,
Remember that you all must die
And be entombed as well as I."

Remarkable Invention.

AN INSTRUMENT THAT IMPROVES AND STRENGTHENS EYESIGHT.

Spectacles May Be Abandoned

This instrument, which the inventor has patented, is called "Actina"—a trade-mark word.

In the treatment of eye diseases the inventor of "Actina" claims that there is no need for cutting or drugging the eye in treating most forms of disease. Cataracts, and other abnormal growths have been removed, and weakened vision improved or restored by this new and more humane method. "Actina" has been tested in thousands of cases and has effected marvelous results, many people testifying that it saved their eyesight. So confident are the owners that this device is an instrument of great merit that they will give absolutely a free trial. They want everyone interested to make a thorough investigation and a personal test of "Actina." One will be sent on trial postpaid so that any person can give it a test.

They issue a book—a Treatise on Disease—which tells all about "Actina," the diseases it will remove, what others think of it, what marvelous results it has effected, and all about the responsibility of its owners—all will be sent absolutely free upon request. This book should be in the home of every family. Address Actina Appliance Company, Dept. 32H, 311 Walnut Street, Kansas City, Mo.

SIX HISTORIC AMERICANS.

A Book That Every American Freethinker Will Delight to Own.

By John E. Remsburg.

The work consists of two parts, "The Fathers of Our Republic," and "The Saviors of Our Republic." In regard to Paine's religious views, Mr. Remsburg establishes the negative of the following (1) Was Paine an Atheist? (2) Was he a Christian? (3) Did he recant? Page after page of the most radical freethought sentiments are culled from the correspondence and other writings of Franklin and Jefferson, which show that these men were as pronounced in the rejection of Christianity as Paine and Ingersoll. That Washington was not a Christian nor a believer in Christianity. In support of Lincoln's infidelity he has collected the testimony of more than one hundred witnesses.

The book is handsomely bound in cloth, giving fine portraits of George Washington, Benjamin Franklin, Thomas Paine, Thomas Jefferson, Abraham Lincoln and U. S. Grant; also portrait of the author.

This book contains 365 pages, printed on heavy paper, well bound in cloth. Price, $1.25. For sale at this office.

Inquiries come from the East in reference to a Prof. Geo. H. McNeill, who says that he had a hall on the South Side and held overflow meetings. If any of our readers know anything about the man, please inform us at once, and greatly oblige.

Mrs. C. M. Chown writes from Lima, Ohio; "On the 21st I received a letter from Georgia Gladys Cooley saying she was to pass through Lima, O., on her way to Chicago from Meadville, Pa., and would stop off between trains to see us. I invited a few friends in to spend the evening. Other friends got to hear of her coming and our parlors were packed. She gave us a nice talk, and a great many tests which were all recognized. We hope it will not be long until we can have her with us again, for when the people of Lima know Georgia Gladys Cooley is here for a lecture our hall is packed."

Evelyn L. Pomeroy writes from Belvidere, Cal.: "I am located for the present at this place, and have sent my papers to the State Board for endorsement, and I will be glad to respond to the call of any society in this State, asking only my traveling expenses and entertainment, and any free will offering the society may see fit to give. I make no specific charges for my work. I will also officiate at weddings or funerals."

A. F. Hill of Boston, Mass., writes: "A magazine employing the best scholarship of the age is needed, to be devoted entirely to the literary frauds of the Christian Church. It would be in great demand. Who will undertake its publication?" The Progressive Thinker, June 29, 190, page 4, column 3, "Sorrow for the Distressed." I am ready and willing to expose one or two frauds of Christians in history. I can call one of the greatest writers and expert translators of the Bible to expose the frauds of Christians."

Mrs. E. H. Thompson writes: "The Fraternal Daughters held their semi-weekly meeting at the home of Sister Rowe, 1151 Monroe st. The afternoon session was taken up with readings, and supper was served at 6 p. m. We had quite a number of new faces with us and all enjoyed a very nice supper. It being the evening before the 4th, the rooms were decorated with flags and red, white and blue bunting. It seemed that all were filled with patriotism for our grand and noble cause of Spiritualism, which we find so ably set forth every week in the columns of The Progressive Thinker, and the writer never fails to have some papers on sale at every one of our social gatherings, and never seems to have any trouble to dispose of them. Our evening session commenced at 8 p. m., with a short talk by Brother T. S. Warner, one whom we all like to hear. Then came the Black-Bird Pie Party, and the pie was there, and those whom the writer heard speak of it said that the Black Birds looked natural enough to be real. It seemed that everyone wanted 10 cents worth of that pie, which contained both prizes and readings, from any medium present. The following mediums took part: Mrs. Dr. Caird, Misters Bloom, Knapp, Adams, Warne, Minor, Lichtig, and Brothers Traver and Thompson, and Brothers Knapp and Adams had the most strenuous work of all, as it took their combined efforts to wash the dishes, which brought to a close another of those enjoyable, spiritual and uplifting meetings. Our next meeting will be held on July 17, at the home of Sister Gilmore, 217 N Central Park avenue, at 2:30 p. m. We are going to have a real Gypsy Camp, and the mediums in costumes. A hearty invitation is extended to all. Take either the Lake street or Chicago Avenue cars, to Central Park avenue. The society extends its heartiest appreciation to Sister Rowe, and all her co-workers, who helped us make our last meeting an all-around success."

Samuel Huntington writes from Malden Mass.: "On June 30, we held our last meeting of the season with Mrs. Annie M. Coggeshall, of Lowell, Mass., on the platform. She devoted the whole evening to message work, and gave many interesting evidences of the continuity of life. While we have not had a great rush to our meetings during the season, yet we feel that our growth has been a healthy one, and steady, and that our society is now strongly intrenched in this community, and we hope we will be able to have a home of our own ere many years roll away, where all interested in Malden or vicinity may come and worship in the same spirit in which the world's great medium, Jesus Christ worshiped. Mrs. B. W. Belcher of Marlboro, Mass., Speaker September 1st, and Mrs. Annie M. Coggeshall of Lowell, Mass., September 8. Circles every Thursday and 11 a. m, and 3:30 p. m., Sundays, all summer."

Mrs. Geo. Pooler writes: "I am satisfied that these two facts are being demonstrated to all who will pause and listen: That science and true religion are in perfect harmony, and that spirit messages and spirit return are not fraudulent." There is another truth, that a person who believes the Bible is a Spiritualist. There are no ifs nor ands about it. There are good spirits, and there are bad spirits, the same as there are good people and bad people. We have had in our family some very remarkable demonstrations of spirit power. Some prophecies have been fulfilled that we did not at the time think could ever be. We hoped against hope they might never be, but they were."

BEAR IN MIND that the editor of The Progressive Thinker is in no wise responsible for the views expressed by contributors. He may or may not, agree with their respective views.

Charles Thompson writes: "The Fraternal Order of Spiritualists is very anxious, when it starts up in the fall, to open a Lyceum in connection with the society, and of course to have a successful Lyceum we must have someone as a leader who is used to that kind of work, we extend a hearty invitation to anyone interested along that line, to come and join us, or we would like to hear from some one who fully understands the running of a Lyceum, so as to make it a success, and have it as a shining light, so that it can show forth its good works and glorify the Infinite Spirit, from whom cometh all good and perfect gifts."

C. S. McL. writes from Minneapolis, Minn.: "The New Thought Spiritual Society of Minneapolis closed its meetings June 1st, after a season of successful work. This society was organized by Mrs. Frances Wheeler and her son, H. E. Wheeler, who has been been the speaker during the past two seasons, his mother following his lectures with spirit messages. This young man is only 21 years old, but is a compliment to Spiritualism every time he appears upon the platform, as he is a graduate of the University of Minnesota in the Law Class of 1907. There has been much said and written in the Spiritual press during the past year about encouraging young speakers and workers in the cause of Spiritualism, and this young man is the youngest speaker in the work to my knowledge. He gives the people logical and profound discourses that would do credit to much older speakers, and it seems it would be a good suggestion to the N. S. A. if at their annual convention they would present some such young workers for short addresses upon their program The writer has been one of the regular attendants at Mrs. Wheeler's meetings during the past season, and feels it is just for him to say, for himself as well as for many others who have expressed their opinions to him, that these meetings have proved instructive and uplifting. Mrs. Wheeler's work a smessage-bearer is too well known in many localities throughout the west to need any added praise from the writer, more than to say that her messages are always spiritual. We hope such young speakers as Mr. Wheeler can be kept inspired by the encouragement due them by all lovers of a pure and scholarly order of Spiritualism. These meetings have seemed to fill a long-felt want in Minneapolis, as the class of people attending them have been seeking intellectual Spiritualism, and there is room in a city with the population of Minneapolis for all classes of workers. "Let the good work go on," is the wish of one who believes in the progress of Spiritualism."

Elizabeth M. Lowe writes as follows but gives no date or place from which she writes: "we were hungry for spiritual food when there came among us the ever faithful Mrs. Elizabeth J. Demorest, lecturer and message bearer of Pittsburg, Pa. What a feast we had for four short weeks, and we are selfish enough to wish she would linger longer with us this time."

Mrs. May C. Pierson writes as follows but fails to give the date of the memorial services: "There will be anniversary services held at the home of Josephine Pratt at 2 p. m., at Spring Hill, Kansas, in honor of the late J. H. Pratt, who was a staunch advocate of physical phenomena. Many speakers and mediums are invited to take part."

Harry J. Moore united in marriage Geo. Lichenthaler and Miss Minnie Campbell, both of Portland, Oregon, on Wednesday evening, June 26. He organized a class for instruction in Spiritualism with upwards of thirty-five members during the latter part of June in Sellwood, Oregon.

About the time this issue of The Progressive Thinker reaches its rural subscribers and those at the Wonewoc Camp, Wis., Georgia Gladys Cooley will be in their midst with her elevating lectures and clinching messages. She will be absent on engagements for the next three weeks, as busy as she can be, making new Spiritualists and bringing comfort to the old ones.

LIKE THE MAN WHO WAS.

Strange Mental Plight of a New Jersey Citizen.—Charles P. Brewin Restored Alive to His Family After Being Mourned Four Years as Dead—Is Three Score, but His Memory Dates Back Only Twenty-four Months, and He Thinks He Is a Tailor—Puzzle to the Physicians.

Special.—Restored alive to his family, after having been mourned four years as dead, but lost to himself, is the strange fate of Charles P. Brewin, for thirty years a staunch citizen of this old revolutionary town, Burlington, N. J. He is the man that was.

To himself Brewin is a child with but a two years' memory, in spite of the three score years that have set the snow on his head. He is now, he thinks, Charles Johnson, a gray-little tailor, whose interest in life does not extend much beyond his "goose." Yet his wife and children are weeping over him, trying to pursuade the amazed little man that he is of their flesh and blood.

A stranger case of dual identity, with one self-dead, seldom has been disclosed. Physicians who have known the whilom tailor, as prosperous Charles P. Brewin say the pressure of a small bone on the brain is the cause of his trouble.

Brewin's dual history dates from four years ago in November when his wife and children awoke to find him gone. A search failed to find him, and he was believed to be dead. Last Monday, however, an old acquaintance recognized him in Plainfield, only a few miles from his old home.

TAKE NOTICE.—Correspondents are requested when writing for this paper to use either a typewriter or a pen, with black ink. Write on only one side of the paper, and in a plain, legible hand, and thus avoid the necessity of preparing your copy for the printer. Please bear this in mind.

The Illinois Sunflower Club will have an excursion and picnic to Michigan City, on Saturday, July 13, on the famous new steamship, Theodore Roosevelt, Chicago's greatest ship. It leaves Chicago 10 a. m. and 2:30 p. m. Leaves Michigan City 4:20 p. m. and 7:45 p. m. Tickets, only 75 cts. round trip. Children, 5 and under 12 years, 40 cents. Get your tickets early. Docks: South end Clark St. Bridge. Tickets can be purchased of Mrs. Belle Curtis, 615 Otto street; Mrs. A. W. Bloom, 1113 Lincoln avenue, on the North Side; Mrs. Dr. Cross, 560 E. 55th street, and Mrs. O. B. Wilson, No. 6 East 47th street, on the South Side; Mrs. Peet, 874 W. Madison street, and Mrs. E. J. Bloom, 896 Turner avenue., and Mrs. J. R. Francis, 40 Loomis street, on the West Side, and also at the boat landing. We expect a delightful time, and invite everyone to come and join us. Remember the date, July 13, in the sultry summer time, for what is so healthful and invigorating as a day spent on beautiful Lake Michigan.

THE JAMESTOWN EXPOSITION.

Mediums There Must Pay a Large License Fee.

The attention of the executive officers of the N. S. A. has been called to the fact that mediums for different phases of phenomena have gone, and are still going, to the Jamestown Exposition, with the hope of making use of their special powers for financial gain. The civil authorities exact a license fee of one hundred dollars from every person who sets himself forth as a medium, or a fortune teller. The people round about Jamestown are very conservative and do not patronize mediums in any way whatever. It is also said that the Management of the Exposition does not hesitate to make it unpleasant for everyone who engages in psychic work. In view of these facts it would be well for all mediums to give the Jamestown Exposition a wide berth, unless they have plenty of money for license fees and cost of living. Mediumship can be used to better advantage in other places. This warning is made necessary by reason of the fate of those who have thus far been there.

LILY DALE.

It Is a Center of Education.

There is no mistake in the sign of the times that Lily Dale is becoming one of the most popular centers for education along lines of psychical and physical culture of any summer resort in the country. It is here that they will come in touch with the various forms of metaphysical philosophy and speculation, as you can at no other camp in America; and it is at Lily Dale that the inductions of history, the demonstrations of scientific art and natural philosophy yield a wider presentation and application than at any Free Thought camp in the world. The rostrum has always been noted for its liberality in social ethics, and had an eye open to the intrinsic value of progressive effort.

This season the Management has added to its educational system a vocal music and voice culture. Certainly the Spiritualists throughout the East and West ought to rise up and bless the Management for this one effort, if for nothing else. Vocal music and congregational singing have been reduced to a low state of penury in consequence of the desire of audiences to sing something in which all could join, resulting in the retaining of a few old songs and hymn-tunes of very common character, as the special property of our musical curriculum.

The Managing Board at the Dale never did a wiser thing than to engage Wm. J. Sheehan, of Buffalo, to open a class in choral music and part singing this season, affording all who desire an opportunity to learn how to sing, and sing correctly.

Having attended Mr. Sheehan's chorus rehearsals and concerts in Buffalo, and having had in former years extended experience with vocal societies in the State of Wisconsin, as secretary of the Wisconsin State Musical Association, which position we held for several years, we feel that we have a right to our opinion that Mr. Sheehan is an erudite, conscientious, careful and painstaking instructor, and we sincerely hope that the effort of the Board of Managers and Mr. Sheehan's superior qualifications will meet with the greatest success at Lily Dale.

W. M. LOCKWOOD.

THE PITY OF IT.

I.

Bent and wrinkled and stout and gray
You totter slowly with awkward care;
Perhaps you were graceful and glad one day,
Eager young men may have called you fair.
Your eyes are dull; o'er your furrowed brow
There hangs not any rebellious curl;
I watch you pass and I wonder how
You looked as a young and handsome girl.

II.

The world is a serious world to you,
Your lips have forgotten their ancient mirth;
You have ceased to think that a little shoe
Is a sign of beauty or gentle birth;
Yet once, perhaps, you were slight and trim,
And once, perhaps, you were gay and glad;
I wonder, seeing you stout and grim,
What kind of a temper you may have had.

III.

You have ceased to babble of foolish things,
Your chin hangs down in many a fold;
Your hands, that once were bedecked with rings,
Are bare and brown and shriveled and old!
I watch you tottering slowly by
And I know you were once a delightful miss,
With a slender waist, and I wonder why
It was ever your fortune to come to this

THE LAST CALL!

The officers of all local spiritual societies in the United States, who have not made their reports for the census, are requested to take notice that this is the last chance. The time is now short and they are earnestly requested to forward the cards they have in hand, filled according to instructions, at the earliest possible moment. The books will close July 20, and it is highly probable that any society whose report is not in hand on that day, will be recognized after that time. Inasmuch as less than one-half of the local societies that are supposed to be in existence, or are known to have had an existence, in the last seventeen years, have thus far reported, it becomes the duty of all delinquents to attend to this matter at once. Spiritualists and friends of the cause, will you not interest yourselves in this very important matter? Now is the time to act. Let us hear from you at once. If you have no cards to fill for your organizations, send me the name of your societies, their dates of organization, membership and how divided, and I will fill the cards for you, giving you credit for having furnished the information. Remember this is the last call! Further delay is dangerous!

Yours for Spiritualism,
HARRISON D. BARRETT.

FROM THE I. S. S. A. SECRETARY.

In re the matter above referred to by Brother Barnett, I wish to say that with all the notice I have given in The Progressive Thinker regarding the importance of making returns to the National Census Bureau, I have had so few replies that it is hardly worth while sending them in, and especially from the unorganized districts.

It is really not unexpected, for the indifference of Spiritualists generally to anything like "keeping tab" on themselves, has been one of the greatest drawbacks and hindrances to organization. Whether it is always to be so remains to be seen. But from a letter recently received from Brother Barrett, most of our auxiliaries, those connected with the I. S. S. A., have already sent in their reports, and it leaves but little for your Secretary to do in this line, as we have not a very large individual membership at the present time. The societies that have reported to him from this State outside of Chicago, are from Genoa, Wheaton, Watseka, Decatur, LeRoy, Farmer City, Bloomington, and two societies in Rockford. Those in the city of Chicago, are, Central Spiritual Church, Church of the Soul, Bund der Wahrheit, North Star Spiritualist Union, Light of Truth Society, Golden Rule Spiritual Society, Metropolitan Spiritual Society, Truth Church, Hyde Park Occult Society, Students of Nature, Progressive Spiritualist Society, Occult Scientists, Church of Psychic Forces, Psychic Circle, Nora E. Hill's Branch, First Society Fraternal Order, Church of Light and Truth, Luigt und Wahrheit, and Band of Harmony, have reported.

Sorry to say that many of these are not auxiliary to the State Association, but we do not expect to encompass all individuals and their individual societies with our strong arms, long and far-reaching as we feel towards all. But if the organization was complete within itself, as we believe it should be, it would not take longer than 15 minutes of your Secretary's time to give a complete census of organized Spiritualism in the entire State. It should be thus, and toward that end, we promise to bend our efforts in the coming days of our office-holding.

If there are any societies in the city and State not mentioned in the above list, wishing to be numbered with the "live ones," and they will send to me I will send them cards to be filled out and send in at once. There is no time for delay now. We must stand up and be counted or sit down and be obscured for another term of years from the ranks of organized religious bodies. Which will it be? It is "up to you."

T. WILKINS.
Sec'y. I. S. S. A.,
15 Park Avenue, Chicago, Ill.

From Seattle, Wash.

Seattle, Wash., June 28, 1907.

I wish to notify our Spiritualist friends that there will be no encampment at Edgewood, Washington, this year, owing to the absence of the president, vice-president, and other prominent members of the official board during the time when necessary arrangements should have been made for the successful conducting of the camp.

The Annual State Convention will convene in the city of Tacoma, September 17, 18 and 19, 1907, during which time some of the most prominent speakers of the order will participate in the evening exercises.

I wish to call the attention also of all local societies of this State that it will be necessary for them to remit to the secretary of the S. S. A. of W. the sum of 50 cents per capita on or before September 1.

PASSED TO SPIRIT LIFE.

[Obituaries to the extent of ten lines only will be inserted free. All in excess of ten lines will be charged at the rate of fifteen cents per line. About 7 words constitute a line.]

Passed to spirit life, May 21, 1907, Mrs. Mabelle Hull, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. A. C. Pettis, and wife of Frances Hull, and niece of the writer. While conscious of the approaching change her mind remained clear and the spirit attuned to the higher life. She addressed the writer in the familiar home language, as follows: "Uncle Dick, I want you to play for me when I am dying," and this pathetic request was literally complied with, as the veil between the seen and the unseen was gently drawn aside. The services were conducted by Rev. J. S. Hull, an earnest Spiritualist of this city. The floral tribute of friends and neighbors was indeed beautiful and inspiring.

Passed to spirit life, Mrs. Louisa Hartwick, on June 11, at Council Bluffs, Iowa;; aged 80 years. She was a devout Spiritualist. Funeral services by the writer.

C. O. KEMPSTER.

Jacob H. Schwennesen, of Muncie, Ind., passed to the higher life, Sunday evening, June 30. The transition was sudden, Mr. Schwennesen being a sufferer from heart trouble. He is the husband of our esteemed co-worker, Mrs. Lou. Schwennesen, treasurer of the Indiana State Association of Spiritualists. The funeral occurred Wednesday, July 3rd., Will V. Nicum, of Dayton, O., officiating. The body was taken to Indianapolis for cremation.

—Mrs. Martha Osborne passed to spirit life from the residence of her son, Edward Osborne of Decatur, Mich., July 2, at the age of 73. She had been an avowed spiritualist for many years, and patiently waited for the change which she knew would reunite her with her loved ones gone before. The large home was crowded with friends, and the beautiful floral decorations were silent testimonials from loving friends who will ever hold sweet memories of Mother Osborne. The transition services were conducted by Georgia Gladys Cooley.

The Unknown Life of Christ.

A New edition of the Unknown Life of Christ is just from the press, and we are able to supply all demands. For the benefit of new subscribers we have added thereto two remarkable lectures, one by Prof. Henry S. The Peace Congress.

Interesting Particulars from Our Special Correspondent at The Hague.

To the Editor:—The Peace Congress was formarly opened last Saturday by a meeting of the official delegates of the governments represented in the "Hall of Knights," and the officers of the Congress were elected; the president elected was Count Nelidoff (Russian.) There have been no sessions since.

Enclosed find copy of Mrs. Richmond's address to the president of the Peace Congress. Nobody but official representatives of the different governments are admitted to the sessions of the conference, but there are International Peace Conferences held at the international correspondents' headquarters, which forms by far the greater peace parliament in its influence throughout the world. Mrs. Richmond is requested to act upon the program committee with Mr. Stead and others in arranging for addresses before the conferences from the representatives of all nations. The Europeans are very adverse to women taking any active part in the affairs of the nations. Queens, really, are only figureheads, so Mrs. Richmond has a great disadvantage in being a woman; otherwise what she accomplishes would be heralded with great acclaim.

WM. RICHMOND.

The Hague, June 17.

Mrs. Richmond's Address to the President of the Peace Congress.

To his Excellency, M. Nelidoff, President of the Peace Conference:—I am honored to present to your honorable body the credentials that I bear from the following societies and federations, representing people numbering into the millions.

These societies are:

1. "The Church of the Soul" (with members in every country) and the "School of Psychosophy."
2. The World New-Thought Federation. (International.)
3. The World Unity League. (International.)
4. The National Spiritualists Association. (U. S. A. and Canada.)
5. The Fraternal Order of Spiritualists of America.
6. The Morris Pratt Institute.

These societies and federations are religious, educational, ethical, scientific, artistic, literary, and the membership represents the advanced thought and scholarship of this age.

It is held by them that human advancement and civilization progresses in times of peace. We revert to ancient Greece, greatest in all arts and enlightenment during the centuries of peace that was hers. Rome, after her wars of conquest were over, possessed also the best form of government that the world had then known.

We believe the nations are growing nearer and nearer to each other, because of the necessities of commerce, because of the increasing enlightenment of the age, and because of the ultimate destiny of the human race.

We desire, not only through the representatives of our respective governments, but also by our special representatives, to urge upon this wise and honorable body:

1. The formation of a federation of nations.
2. The creation and continuance by that federation of a permanent congress of adjustment or arbitration for the final settlement of differences that arise between nations.
3. The recognition of the primal truth, that there can be no difficulties between intelligent people that cannot better be adjusted by intelligence than by physical violence.

We are not of those who favor "peace at any price," but rather that the causes of war may be removed in the more perfect understanding of nations one with the other.

We recognize fully the sincerity of the intentions of the members of the Peace Congress, and we also recognize the many obstacles to be overcome, but we know that every effort will be made to bring about a final and complete Code International, that shall, through the perpetual congress of all the nations, thus federated, bring about the peace that poets, philosophers and the Divine Teachers of the world have prophesied.

It may form an added strength of purpose to this honorable body to know that the millions of people whom I have the honor to represent, in common with the whole world, await with breathless and prayerful attention the results of your deliberations.

REV. CORA L. V. RICHMOND, LL. D.

MR. AND MRS. RICHMOND AT THE HAGUE.

They are Heartily Welcomed there on All Sides—An Interesting Letter.

To the Editor:—I have mailed you papers announcing our arrival here, our reception by the Count Nelidoff, president of the Peace Congress. Our presence at the reception of the Baroness Suttner, and at the Press reception (with synopsis of Mrs. Richmond's speech there in a morning daily) and notice of Mrs. Richmond's address next Wednesday evening.

As I write you no one is permitted to be present—not even the representatives of the press—at the sessions of the Peace Congress, but the official delegations of the different governments; so we sought an interview with the president of the Congress. First, through the American Minister, who said it would be absolutely impossible for Mrs. Richmond to have an audience with the president, but that I might succeed in securing an interview with him and present our credentials and address.

However, Mrs. Richmond and myself concluded to try and secure an interview together, unassisted by any official influence. So we went directly to the president's headquarters, sent in our cards, stated our mission, and requested to see the president.

We were requested to wait a few moments, when the secretary of the Congress came and said: "The president will receive you the next morning at 11 o'clock."

The next morning when we presented our cards we were promptly ushered into his private room, where he was alone. He received us very graciously. I briefly explained to him the object of our mission, and that Mrs. Richmond wished to present to him credentials as the representative of a number of societies, national and international, with a brief address expressive of the sympathy with, and their views regarding the work of the Peace Congress, and introduced Mrs. Richmond.

He took the papers and read the address over very carefully. Then he looked up and said he was very much pleased to receive them and thanked Mrs. Richmond heartily. He said he would present them to the Congress at one of their sessions. Then, it seemed to me, he handled the envelope containing the address and credentials very affectionately. He had invited us to take seats when we first entered.

After our business or mission was completed, we entered into a very pleasant and enjoyable conversation. While we were talking, the secretary came and announced some one.

The president told him to have him wait. After talking a few minutes more, we felt that we could not trespass upon his time any longer, as he is a very busy man just now. He seemed very reluctant to close the interview, as were we. He politely escorted us to the door and opened it for us, as the handle was concealed by a portiere. We found him a very gracious, broad-minded, idealistic man. He would make a splendid American.

Now all the people we meet here who have heard of our interview are wondering why the president should receive us when people of rank and influence are denied. Mr. Stead said to us: "Why, why, how did you manage it?"

The Society of Internationalism here, in conjunction with Mr. Stead, has established an international headquarters, called the "Cercle International," in a large mansion, with very beautiful and commodious rooms, to which Mrs. Richmond and myself were presented cards of membership, and where we have met a number of very interesting men and women.

Last Thursday was the initial reception, of which there are to be two each week—Monday and Thursday afternoons the Baroness de Suttner presiding as hostess. After a social half hour, and the partaking of tea and lemonade, the Baroness opened the discussion of the afternoon by a short address on "The Rights of Conquest." The address being in French, we took no part in the discussion.

Just as I was writing the above the mail brought me my "Courier de la Conference," in which I see a picture of a number of the guests present, in which Mrs. Richmond and myself are included. I will send you the paper and let you pick them out. They are about the clearest of any in the picture.

The Press of The Hague have established an international press bureau in magnificent quarters, for the meeting, and use of the correspondents of papers and journals throughout the world. I called there and presented my credentials as the accredited correspondent of "The Progressive Thinker," which gave me and Mrs. Richmond tickets of membership, which gives us entree to many places otherwise inaccessible, and also invitations to the grand reception of the Holland Press to the representatives of the press of the world, which occurred last Thursday evening, the invitations being for 9:30.

So at 9:30 we drove up to the place in our carriage. It was a stupendous affair. We were received in a very large, beautiful reception room by the president of the bureau and his wife (the president of the bureau being an editor of one of The Hague's daily newspapers). There were congregated there the representatives of many of the most important papers in the world, a number of ministers of foreign countries and official delegates to the Peace Congress and members of the Holland House of Parliament, caled "The First and Second House." After the guests had been formally received, wide doors were thrown open leading into a magnificent banquet hall, at one end of which was a raised platform, at the other end tables loaded with all kinds of choice viands, champagne and wines of all descriptions.

After the company had partaken of some of the refreshments, the president of the club ascended the platform and gave a very eloquent address of welcome to the representatives of the press of the different countries. He spoke fluently in four different languages—French, Dutch, German and English.

After a number from different countries had responded to his eloquent words of welcome, he came to Mrs. Richmond and escorted her to the platform to voice America's thanks for such a royal reception to the members of the press, which Mrs. Richmond did in a few appropriate words. At the conclusion of her remarks the president or chairman hurried to the platform and escorted her back to her seat, thanking her profusely all the way for her kind words. To-night Mr. Stead gives the first of a series of addresses to be given at the "Cercle International." The second address will be given by Mrs. Richmond next Wednesday evening. After that I will feel ready to return, for we have accomplished more than my most sanguine expectations could anticipate.

Holland is certainly a most interesting place to visit. It is unique among the civilized nations of the world. The Hollanders, in mass, seem to be a peaceful, happy people.

The weather since we have been here has been cold, cloudy and windy most of the time, with some rain and some sunshine. It seems to both of us as though it had been years instead of weeks since we left home, we have had so many unusual experiences.

SPIRITUALISM WINS!

ical condition,—if he had no varicose veins and no trouble with his heart,—if he believed in Spiritualism, as stated in the hypothetical question, I would believe from that alone that he was insane on the subject of Spiritualism. Any man who believes in Spiritualism, as Mr. Crumbaugh believed, whether he was sound or unsound physically, I would believe him insane."

Other physicians made similar explanation. Whatever the weight the opinion of these learned physicians might have as tending to establish that the testator was insane because of his belief in Spiritualism in a purely scientific and theoretical sense, they cannot be regarded as any evidence whatever tending to establish the existence of insane delusions, within the legal meaning of these terms. Where the proof shows, as in this case, facts which prove beyond all doubt that a testator was in the full possession and proper exercise of all his mental faculties, an opinion of an expert, based on a hypothetical state of facts not inconsistent with legal insanity, can have little or no weight, and in the absence of any other evidence of insanity will not warrant the court in refusing to direct a verdict notwithstanding such opinions.

The conclusions we have reached in this case are not in conflict with our previous decision. Orchardson V. Cofield, 171 Ill. 14, in a case where the jury found that the testatrix possessed testamentary capacity but that the will was the result of undue influence, and the verdict was upheld. The belief of the testatrix in Spiritualism in that case was important as bearing upon the undue influence exercised over Mrs. Merrick Orchardson. There the evidence showed that a woman eighty-three years old was induced to marry a Spiritualist medium fifty-seven years old, and afterwards to make a will in his favor, devising a large estate to him, and that she believed that she was directed to contract this unnatural marriage relation, and to make the will, by the spirit of her former husband. There is not a particle of evidence in this record that the testator ever claimed to have had any spiritual direction from Bright Eyes, or any other spiritual manifestation, directing or suggesting the making of the will in question. On the contrary, he expressly declared in the will itself that "I have not been influenced by any person or spirits, but have only made same after many weeks of study, thought and consideration," etc., thus showing, as clearly as language can make it appear, that the testamentary scheme to build a church and a public library in his city,—the former, especially, for the benefit of the Spiritualist organization and the latter for the benefit of the public in general,—was a plan originated, worked out and matured in the mind of the testator, uninfluenced by any persons or spiritual manifestations whatever.

The case of American Bible Society V. Price, 115 Ill. 623, relied on by contestants, is not in conflict with the views we have expressed in the case at bar. It was there held that when a testator has an insane delusion in regard to one who is an object of the testator's bounty, which causes him to make a will which he would not have made out for such delusion, such will cannot be sustained. So, also, it is held, that where a person has an insane delusion in regard to his duty or moral obligation to make a will in favor of a particular person, corporation or society, and a will is the result of such insane delusion, it cannot be sustained.

This is good law, and if we should strike out "insane delusion" in the above propositions and insert "religious belief," it would fit this case, but it would not then be the law. It can never be held that because a testator believes in the doctrines of a particular church, and because of his preference for the one rather than the other, he makes his will with a view of promoting the interests of his peculiar denomination, this fact is to be accepted as evidence of insanity. The owner of an estate may devise it to aid the Methodist, Baptist, Presbyterian, Catholic, Universalist, Swedenborgian, or any other religious organization he may choose, or he may, if is meets his wishes, like Stephen Girard, give his property to a non-sectarian school and provide that no ecclesiastic, missionary or minister of any sect whatever shall ever hold or exercise any station or duty whatever therein, not be allowed, even as a visitor, to enter the school or to go upon the premises, and such will is valid and will be upheld. Vidal V. Girard's Exrs. 43 U. S. 126.

It is a constantly recurring source of error in will cases that there is a strong inclination in courts, and especially in juries, to do by their judgments or verdicts what they would have advised had the testator consulted them beforehand. One who is strongly imbued with the belief that the propagation of Spiritualism is detrimental to society, and that there is nothing in the claims of its adherents that cannot be accounted for by fraud and deception on the one hand and credulity on the other, will be liable to accept any plausible theory upon which he may find a verdict correcting the supposed infirmities of the testator's disposition.

The verdict of the jury in this case is entitled to the weight and consideration that is accorded to a verdict in a law case; but a verdict in a law case cannot stand without some evidence to support it. Here, as we have seen, there is none, unless we are prepared to say the bare fact that the testator was a Spiritualist proves that he was insane. Such a holding would find no support in the law.

Proponents requested the court to direct a verdict in their favor, which was refused. If there was evidence requiring the court to submit the case to the jury the refusal of the request was not error. If, upon the whole case, there was evidence fairly tending to support contestants' bill the motion was properly denied.

After giving this case the careful examination which its importance requires, we are firmly convinced that there is no evidence here even raising a suspicion in our minds that the testator was not entirely sane and as competent to make a will or transact any other kind of business as the average business man. We have examined the evidence with great care, and when it is all summarized and reduced to its final results it only proves that Crumbaugh was a believer in Spiritualism; that he thought that he was doing a philanthropic work for his friends in LeRoy by leaving this estate to establish this church and library, and however much one may differ from him as to the advisability of such a devise, that has nothing to do with the legal status of the will. If the testator had the capacity to make the will he had the capacity to select the beneficiaries. This he has done, and there the matter must rest.

The court erred in refusing to direct a verdict for proponents, for which the decree must be reversed, which is accordingly done and the cause remanded to the circuit court, for further proceedings not inconsistent with the views herein expressed.

Reversed and remanded.

A Powerful Strange Force

That Would Do Away With the Mails, Telepathy and Drugs.

Would Be But Little More Startling Than the Marvelous Things Done by People Who Have Tried This Wonderful System.

How Prominent Men and Women Use It to Influence the Minds of Others—Heal Themselves and Others of Chronic Diseases, Nervous Disorders and Habits as If by Magic—Any One Can Do It—Distance No Barrier—One Person's Control Over Another Now Fully Explained.

How Every Man, Woman and Child in the World Can Have "The Secrets of Magnetic Force, Health and Power" Absolutely Free.

Professor F. T. McIntyre, a well-to-do scientist of this city, has created a sensation in the hypnotic world. Through delving down in the realms of nature's mysteries he has discovered a delicate but powerful system that seems destined to revolutionize the theories of the most noted authorities on Mind Force. Some people look upon him as a man possessing a strange power, for he has told them how to influence people far and near and to heal themselves and others of their ills as if by magic. He tells them how to project their thoughts, develop a powerful mentality and build up the mechanism of the body and brain. Doctors and magnetists who have tested the workings of his new discovery admit that it surpasses anything in the history of psychic power.

In explaining the method Professor McIntyre says: "I am convinced that everybody can accomplish the things I have done if they understand the system. It would be a grand thing if every man, woman and child in this country learned the use of this wonderful system. There should be no more disease, immorality, drunkenness, despondency, separations, poverty or failures in life. I have sent free illustrated pamphlets to people in many parts of the world, which explain the principles of my new discovery, and I find they can do the same wonderful things I have done, and for which some persons think I possess a special power. I have sent these printed pamphlets out without any charge whatever, as I am anxious to have every one try the wonders of this new discovery. The letters received from persons who tried it are the same. Many are loud in their exclamations of surprise and thanks, and say they never dreamed such things possible. I receive many fine presents and enjoy working for the uplifting of mankind and science. The kind letters received from grateful hearts more than pay for the interest I take. I will send a copy of my free book to every person who writes me without any charge whatever."

Professor McIntyre has a basketful of letters, from people in many parts of the world. They are, indeed, startling. Mr. James Kubal, a prominent business man of Chicago, writes the following:

"I never dreamed such things possible. If I had only known of this sooner. This system has made a different man of me. I shall give up business and make more money through the use of this system than I can in my business. It has brought back my sight. I can see without glasses, and work without them, too. It has overcome my backwardness, and I can now handle my customers in fine shape. I did not know I was so full of the magnetism. I think your system wonderful."

Mr. Eugene Devenson, Baton Rouge, La., writes: "Having tried your system, I, unhesitatingly pronounce it to be and to do all you claim for it."

Rev. E. G. King, pastor Christian Church, Upper Lake, Cal., writes: "I cannot recommend your system too highly, and I am willing to answer any inquiries in regard to it."

Dr. H. A. Lounsburg, Wheatly, Ontario, Canada, writes: "I have thoroughly investigated the methods and inventions of Professor McIntyre, and can say that his system is scientific and surpasses anything in the line of therapeutics that has come to my notice."

Fred S. Brett, Apartado 285, Guadalajara, Mexico, writes: "I have done wonderful things in influencing people with this system. Have had over 50 persons under my control and compelled them to do startling things. I advise everybody to try it. This system."

This free book is full of startling explanations and pictures, showing tem is truly marvelous."

that any one can master, in a short time, the power to control and sway the minds of others. It describes the strange phenomena of Psychic and Hypnotic Influence, Mystic Healing, Psycho and Suggestive Therapeutics, Personal Magnetism, and a combined, simple system of reading the characters of others, though thousands of miles away. It gives you the key to the development of the inner or dormant forces of concentration, force of character, will power, memory, determination, ambition, enthusiasm, inspiration, continuity of thought and the ability to throw off the evil effects of disease and despondency.

It is, indeed, one of the most amazingly interesting books of the age, beaming with interest from cover to cover, and all who receive free copies of it can be thankful. It points out the road to financial and social success; it reveals astonishing facts that have been overlooked by the public for many years.

If you wish a free copy of this wonderful book write a postal or letter to Professor F. T. McIntyre, Dept. 1057 No. 126 West Thirty-Fourth street, New York, N. Y. All who write will receive it; no one will be disappointed. It is sent by mail, postage paid, absolutely free.

The Wonewoc (Wis.) Camp.—Important.

The management of the Wonewoc Camp is pleased to announce that the Western Passenger Association has granted a rate of one fare and three-fifths for the round trip, on the certificate plan. This means that the friends visiting the camp will pay full fare going to the camp and three-fifths returning, provided that one hundred have purchased tickets at over fifty cents in value, between July 11 and July 17.

We wish to call upon the friends everywhere, who intend to visit the camp, to see to it that they get their tickets on the above plan. Make up parties in your town, and come to the opening meetings. A program of unusual strength has been prepared for this camp, and the meeting will be of absorbing interest from its opening to its close.

The above-mentioned rates are on the basis of fares which went into effect in May. These rates are good over lines in Illinois, Minnesota, Wisconsin, Iowa, etc. Thus the friends in Minnesota and elsewhere can take advantage of this rule.

Send at once to the secretary for one of our programs. See what splendid talent we have, then come and enjoy the beauties of our camp.

Here are some of the workers: Harrison D. Barrett, E. W. Sprague, Mrs. E. W. Sprague, Georgia Gladys Cooley, Mrs. J. P. Whitwell, Frank T. Ripley, Mrs. Lichtig, Will J. Erwood, and others. In addition to these Mr. Jo. Johnson, materializing medium of Toledo, and Mrs. DeWolf-Kiser, slate-writing medium of Chicago, will be in attendance. The best of everything will be had. Come and enjoy yourself.

Lake Brady Camp.

The Lake Brady camp opened on June 30, under more propitious conditions than for a number of years. The new rooming house with dining hall is a great addition. Several rooms are already occupied for the season, and others are engaged for a little later. Those who patronized the dining hall on Sunday said they never sat down to a better meal for the price. Everything is in the best of order and under the efficient management of the Ladies of the Aid Society promises to be a complete success in every way.

Dr. W. O. Knowles is chairman for the season conferences, and various meetings will be the program during the week, with two lectures each Sunday.

Owing to the inability of Anna R. Gillespie to be present, Mrs. D. A. Morrill was secured to take her place. As a logical and forceful speaker, Mrs. Morrill ranks among the first. She has many friends at Brady who gladly welcome her, and regret her departure each time she comes. Mrs. Mary Gaskill has a fine six-room cottage on the camp ground. Several others talk of building this season. All together, the future of Brady looks very bright. The electric cars run by the entrance every half hour. It is only a minute's walk from the car-stop to the Auditorium, which is one of the finest in the country.

A GOLDEN SHEAF.

To Our Friends:—October next will bring the 50th anniversary of our marriage, and nearly the 55th of our labor in the field of Spiritualism. In the first years we published a volume, "Blossoms of Our Spring," thinking that should the time come in the autumn of life, we would have a volume fitting the occasion of the closing years, of fruitage. A half century has almost gone by, and this 50th anniversary gives the occasion for the issuance of this volume, which we have entitled A GOLDEN SHEAF. It will be made up of selections from matter not before published, in prose and verse; selections of the best sentences and paragraphs scattered through our various books; a new spiritual song with music; illustrations of fac simile automatically written manuscripts; photogravures of our home, birthplace, and brief autobiographical sketches.

We propose to make the book in paper and binding as superior as the price, $1.00, will permit. Every copy will be numbered and contain our autographs.

The number of copies will be strictly limited to the number of subscribers, and the book will not be placed on sale after publication. As we have reached the conclusion to publish at a somewhat late date, if you favor the undertaking you will confer a favor by sending your name, by card or letter, at once (the price is not now wanted).

A list of names of subscribers will be published in the volume.

We thank you beforehand for your favor in inviting our book to your homes.

Pepper-Vanderbilt Marriage.

The Inside Facts in Reference to This Happy Event.

The action of the representatives of the associated press in reporting the recent marriage of Mr. Edward Ward Vanderbilt and Mrs. May. S. Pepper, while not exceptional in its sensational character, is yet out of keeping with the spirit of high-toned journalism and up-to-date newspaper work.

The press despatches have been sent broadcast over the world. Secular and religious papers alike have published them with startling headlines, and have descanted upon them to their readers, as if something of the most heinous nature had transpired through this union of two people, whose chief offense seems to be that they are Spiritualists, and one of them a singularly gifted psychic. Everything connected with the affair has been distorted and misrepresented by these so-called newspaper men, until even Spiritualists who read the secular papers are wondering if everything IS all right in this quiet wedding of two people of their own faith.

There are always two sides to every story, and it is but right that the side of our brethren, the interested parties, should be heard. To that end I purpose devoting myself in the following paragraphs. I am well aware that the associated press will refuse my story. The great outside world will judge these good people, our Spiritualist friends, upon ex parte testimony. In order that the Spiritualists may know the truth, the whole truth, I submit my facts solely to the Spiritualist press of the world.

First of all, let me "lay the ghost" of the silly charge that this marriage was a secret one. It was known that it was to take place June 1, 1907, to scores of friends of the contracting parties, as long ago as January of this year. Wedding cards were issued and were in the hands of hundreds of people several days prior to June 1st. There was no attempt at secrecy on the part of either Mrs. Pepper or Mr. Vanderbilt. They did not rush into print with detailed statements of their private affairs, but they discussed the approaching change in their lives with their friends openly and candidly, but with a dignity that is ever befitting such an important event in the experience of mortals.

Secondly, let me deal with the charge of "undue spirit influence" upon Mr. Vanderbilt by which he was led into this marriage. I have seen papers and letters that prove that his first wife, Mrs. Kezia Vanderbilt, and Mrs. Pepper were close friends. I have also examined evidence and heard testimony that prove that Mr. Vanderbilt has been a life-long Spiritualist, and that his wife was likewise a firm believer in Spiritualism. His mother was a Spiritualist, a rare psychic, as was her mother before her. Mrs. Pepper, therefore, did not convert Mr. Vanderbilt to Spiritualism. It was but natural that his first wife's friendship for Mrs. Pepper should impress him in her favor, and lead him, after her transition, to take an interest in her work. He did have sittings with Mrs. Pepper, and was pleased with them, but he received nothing from the angel-wife, nor from any other spirit, in the way of advice to marry Mrs. Pepper. This is abundantly proven by documentary evidence, and by the oral testimony of reliable witnesses. Mr. Vanderbilt knows his own mind and followed his own course in his wooing of his present wife.

She did not seek to influence him in the slightest degree, and for a year and a half declined to yield assent to his proposal. Letters are in existence that establish this fact beyond the shadow of a doubt. "Bright Eyes," the special guide of Mrs. Pepper, did not interfere in the slightest degree in this affair. She advised neither her medium nor Mr. Vanderbilt to take the step. There was no influence brought to bear from the spirit world to urge Mr. Vanderbilt on with his suit. The spirit friends left the matter wholly in the hands of the interested parties, whose business it alone was, and had mortals minded their own affairs as the angels did theirs, there would never have arisen this wicked newspaper sensation.

It takes people who read into the lives of others that which they themselves would do if they had a chance, to circulate slanderous reports about their betters.

Mr. Vanderbilt consulted his own wishes, was influenced by his own judgment in the choice of his wife and only succeeded in winning her consent to the union after a year and a half of effort.

Great stress has been laid upon Mr. Vanderbilt's gifts to his present wife, and the most absurd stories are afloat in regard to this matter. He did give her the home at 587 St. Marks Ave., Brooklyn, costing $10,500. On this home there was a mortgage of $7,000. In order to take up that mortgage, he gave his bride another house and lot, worth $8,500, in Manhattan Borough. Her equity in the second property is but a trifle more than sufficient to clear the mortgage on the St. Marks home. Neither property is worth $50,000, and the two are far below—(about one-tenth)—the valuation placed upon them by the associated press. No one save Mr. Vanderbilt knows the valuation of his entire estate. It is nobody's business how much he may be worth. He chose to make his wife a present of a house. He had a perfect right to do this, and thousands of others have done the same thing before him. He did it of his own free will and accord, and upon the advice of neither mortal nor spirit. His action will appear to every fair-minded person as being eminently just and right under the circumstances. He has provided his wife with a home as long as she stays in the form, no matter what happens to him.

At this point the story regarding Mr. Vanderbilt's age comes to the front. He will be sixty-six years of age on his next birth-day not seventy-nine, as reported by the associated press. He is a match mentally for any hundred dozen penny-a-line reporters that may be sent to him. His intellectual powers are a marvel to all who come into close association with him. He is at home upon the subject of agriculture, and can give, at a word, the chemical agents in certain soils, and what is best in the way of fertilizers to hold the same up to a high state of production. In the laboratory of the electrician, he is in his element, giving pointers even to Thomas A. Edison, and showing why there has been such increase of insects wholly unknown before, since electricity came into use.

"Vibration has called the latent life life force," he says, "and we now see why the disturbances of the atmosphere produce effects upon the lower orders of life."

He can turn calmly to the task of decomposing a ray of light from the sun by means of spectrum analysis, and give his hearers the results of his labors. He will tell you of radium and prove that its light shows no diminution, no matter how much time may pass as it sends its energy forth. He will show you that there is something in the light of radium not possessed by the sun, and that scientists are now trying to discover what this second energy is. He likens the sun to the first energy found in radium, and does not believe that the sun's heat is decreasing, feeling that it, like radium, is capable of holding its power without diminution, throughout all time.

The New York Herald sent a reporter to him recently for a special interview. "Are you a Spiritualist, Mr. Vanderbilt?" was the first question.

"Well," said Mr. Vanderbilt, "let me ask you a question: Are you a Spiritualist?"

"No, indeed, I am not!" blustered the reporter. "I think I have more sense!"

"Do you know anything about Spiritualism?" questioned Mr. Vanderbilt.

"No, I don't, nor do I want to do so!" replied the reporter.

"How then can you discuss a question concerning which you know nothing?" asked Mr. Vanderbilt; "Are you a competent witness?"

The reporter hesitated, and then declared his disbelief in "ghosts and other nonsense in which Spiritualists believe!"

"How do you know this?" queried Mr. Vanderbilt.

"I suppose that that is all there is to it;" replied the perplexed reporter.

"My friend," observed Mr. Vanderbilt, "that is far from being all there is of it. On one of my farms I have an apple tree; one side of that tree bears an apple with a delicate purple flush on its cheek, with a pleasant acid flavor; the other side bears a sweet apple and is yellowish in color. When you can tell me what it is that produces that phenomenon in my apple tree—why one part of a tree with the same body, fed by the same roots, nourished by the same juices, is so different from the other; what it is in the soil, air and moisture, that makes the tree what it is, I will tell you what a Spiritualist is. Or, if you, my friend, will tell me what it is that puts the soft love light into a baby's eyes, gives it its happy laugh, its radiant smile, then suddenly transforms the little figure into a piece of icy marble—what it is that has happened to produce the change—I will tell you then what a Spiritualist is. If you will apply this last question to all forms of Nature's laboratory, not excepting mature men and women, and determine the first cause, I will still tell you what a Spiritualist is!"

"Mr. Vanderbilt" exclaimed the reporter, extending his hand, "I ask your pardon. I was sent here to do you up, and I go away a wiser and better man. You have something I have not found; I apologize." Away he went, and not a word did he write against Mr. Vanderbilt, or any member of his family.

Mr. Vanderbilt is accused of senility and insanity by his enemies. Do the above paragraphs indicate either condition? Is he not rather a philosopher, a clear reasoner, a man who knows men and things? He has been a Spiritualist all his life. He is a vegetarian in theory and practice and has been for many years. He is a firm believer in the Vedanta philosophy and makes it the guide of his life.

To him, killing is wrong in all forms. He is a born reformer, and has endeavored to live up to his profession. He does not believe in the law of inheritance in property. When his parents took leave of earth he renounced his share in their estates to the very brother and sister who are now alleging that he is insane. He has made his own way in life and his competence is the result solely of his own unaided efforts. To men and women who think, who are capable of rising even "to the dead level of an idea," there is nothing in Mr. Vanderbilt's belief to indicate insanity or imbecility. He is simply a profound philosopher, far in advance of the age in which he lives.

He believes that every boy and girl born into the world should be taught some useful trade, or fitted for a profession, by means of which he or she can earn a living in case of necessity. In harmony with this belief he endeavored to rear his children. One of them, however, has been refractory and disobedient from her tenth year up to the present time. She induced her father to fit her for a musical career, for which she had no real talent. He spent about four thousand dollars in this endeavor and abandoned it only when she told him to his face, "Papa, if you are fool enough to spend your money on me in this way, I am perfectly willing that you should." She was then placed in a select school of an expensive character, but played truant daily for months before she was found out. She then told her parents plainly that she would neither work nor fit herself for any position or profession in life.

Her mother fell ill and besought her daughter to remain with her, but she refused, and left the care of the invalid to hired nurses and to her sorely distressed father. The night her mother took leave of earth this dutiful (?) daughter was at the theatre, and never by word or look did she exhibit the slightest degree of sorrow over that mother's transition. Instances of like nature are on record all along the pathway of her life for the past fifteen years, showing her ingratitude, and her unnatural, unfilial spirit. She has not scrupled to contract debts in her father's name in face of his express command to the contrary, and has even gone so far as to break into his private desk.

Last January or February, her father told her of his approaching marriage, and said that she should have a home with him as long as she wished—that he would assign her one whole floor in his new home for her personal use, and that she could mingle with the other members of the family as freely as she chose. She made no objection to the marriage, neither did she then decline her father's offer of a home. A few days later she called upon her married sister and asked her to join her in a suit against their father, declaring he would gladly give them $30,000 each rather than to go into court.

She knew that her father was a Vedantist in belief, hence felt assured that his non-resistant policy would lead him to settle outside of court. Her sister indignantly refused to become a party to such an infamous scheme.

Shortly after this, in March, 1907, this daughter brought a joint suit against her father and her sister, with the hope of having the courts assign her a position that would give her the control of her father's property, of course to her sister's disadvantage and injury. This suit against father and sister is ample proof of the love (?) she has for them in her heart. Her hatred for Spiritualism and her willful desire to inflict suffering upon others carried her too far in this distance, for the court promptly dismissed both suits with a sharp reprimand to the lawyers who brought them. The cases were stricken from the calendar, and Mr. Vanderbilt and his elder daughter were left in peace for a time. This unnatural child continued her plotting, however, and after her father's marriage on June 1, had him haled into court to answer the charge of lunacy, and his wife to that of having exercised undue influence over the father by reason of her psychic powers. If successful in her suit, Mr. Vanderbilt will be placed under guardianship and his property held in trust for his care during his stay on earth. The daughter will gain nothing financially at present from her infamous acts.

The case is now in court. Everything that a vicious and unprincipled lawyer can say about Mr. Vanderbilt in the way of slander and vilification is being said. The lady and gentleman in question have no redress for the attacks made upon them in the courtroom, for all lawyers are privileged to say what they please when before the bar. Mr. Vanderbilt's opponents will leave no stone unturned to have him adjudged insane. The present suit is for the purpose of having the court appoint a "commission in lunacy" consisting of a lawyer, a doctor, and a layman, who will be empowered to take testimony in the case. If these men decide that Mr. Vanderbilt insane, he will lose control of all that he has earned during a lifetime of honest labor. No doubt the guardian, if one is appointed, will be a man whose mental power, in contrast with those of Mr. Vanderbilt, will be as a tallow-dip to an arc light. Steps even may be taken to annul his marriage and to render null and void all of his business transactions for the past four years.

For what reasons will these things be done? To gratify the spleen of an unnatural child, to feed her hatred for her father's religion, to give her revenge for having been well cared for by that father, whose attempts to fit her for a useful life made her hate him, and, last of all, to enable her to injure her father's wife because that wife is a psychic and a teacher of the religion of Spiritualism. Mr. Vanderbilt and his wife will fight for their rights unto the uttermost. Their victory, if they win, will be a triumph for Spiritualism as it will establish a precedent by which similar cases in future years can be decided. As a body the Spiritualists of the world should send this couple their sympathy and good will, with an accompanying prayer for their complete success in their contest for the right.

Had they been Catholics or Presbyterians, no notoriety would have been given their marriage by the sycophant press. Religious prejudice and personal spite are at the root of this trouble. Mrs. Vanderbilt is an exceptionally endowed psychic; her powers transcend those possessed by the great majority of human beings, which fact has aroused the envy of many of them and caused them to persecute the one to whom they should ever be true and tried friends.

Mr. Vanderbilt is a scientist, philosopher, poet, and man of affairs combined. He possesses a giant intellect and the energy of a veritable Boanerges. He is a man who does things because he knows how to do them. As a buyer and seller of lumber, he is one of the keenest of the keen. As a scientist he ranks high among the skilled analysts of the age. As a philosopher, he not only "loves wisdom" for its own sake, but he loves it because it takes him to the root of things and shows him why they are as they are. As a student of literature, he has made the acquaintance of the greatest writers of all ages, yet he has become the imitator of none. Above all, he has found Nature to be his wisest teacher and in following her counsels has himself become wise.

This patriot, this man of affairs, this scholar, this poet, this philosopher, this scientist, this religionist, is a Spiritualist, and knows WHY! Is that a crime?

Yours for the truth,
HARRISON D. BARRETT.

An Aged Spiritualist Passed On.

To the Editor:—I now write to announce the transition of my mother, Mrs. C. C. Field, on June 14th, at the age of seventy-five years. Our mother was known always, from early young womanhood, as a medium and Spiritualist. In the wilds of Michigan, long before the Fox rappings were heard of by Mother, she had manifestations through her own powers that remained with her all her life—a comfort and solace.

An aged husband and four children are left to weep in hushed silence, well knowing it can be but a little time ere we shall meet again.

Mrs. Belle Fuller accompanied the writer to northern Michigan, where the transition occurred. The services were held in the M. E. church with full consent of minister and people. The address by Mrs. Fuller was listened to with wrapt attention by a church full of people, filling the minds of the hearers with larger ideas of life everlasting.

So it came to pass that our mother's passing on brought to the people of Indian River, Mich., that which she had never been able to accomplish while in the body, namely, to place before her friends and neighbors a presentation of Spiritualism in its true light. This Mrs. Fuller did fully, and still further was of great comfort in the home the days succeeding the putting away from sight the earth-temple of our mother. This is the test for Spiritualists; if we live up to our knowledge, when the time of parting comes. For myself, I acknowledge it was hard, very hard, to rejoice in the presence of death, the transformer, I missed the loving word of greeting, the hand clasp as of yore. I could not, and cannot now, see beyond the veil. I feel alone, alone! I reach out and clasp no loved one in my embrace.

IDEAL SUMMER RESORT.

Mt. Pleasant Park, Clinton, Iowa.

Our efforts are at all times centered in placing before the public the opportunity to come in direct touch with the best of talent, and witness the finest psychic demonstrations. This is shown to be true by the very excellent program prepared for the coming season at the Clinton camp.

Beautiful scenery, a health-giving climate, cool, sparkling water, all go to make an ideal spot in which to rebuild physical and spiritual energy.

This, in view of the present low rate of two cents a mile, makes me feel to urge all who need an outing to seek Mt. Pleasant Park for a few days or weeks' stay. The two-cent rate is, on the whole, and advantage in more ways than one to those wishing to attend our camps, for it does away with the bother of the "certificate plan," with its frequent mistakes and disappointments, and yet secures substantially the same rate, and permits travel every day in the week. As you all know, Iowa, Nebraska, Minnesota, Wisconsin, Illinois, Missouri and Arkansas have all made legal reductions in railroad rates, and our camp is easily and directly reached from any part of those States. Consult your agent as to schedule time, board the train and spend a few days in camping "under the canopy of glittering stars." The open-air life now so popular means the curing of disease in both mind and body, and Mt. Pleasant Park is an ideal place to practice it.

Or, if you are in close proximity to the grand old Mississippi, board one of the Diamond Jo steamers and enjoy a brief period on the water. There are many points of interest along the way that appeal strongly to the lovers of history and of nature.

The Grand Ledge Camp, Michigan.

Grand Ledge, Michigan, Spiritualist camp meeting opens July 21. The speakers and mediums engaged this year are among the best known on the Spiritualist platform.

The programme for the forenoons, Sundays and Mondays excepted, will be varied and interesting, consisting of mediums' meetings, conferences, etc. Mediums who are developing, as well as others, will have an opportunity to participate. These exercises are a great aid to those expecting to take up the work.

The fact that Oscar A. Edgerly is being engaged for the fourth season as speaker and chairman of our camp is sufficient warrant of his congenial and affable manner as chairman and entertaining and instructive as a speaker, to insure the successful direction of our present camp.

Mrs. A. E. Sheets, our former president and chairwoman for many years, is so thoroughly established in the hearts of the progressive and initiated public mind that the mere mention of her name as the first speaker upon the list is an agreeable insurance of intellectual eminence in spiritual ethics and oratorical pleasures for the opening session. Her homely welcome to each and all will be a cordial and sympathetic feature in the social environments of the camp.

Mrs. R. S. Lillie, known throughout the length and breadth of America as the "Queen of the Rostrum," is comparatively a new speaker with the patrons of Grand Ledge Camp, but who has been in the spiritual field since (nearly) the advent of modern Spiritualism, but because of the unremitting demand in other fields for her labors have we been unable heretofore to secure the services of this far-famed oratress. That her inspirational gems of thought will be a delightful treat is forecast in her presence with us.

Elizabeth Harlow, who was a new speaker with us last year, proved to be one of our best and will be with us again. She comes highly recommended to the management as having been long in her appointed vocation of saving souls to higher and brighter spiritual aspects of life here, while the future of eternity will take care of itself, and none should miss hearing her.

Mrs. Al Atcheson, of Buffalo, N. Y., with us last year for the first time, is a very good and true message medium, has acted as pastor of a Buffalo Society for several years and is highly recommended by them. She will give messages during the greater part of camp. They are always convincing and to the point.

Geo. A. Letford, known from North to South as the Drummer Medium, and one who has done some wonderful work in Georgia and Florida, where he travels, and has made the South more liberal toward Spiritualism, will also be in attendance and follow some of the lectures with messages.

Spiritualist, skeptic, and all friends are cordially invited to attend Grand Ledge Camp. Remember the date it opens, July 21st, lasting until August 18th. Don't fail to attend.

IMPORTANT NOTICE.

Having been directed to carry on the work of Editor-at-Large in connection with the N. S. A., I am desirous of obtaining all press notices for or against Spiritualism, and reliable information with regard to attacks upon our movement that may be made by preachers. I respectfully request all Spiritualists to forward the same to me at their earliest convenience.

THE PATHWAY of the Human Spirit, or the Pathway of the Spirit Traced, By Dr. J. M. Peebles.

Did it pre-exist and does it reincarnate again into mortal life? When did it enter the body? What is its form—how does it relate to the soul body? Can it leave the human body and return again? Can it live in and control another mortal body? These questions and many others are asked and answered by the Doctor in this, his latest book, of two hundred pages. Price 75 cents; postage, 12 cents.

UNIVERSAL SPIRITUALISM

Spirit Communion in All Ages, Among All People—by W. J. Colville.

This work has two distinctive features: (1st) A resume of the Spiritual faith and practice of Egypt, India, Persia, Greece, Rome, China, Japan, and other ancient nations, not excepting Europe during Christian centuries. (2) A summary of recent experiences in America, Great Britain, Australia, France, Germany, Italy, and other modern lands, all tending to show the persistent continuity of spiritual revelation. Clairvoyance, Telepathy, and Psychic Phenomena in general is dealt with in separate chapters at the end of the volume, making it a highly useful textbook for all who are interested in the great question of human immortality. The Author says: "The libraries contain a large number of extremely valuable works dealing with every imaginable phase of Spiritualism and occultism, but I have searched in vain for a single portable volume, issued at a popular price, which gives a brief and lucid statement of the claims made in all ages and in all countries on behalf of the mighty truth of communion between inhabitants of earth and dwellers disrobed of flesh in the one vast spiritual universe. The enormous and ever increasing interest in "Psychic" problems and the eager, constant demand for historic information coupled with a rational setting forth of intelligible spiritual philosophy, has led me to appear once again before the public with a book." Price $1.00.

OUR CHILDREN.

Hints From Practical Experience for Parents and Teachers.—By Paul Carus.

In this little book "Our Children," Paul Carus offers a unique contribution to pedagogical literature. Without any theoretical pretensions it is a strong defense for the rights of the child, dealing with the responsibilities of parenthood, and with the first inculcation of fundamental ethics in the child mind and the true principles of correction and guidance. Each detail is forcefully illustrated by informal incidents from the author's experience with his own children, and his suggestions will prove of the greatest possible value to young mothers and kindergartners. Hints as to the first acquaintance with all branches of knowledge are touched upon—mathematics, natural sciences, foreign languages, etc.—and practical wisdom in regard to the treatment of money, hygiene and similar problems. 207 Pages. Price, cloth, $1.00.

VOL. 36 CHICAGO, ILL., JULY 20, 1907 NO. 921

TO INVENTORS AND SCIENTISTS.

Some Thoughts and Suggestions for Them to Consider.

I have been reading the very able and interesting article by Professor Larkin in No. 902, wherein he makes this remarkable forecast: "I believe that the time will come when matter will be moved by mind."

This, sir, is the "missing link" that will prove the immortality of the soul. Science is getting very near it, even now. Electric, invisible waves are trasmitted through the ether and move matter at the other end even now; for what else is the receipt of an electric wireless message through an audible, visible signal, but the movement of matter through an invisible force? Of course, so is the electric current that runs along a wire and moves a street car, but the wireless more nearly approaches and suggests the thought force Professor Larkin expects to see. And I submit further that this is distinctly a proof of mind moving matter, because it is easy to send an electric current that will convey NO intelligent message, and it is also easy to make said message move the matter at the other end in an INTELLIGENT manner, directed by the thought at the point of transmission. Even rays of light reflected for long distances (heliographic signaling) can be used to move matter electrically at the receiving station, and can be either perfectly meaningless flashes or intelligent mind messages.

If I am not mistaken mediums claim to have moved matter by their own will power only; but any movement of matter at a seance, without physical contact, is a movement of matter by mind. Unseen human beings (of whose existence Professor Larkin says he has had no proof) are the agents for moving this matter, and although they possess spirit bodies, with hands and feet, they don't need to use their hands to move matter, but accomplish this by will power, which is nothing but an electric force. That there is visible, tangible matter, and invisible, imponderable, intangible matter (electric corpuscles) every scientist must admit. What else is a wireless message but corpuscles in motion? Even a powerful odor, a terrific sound, a flash of light, represents invisible matter (electric corpuscles) in motion.

Spiritualists claim to have proved again and again that the human soul is a duplicate of the physical body, simply composed of this electric invisible matter (corpuscles), and that we are surrounded by these souls, the lower, earthly ones composed of grosser forms of the same "matter," and the higher ones composed of more refined "matter."

Now all that is needed is for some scientist to invent a telephone so delicately attuned that a spirit voice, which would be tantamount to our thought, can actuate it and produce an audible sound.

Can't this be done by means of a microphone attachment to an ordinary telephone specially constructed to magnify or enlarge the sounds or electric forces that are now far too ethereal to be heard, felt or seen by our senses?

I am not a scientist, but perhaps the above suggestions may convey a hint to those who are.

AN ENCOURAGING OUTLOOK.

Los Angeles Spiritualists Looking Forward to a Season of Unusual Activity.

To the Editor:—There is among our Spiritualists a class who are forever looking for trouble, holding the opinion that the Spiritualist movement will become absorbed by other cults; that we as an organization will have to follow this new anticipated imaginative leader or step out of the ranks.

It seems to me we have but to read The Progressive Thinker to see that an optimistic view is far better; that we have every reason to believe this truth, which every earnest Spiritualist holds as a sacred thing, is becoming universally accepted; that the imperfectness, the undesirable, will play a very small part in this great movement later on, knowing that the process of transformation will not be accomplished by suppression, but by substitution. Thus by persistence in well doing we bring a higher state of expression into all degrees of consciousness.

The different societies here in Los Angeles are looking forward to an unusual active season.

The Ellendale camp ground is progressing most favorably, its location beautiful, many improvements under way that will make it one of note, and a great attraction in every way.

We have in this city superior workers in the different Spiritualistic movements, of which we are most proud. A few of our prominent workers are engaged for the camp season, both east and west. Dr. A. H. Waitt will have the pleasure of greeting old friends at Mt. Pleasant Park camp, Clinton, Iowa. Mr. and Mrs. Stanton, of Pasadena, Cal., will also be of the party who will carry with them the great inspiration of our beautiful cities and loving people.

May all paths grow brighter and brighter into a perfect day.

There is so much here in Los Angeles conducive to a larger life, at all times inviting us to be good and do good.

The Spiritualist Relief Association, recently organized by our most [illegible] and greatly beloved sister, [illegible] Howell, who is well known throughout the country, is a movement that has a most encouraging outlook. Their aim and object is to let the light of consideration and helpfulness shine here and now, believing that only by so doing will the great future state be one of peace.

WHAT WE ARE HERE FOR!

Earth Is a Training School for Successive Stages of Life's Expressions and Usefulness.

To the Editor:—This was more forcibly realized by me than ever before, after carefully reading your and other so-called spiritual journals.

Strange how life's divine purposes are crossed and re-crossed by mortal ambitions, and the power of will and voice employed to gain the attention and favor of those with whom MAN wishes to labor for purposed results.

But when demonstrated facts prove that put-forth efforts are not in accord with Divine purpose for general improvements, then here and there, on different lines of mortal activities, a halt is called, due to this: that mortals are variously indicted before higher than world's tribunals, by those whom they have wronged. This because there is no redress for them on earth, viz.: those classes that are made the victims of cunning schemes for the furtherance of selfish aims and ends. This, then, causes conditional litigation, and through such processes close attention is paid by spirits in authority to the motives, thoughts and conduct of all concerned pro and con. The decisions when rendered are cast back on earth as conditional forces for just effects. To these modes of regulations it is due, mostly, that history repeats itself so often.

Truly, the present is a time when craftiness is rampant and carried on too often behind a garb of piety. It is well to remember here "that unless piety and a man's interests be in the same thing, piety cannot long be maintained."

Man in this age of the world is supposed to positively know that he is an immortal as well as a mortal being. The greater part of mankind is supposed to have been graduated up in mental and moral, if not in spiritual degrees, so that their developed rational faculties can grasp the fact that man, no matter where born or under what circumstances, is a citizen of the world and a part of it, and a factor in its operations, for which reason the universal brotherhood of man as well as the Fatherhood of God is above all things THE ONE that man should strive to make the practical realization.

We know there is a very large per cent of humans who have not, as yet, developed the rational faculties to see things in their true light and do not think and live according to the rules of right, and these are the weak links in the golden chain of human brotherhood that should be strengthened by those of superior development, and therefore greater strength of manhood, etc. But what do we see instead? We see so many, many able-minded ones use their superior knowledge, not to aid and uplift their weaker brothers and sisters, but to make tools of them to further their selfish ends as above indicated.

It will certainly require very much bitter experience until these wrong pursuits of mortals are duly rectified, and every one active as they should be to aid one another. Only then the word "redemption" will have its true definition, when man is raised to a higher plane of thinking and living and is redeemed from his animal instincts and crudities, and when those of acquired intelligence to be so-called leaders, are duly redeemed from their selfish selves, to realize that there are others in the world who need their assistance in a different way than it has been given.

Pardon me, I just had to write this. I know and see all the good that is being done by those who are in condition circumstantially to help the poorer ones and rescue truth from its pollution by foul pretenders of things sacred. The angels keep the records correctly and you will all be well rewarded for all the good you do, and truly all are helped by a kindly Providence, who help those in need in whatever way they can.

WHAT IS COMING?

Says Luxury Ruins Church; Foresees Smoking Concerts—Bishop of Michigan Tells Chautauquans That if Tendencies Continue Preaching Will Be Done Away With.

Smoking concerts will be a feature of future church activities, if present tendencies continue, according to the Rt. Rev. Charles D. Williams, bishop of Michigan, who conducted the morning devotional hour at the Chautauquan assembly, Chautauqua, N. Y., July 2.

"At such a service people will have all the conveniences of their clubs, including the privilege of smoking, with concert music thrown in. Even sermons may be dispensed with if more convenient to the churchgoers.

"There was a time when we were satisfied to sit on hard benches in cold churches and listen to interminable discourses," said the bishop, "but now we must have plush pews and churches delicately comfortable, and ministers are not allowed merely to preach the gospel. They are called on for something particularly interesting, and the most sensational preacher is the one there is most demand for."

Love's Scepter.

If Love wholly reigned on this planet,
How happy earth's children might be;
All wrongs to forever be righted,
Each mortal unfettered and free!

Love's scepter would make earth an Eden,
Her inmates as Angels right here,
Harmonious, holy and happy,
Life never again to seem drear!

True Love is the Living Redeemer,
Which saves from the evils of earth,
And ope's to the eye happy visions
Of the higher heavenly birth.

Oh! hasten the hour when her brightness,
In fullest effulgence may shine—
From sea unto sea the world over,
Be swayed by her scepter sublime!

COMES TO LIFE IN COFFIN.

Man Still Conscious, Prepared for Grave—Hours of Horror—Consumptive, About to Be Buried Alive, Escapes Awful Fate Through Habit of Undertaker, Who Measures All Corpses Twice—Manages to Move After Desperate Efforts and Is Restored to Life—Describes Sensation as He Lay in Coffin.

James Fegan, of Rochdale, has the distinction of being the only man in England who was ever measured for his coffin and regularly "laid out" for burial who lives to tell the tale and laugh at the undertaker. His grave had been dug, and for hours he lay with only a sheet covering him, and all the time conscious that he was going to be buried alive. His struggles to escape the horror are best told in his own words.

"It was like an eternity," he says; "an eternity of unspeakable mental agony. I knew that I was alive the greater part of the time and made terrible inward struggles to manifest some outward sign of life.

"It was a wonder that I did not kill myself in these attempts to escape the grave.

"When the undertaker came I thought I should have gone mad. Fancy a man supposed to be dead thinking all these things. How awful it seemed that I should be unable so much as to open my eyes or even wink, while I could plainly feel the undertaker measuring me. I hoped for something to happen that might so startle me as to produce a sign of life."

His Struggles to Make a Sign.

"If the undertaker had not measured me a second time I suppose I might have given up the ghost. He told me afterward that he always measured bodies twice—not in order to make sure whether they were dead, but only to be correct in his measurements to make them comfortable.

"Imagine my despair when I thought the undertaker had done with me, and imagine my joy, coupled with an awful dread, when I felt him lower my head from the pillow and repeat the process of measuring me. I made desperate efforts to raise myself, and once actually succeeded in making a slight movement over my stomach, but no one observed it. My despair was heartbreaking. After all my ineffectual attempts to show a sign of life, was I to succeed unobserved? Perhaps I should never be able to make another such sign.

"That was hard lines if you like, and, of course, my strength could not but be failing, because, if I was not dead, there is no mistake about it that I was certainly dying again, so to speak. I pulled myself together for a final effort, as it seemed to me my last chance. Once more I could distinctly feel that I had moved, and this time the undertaker noticed it. I hear him shout: "He's not dead! He's alive! Bring cold water! Bring brandy! Bring the doctor! Look! look! look! He's moving. Look at his eyes, they're twitching."

Shrill Whistle Wakes Him.

"Then the undertaker whistled as loudly as a steam engine for those downstairs to come up. The whistle was my resurrection trumpet blast. It fairly woke me up. (The undertaker afterwards described how he whistled with his fingers.) And in a few minutes I heard my own voice saying: 'I am cold, cold, so cold.' Of course, I must have been as cold as death, otherwise they would not have taken me for dead.

"The undertaker soon had me wrapped in blankets, and then they brought me brandy as quickly as was humanly possible, though it seemed to me they could not have taken longer if they tried. I am a total abstainer, but I suppose I should be bigoted if I did not acknowledge my lifelong indebtedness to brandy as a 'pick-me-up' for a dead man."

Fegan, who was suffering from pneumonia, had lain for three hours with no covering but a sheet. A grave in Rochdale cemetery had been selected and dug, but the order was, of course, canceled as soon as the mistake was discovered.

Southport, Eng.

One Night.

One night, in the infinite silence
Of the infinite realms of Thought
I sat apart in the home of my heart
And reverently asked to be taught.

Silently, out of the fancies
That haunted my toiling brain,
These questions, weighty and solemn,
Arose in a voiceless train:

Oh! why, I inquired, should sorrow
Inhabit a world so fair?
Why should its shores be darkened
With shadows of grief and care?

The sky bends lovingly o'er us,
And earth smiles lovingly back,
And everything seems to whisper:
"Oh, what do earth's children lack?"

Hath not the all-merciful Father
Placed every good gift at our door?
Why, then, is there sighing and anguish,
And why are our hearts so poor?

I would know the sweetness of sorrow,
And the mystical missions of pain;
I would know of a truth—an ennobling truth:
If we die shall we live again?

Who can tell why the best and the wisest,
Whose names are a radiant host,
Have wept o'er the world and its sorrows,
And labored and suffered the most?

Thus queried my soul in the silence,
And a soul to my soul replied:
"Child, look within for the truths you would win,
With the pure in heart they abide."

"Ask and your soul shall receive;
Seek and you will find,
Is Love's command, and its flat grand
Of the all-embracing Mind."

Seek first, then, the Kingdom of Heaven,
With the trust of a dutiful child,
And know that living is loving and giving,
And truth is the undefiled."

BELLE BUSH.

Weymouth, Mass.

Some Experiences in a New Town.

To the Editor:—In brief I do not hesitate to say that I never take up one of your Progressive Thinkers without finding something very interesting, and although there is much in these last issues that I should like to comment on, I must, in order to be brief, come directly to what prompted this communication. I refer to a communication at the foot of the last column of No. 912, headed, "He Kicks Violently."

In my early boyhood I began to notice the difference between the way the poor were treated by the so-called "clergy," and the elegant and sumptuous manner in which the latter lived, and when I inquired why it was so when, according to what I was being taught in the "church school," that God regulated all these things, and that we must not question our condition, because it was sinful to do so. As I think of these things, as they crowd themselves upon me, I am at a loss to know where to begin, for I could fill a small book with the personal observations that I have made in my life's journey so far, but to come to modern incidents, will say that fifteen years ago I located with my family in a new town, and settling in a new town, ahead of railroads and all other advantages of modern life, there are not many luxuries to be had, and often not many of the real necessities. At the time here referred to we were passing through the hard times of the last decade of the last century, under what was then known as the Cleveland administration.

I can never forget, that on a beautiful afternoon in July, 1894, a young man, of fine physical appearance and well dressed, came to our domicile and announced himself as Mr. ——, the Presbyterian minister, who had been sent to try to establish a church. We knew by common report that such a man was there, but we had never attended any of his meetings, which he also knew. He commenced very modestly to say that the people were all so poor that he could not collect enough money to pay his board. This I took as a gentle hint that he would like me to help in that particular line. I asked him why those who sent him (for I knew that he came uninvited, so far as the public were concerned) did not support him, and you can imagine his answer which was right in line with the principles of all aggressive invaders, to "ALWAYS QUARTER ON THE ENEMY." I then informed him that just at that particular time men were in demand in the hay field at $1.50 per day, and that if I were as big, strong, and healthy as he seemed to be, I would go and earn my board in the hay field.

He drew himself up very indignantly to his full height and asked me if I did not know that "it was very unbecoming of a minister of the Gospel to work?"

I told him that if the historical record of the beautiful character, "Jesus, of Nazareth," whom he professed to serve, was true, I was strongly impressed with the idea that he worked as a carpenter, and further, that another who stood very high in the estimation of the Presbyterian church, and whom they delighted to designate as St. Paul, gloried in the fact that he earned his living by the labor of his own hands.

These hot shots from his own gun were too much for his "reverence," so he quietly withdrew from our humble abode and never visited us again.

A year or two after that incident a man met me on the street and said: "Mr. A.— how much will you agree to pay each month toward the support of a Methodist minister in this town?"

I replied, "not one cent."

He, with an astonished air, said, "What!"

I replied again with a strong emphasis on each word: "NOT ONE CENT! Do you now understand what I say?"

He said, "Yes, I understand what you say, but don't understand what you mean. Don't you believe in supporting a minister?"

I said, "No, not of such a faith, and if you or any one else does, under our great and grand principles of religious liberty, you can support or worship a gate-post if you want to, but don't be offended with me, my brother, if I claim the same right for myself."

He replied that he had no more to say. I knew this man to be good, honest and sincere, but, to my mind, misguided in his ideas of liberty, and all that is implied in that much-abused word and sentiment.

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE.

It Wrecks the Home of a Pennsylvania Man—Wife of Prof. Edward Hart, of Lafayette College, Leaves Husband, Taking Children with Her.

Easton, Pa., July 2.—[Special.]—Inability to agree on the subject of Christian Science led to the separation of Prof. Edward Hart, head of the chemical department of Lafayette college, and his family, consisting of Mrs. Hart, two sons—one recently graduated from the college—and a daughter. The trouble was of long standing, but culminated this afternoon, when Mrs. Hart and her younger son, Francis, left the home to join her other children, Richard and Miss Marion.

The differences reached an acute stage about five years ago, when the eldest son of Dr. and Mrs. Hart died, just as he was about to complete his college career. He was unusually bright, and the blow was a hard one for Dr. Hart. The young man had been impressed with the teachings of Christian Science, and, finding he was not in good health, obtained treatment from a Christian Science healer.

Dr. Hart was in ignorance of this and of his son's condition. When he learned of it he sent for a physician, who said it was too late. The son died, and Dr. Hart attributed his death to Christian Science practices. Mrs. Hart resented this and said it was because Dr. Hart had insisted on having a physician. Since then matters became more and more serious until the climax came.—Chicago Tribune.

Duty is carrying on promptly and faithfully the affairs now before you. It is to fulfill the claims of to-day.—Goethe.

SHALL WE WORSHIP ANGELS?

Some Trenchant Reflections Thereon.

Who, to-day, has personally known or even seen a mortal worthy of being worshiped by the generations that will spring up centuries hence?

Furthermore, what mortal possessed of normal intelligence and of due consideration for others can look forward with any feeling but that of repugnance to becoming an object of worship for any of earth's unborn mortals?

If we, using our most vivid imagination, cannot picture ourselves in so exalted a future state as to be worthy of the worship of others, nor can so degrade the future generations as to imagine them finding satisfaction in worshiping us, should we, then, worship to-day the spirits of those mortals who lived a few years, a few centuries, or even a few thousand years ago?

Though there are angels and angels yet this does not justify man's worshiping and of them.

The angels of theology are supposed to be an order of spiritual beings endowed with immortal life, who have never possessed a physical body, and who are next in rank to a God whom they serve with music and hosannas.

Angels, according to Christian Science are without personality, and are simply spiritual intuitions or thoughts of God passing to the mind of man.

The angels of Spiritualism, however, are personalities who have survived the death of their physical bodies, and who can under proper conditions return to mortals, tell them of this wonderful fact, prove it, and relate their observations and adventures upon their new plane of existence.

There is little danger, among those who think for themselves, of worshiping the angels of theology, while no one pretends to worship Christian Science agents.

But with the angels of Spiritualism, there is a real danger of angelolatry. I refer to those invocations common among Spiritualists, which in the main are addressed to the Spiritual Father of all mankind, but are nevertheless interspersed with laudations of, and petitions to, the spirit friends.

The word "worship" was formerly employed, we are told, in a very broad sense, and then meant, to regard with respect. In this sense there could be properly much worshiping of man by man, or of angels by man; but today worship has a more specialized meaning and relates only to those feelings and acts of religious homage which each one reserves for his highest, best, or supreme God, whatever may be the individual preference with regard to his name.

It has been well said that "In church, cottage, college, camp, on sea or land, around the world, wherever is adoring affection and trust toward Him on high, expressed by the aspiring spirit, there is true worship." And this is the kind of worship implied in our question: "Shall we worship angels?"

Now I believe that sometimes it is possible for man to worship angels more easily than he does God, and thus in a sense become polytheistic; but this is just the thing that I hope each progressive Spiritualist desires to avoid. Many of us have after a great struggle freed ourselves from the error of idolatry, that is, the worship of a God in the form and figure of a man sitting on a heavenly throne; let us not be caught again in another and similar snare of angel worship.

Communion with our spirit friends is not worship any more than loving or sensuous communion with our mortal friends may be regarded as worship. We can love, honor and respect the angels without worshiping them, in just the same way as we respect, honor or love those in mortal life who are near and dear to us. But this is not addressing prayers and invocations to them.

To those who claim to be devoid of the instinct of worship naturally, or who, believing it to be a relic of superstition, have smothered it, I am not concerned at present. Our question applies only to those who feel that they must worship, but who have not thought out fully their idea of God.

There can be but one true God, and He is the highest and best, God revealed to the mind of either a mortal or an angel. This God, though he may be differently interpreted by different minds, is nevertheless, many many have faith to believe, the same God in every case, only viewed through different colored mentalities.

And is He not more than physically perfect and mathematically accurate mechanism? Is he not humane? Is he not voluntarily instead of automatically good, and because of the greatness of his goodness worthy above all others of our worship?

I HAVE ASSURANCE.

88 Gospel Hymns, No. 5.

I have assurance naught can outshine,
Giving a foretaste of what shall be mine
When I've ascended to regions above,
Entered the home of those that I love.

Chorus—

Telling their story, singing their song,
Makes me so happy all the day long.
(Repeat.)

Now I'm completely filled with delight,
Visions of beauty greeting my sight;
Deeply entranced, I seemingly rise
Enter the gates of Paradise.

(Chorus.)

Guided by those who love me the best,
I am so happy, cheerful and blest,
Sorrows forgotten, banished all pain,
Listening to songs of sweetest refrain.

(Chorus.)

Bowers of beauty, perfumes most rare,
Sweetest of flowers, lovely and fair,
Greeting me ever, fills me with joy,
Tells me of life that's free from alloy.

CAPTAIN FRANCIS J. KEFFER.

A Man Whom Many Delight to Honor.

To the Editor:—Will you lend me an ear that I may join others in singing the praises of dear old Captain Francis J. Keffer, whose eighty-second birthday was celebrated in Philadelphia on the 27th of June.

Word comes to me from the old home that not only the First Association of Spiritualists of Philadelphia, of which he is president, but many men and women standing high in the world's progressive movements elsewhere united in paying loving tribute to "Our Captain," as he is familiarly called.

Letters of congratulation and glowing appreciation were sent him from Mr. H. D. Barrett, president of the N. S. A., also Mrs. Longley, its secretary, Mrs. Fannie Allyn, and many others.

Our Captain is one of the oldest Spiritualists in the world, having a record of over fifty years. A medium of wonderful powers, but modest to a fault regarding his splendid gifts, rarely allowing himself to be persuaded to use them in public. I, who have been asssociated with him for a number of years, as his adopted daughter, know, perhaps, better than anyone else the wonderful power of the spirit through his organism in many phases of expression. Clairvoyance, trance, automatic writing and raps sufficiently audible to be distinctly heard in a large hall full of people, are his special gifts.

It has been said that a prophet is not without honor save in his own country. Just the reverse is true in Captain Keffer's case; many high honors have been paid him by the people of the State and city in which he has lived ever since the day he came from Switzerland, a little fellow of eleven years, to make his fortune in a new world; and he made it, and many hundreds of dollars went to help build up The First Association of Spiritualists of Philadelphia, the oldest association in the world.

The life of the Captain has been intimately connected with the history of Spiritualism, though confined almost wholly to his own city, where for many years as president of the old First Association, and manager of the Parkland Camp, he became familiar with the oldest and best speakers and mediums of the early days.

It was through the Captain's mediumship that Prof. Robert Hare gained much information regarding the truths of Spiritualism.

He was also an intimate friend of the late Theodore J. Mayer.

I wish you could all know him. I am sure you would love him. His noble bearing and magnetic presence attract to him men and women alike, and the children swarm around him like flies around a sugar barrel.

Dear Captain, let me, too, a tribute rear
On this, your eighty-second year.
I know your power, and truth, and worth,
Better than any soul on earth.
No written word can half express
Your power to love, and cheer, and bless.
Only the soul's most sacred thought
Can speak the beauty you have wrought.
I've stood beside you many years,
In hours of joy, or grief and tears.
To me, your life an open page
From earliest youth to honored age
Reads clear, without a blot or scar
Its purity to stain or mar.
All that I am of worth or power
I owe to you as counselor.
You've been to me as father, friend,
A guardian spirit's power to lend.
I honor you for truth and worth,
And bless the day that gave you birth;
A shining star with sacred power
Presided o'er your natal hour;
Its beams that touched you from above,
Were radiant with the light of love.
Your nature, generous and good,
Knows naught but human brotherhood.
Never a soul more brave and true
Honored our flag "red, white and blue."
Never a man of greater worth
Lifted a hand for freedom's birth.
I honor give with tongue and pen
To one of nature's noblemen.

ANIMALS VS. CHILDREN.

Children Should Be Cared for First; Cats and Dogs Afterwards.

Seeing an article in your paper regarding "Dumb Animals," I would like to give my ideas regarding the maintenance of a society called the "Animal Rescue League."

I attended the annual meeting of the society, which was held in Park Street Church, Boston, recently, and seating myself, I soon began to think I had come to a "Dog Meeting," instead of a talk for men and women. Stylishly dressed ladies entered, many of them attended by dogs, bedecked with gay neck ribbons, and blankets of various hues. The dogs all of them occupied chairs, and many growls, grunts and barks were expressive of their appreciation of the President's remarks.

I wondered if it would not have been better if little starved, homeless children could have been led in by those elegant ladies, an each child been fed, dressed and their home life looked into; and when the president of the "Dog Society" asked for members to join the League, let the ladies with one accord say, "Our duty lies to support children rather than dogs. Children need our support for a home."

I also visited the "Cat and Dog Home," in Carver street, Boston, and found tramp cats, and mongrel dogs, all being fed, and housed. I say it would be a mercy to annihilate them. No one would want any of them. Look out for the CHILDREN FIRST.

I am a lover of animals, to excess, having had cats and dogs in my suburban home, but would rather contribute my money to a home for little crippled boys and girls than all the stray cats and dogs that ever did or will live.

EXPLORATION OF THE WORLD INVISIBLE.

Glorious Words from the Eminent French Scientist, Camille Flammarion, Who is a Firm Believer in Spirit Return.

It is absolutely certain that one soul can influence another soul at a distance and without the aid of the senses. Many dead people, I know, have been told by telepathic communications, by apparitions, subjective or objective, called by voices they distinctly heard by songs, noises and movements and impressions of different kinds. We can have no doubt on this point—the soul can act at a distance.

Mental suggestions seem equally certain.

Psychic comunication between persons who are living is also proved by a large number of cases that have been observed and reported. There are psychic currents as well as aerial and electric currents.

Telepathy is nothing new; it held a foremost place in ancient literature. The works of Homer, Euripides, Ovid, Virgil and Cicero often bring forward cases of manifestations from the dying and the dead.

We may see without eyes and hear without ears, not by unnatural excitement of our sense of vision or hearing, but by some interior sense, psychic and mental.

The soul, by its interior vision, may see not only what is passing at a great distance but it may also know in advance what is to happen in the future. The future exists potentially determined by causes which bring to pass successive events.

Positive observation proves the existence of a psychic world, as real as the world known to our physical senses, and I shall never give up the exploration of this world, which I hope to carry to an end if the time indispensable to the work shall be allowed me. But, on one hand, it is proper and prudent not to give one's self up exclusively to occult subjects, for one might soon lose the independence of mind necessary to form an impartial judgment.

It is better to look upon such studies as not one's main object in life, but as recreation of a superior order, most curious and interesting. These are foods and drinks which it is most wholesome to take only in small quantities.

On the other hand, our earth turns very quickly, and days pass away like dreams. I hope, nevertheless, to give myself the scientific pleasure of studying a portion of these mysteries, and perhaps what one man cannot do may be done by others. Every one may bring his little stone to assist in the construction of a future pyramid.

I ask my readers and friends to lay up knowledge, to work and hope. We live in the midst of an invisible world, in which forces are at work of which we know very little, and this agrees with what we know about the limitation of our physical senses and the phenomena of nature.

SUGGESTIVE THOUGHTS.

Toleration and a Decent Respect for the Opinions of Others is the Crying Need.

Would that there were more advanced leaders with courage to radiate truths along the ages, for Progression is the "watchword." The stain of the "Old Salem Days" is of the past, and in these days, despite much fraud, no one denies but that some do have spiritual gifts, and the day is not far distant when science will teach how to use psychic powers in ways that will bring good to the earth.

God places health-giving herbs right at our very doors, and leaves it to man to determine their use and abuse.

No one person possesses all the virtues, neither can any one belief contain all of the truth, and nothing but the truth.

There is so much to be learned, Prof. Edison says, "that perhaps in five hundred years we will just begin to suspect."

There can be no higher religion than the truth that any belief contains, and that truth belongs to no one sect any more than air and sunshine. If it were not right for the children of earth to know, the ever-present desire would not be implanted within them. "Seek and ye shall find." The "Good Book" has been miraculously saved for the spiritual truths it contains, and it bids us "try the spirits."

The Peace movement is a gigantic stride toward bringing the Kingdom of Heaven upon the earth, but the Congress of Religions is of no less vital import.

Toleration and a decent respect for the opinions of others is the crying need. There can be no surer way of keeping humanity from coming into greater truths than attacking unkindly the beliefs that they have grown into with their growth, and they will not relinquish the faith that has sustained them through affliction and bereavement; but add knowledge to their faith and they will gladly accept it.

Many lives have been sacrificed and millions—expended in foreign lands, and now an Oriental comes among us teaching a better way to come in "Tune with the Infinite," finding the joy of right living by discontinuing the paths of petty vices, that verdure may spring up, eschewing the fleshpot that health and strength may be given—at peace with all mankind, that powers can unfold little dreamed of, worshiping not a god of filthy lucre, but our Maker, who is a God of Love.

Concluded Its Meetings.

The First Society of Spiritualists of New York City Closes Its Meetings for the Summer—It Had Great Success with Miss Margaret Gaule as Medium.

On June 30 the First Society of Spiritualists of New York City concluded its meetings for the season. The past year has been marked by unusual activity and success. At a meeting of the board of directors held recently, Miss Margaret Gaule was asked to remain with the society during the season of 1907 and 1908 and continue her psychic work from its platform. A goodly share of these harmonious conditions may be traced to the efforts of the Ladies' Auxiliary, which is in the second year of its existence. Much good has been accomplished by this band of workers, both in spiritual upliftment and material assistance to those who needed such help. Mrs. George Sporn is president of the organization; Mrs. E. S. Reynolds and Mrs. M. A. Everett, vice-presidents; Mrs. Mary A. Newton, secretary, and Miss Margaret Gaule, treasurer.

Special mention is here made of those who have donated their time and abilities to the society for the furtherance of the cause. Among these unselfish workers may be named Mme. Louise Voight, whose singing has added much to the enjoyment of the audiences of the past season; Mr. Robert McIntyre, violinist, and Mrs. Jennie Kuhnert, pianist.

Space forbids giving the full stenographic report of the closing services of the season held in Elks Hall, Columbus Circle, on June 30, so we will limit ourself to such portions as we think may prove of interest to to the readers of The Progressive Thinker.

After some music, a poem, "The Spirit's Return," was read by the president, Mrs. Mary A. Newton, which she followed with a short address, introducing Mr. John Templeton, the editor of The Tammany Times. Mr. Templeton said in part:

"St. Paul wrote Faith, Hope and Charity,—these three, but the greatest of these is charity. But the greatest of all words is not charity. The word you have in your mind, the word I have in my mind, is IMMORTALITY—universal immortality, because we most qualify it. If immortality is anything it is universal. It is either that or it is nothing. We have no great use for immortality, if it is a matter of promises for something done; or if we say, 'You BELIEVE so and so and you will have eternal life; or you SAY so and so and eternal life will be yours.' That is eternal life by virtue of a PROMISE. Immortality is UNIVERSAL because it is the universal, immutable, unchangeable law of God. Immortality is immortal simply because it is God's changeless, loving, everlasting LAW; unchangeable by virtue of man's or woman's belief—this having absolutely nothing to do with it, absolutely nothing."

Mr. Templeton closed his remarks by mentioning by name many of the workers in the society, making a motion that a vote of thanks be tendered them for their labors in behalf of Spiritualism. Carried unanimously.

After a few remarks by Mrs. Newton (the president) and some more music, the following tests were among a number given by Miss Margaret Gaule, readings given June 30, 1907, at Elks Hall, New York City, before the First Society of Spiritualists:

The table has on it a good many articles; I know not to whom they belong.

For some reason I am unable to state, I am attracted to this article, and will read from it as best I can. The conditions that come to me with this are like a chain of flowers, but broken—just white roses, Oh! beautiful flowers. Then they fall. The chain seems to break wider. What does it mean? I come along toward the center of the chain; there is a bright red rose. Then the chain is linked again and then broken. Then I see lilies of the valley, and I see a lady holding in her arms a little child, a baby. I think this child has not passed into the spirit world very long. Then I see the little child mending the chain—a bridal bower, a baby born to this world, and then passing away. And then again, the broken hearts made one. I want to say to you I hear the words, "Have them dry their tears,"—how strange! Then there stands here also the spirit of an elderly lady. This lady is the mother of the one who carries the package. And now I hear the words, "Keep the children home." The baby that was born into their lives preached of peace; perhaps the blood red roses will bloom brighter than ever before. What a strange condition! Is it perfectly correct in every way?

"Yes."

You cannot say that you are not a Spiritualist; but this has something to do with the baby. These may be the flowers from the casket. It is your daughter, and it is her baby that has passed away. There has been a separation, and the little angel came into the world to bring back the husband to the loving girl. The baby came back as an angel of peace. Is it perfectly correct?

"Perfectly right in every way," was the answer.

Shall we feel that Spiritualism has not anything to do?

Shall we not stand for a religion that brings peace and not tears? Oh! friends, every one of you, when you find in the name of Spiritualism that which appears to you to be disgraceful to mankind, suppress it, suppress it, no matter what it is.

I am so far away with this. I find myself journeying and traveling from one place to another. There is someone here who has suffered with trouble here. I sense a condition as if I could not stand perfectly straight. My arms and hands seem to be weighed down with pain. It is not from you, but I sense that from the condition of the spirit who is attracted. It is an intimation to you to be very careful. I sense a condition as though a most perilous step—I can see you moving from right to left. It is not along the line of business we are speaking; it is not so much the health question. You do not know, perhaps, but you are strangely psychic, peculiarly so. You have endeavored to bring forth these conditions into the surroundings of your life, and I feel that they will come; but still I am journeying and I am traveling, as though I sensed the restlessness of the individual. To whom does this article belong?

"To me."

"Do you understand it?"

"Yes."

"I feel as though I wanted to say Lila."

"Yes."

You wish you may be settled. Oh, all the peculiar environments and conditions that are around you—they are so strange. One idea of religion—from that into another! This is a woman who has delved deeply into many of the social problems and explored different books and different religions until to-day you stand on a very peculiar ground, as though to say, "I am thinking for myself." Your hopeful condition will make that better. I want to say something about a daughter. "There shall be peace, and there will be," for often thoughts come to you from that daughter, and telepathic communication will assure you. Is it right in every way?

"Perfectly."

"Thank you."

After the messages Mme. Voight rendered the beautiful song, "Dry Those Tears," with Mr. McIntyre obligato. (Encored.)

The president introduced Mrs. Aber-Cam, the president of the society of Spiritualists in Jersey City, who spoke as follows:

Miss Gaule said this afternoon that she was made responsible for many things, and I am going to make her take a responsibility that perhaps she has not known before she carried. I do not believe there was ever a more bitter skeptic than myself. For twenty years I went everywhere, which led me to a great many places, and it remained for Miss Gaule to convince me of the truth. I attended one of her meetings and I came away from there knowing my friends could reach me. I have not the gift of inspirational speaking, and I am not a medium. But two years ago a little church was started in darkest Jersey City, and I was asked to be its president. I was overwhelmed. I said, "Certainly not. I am not worthy. I don't know enough." But they insisted, and I assumed the presidency two years ago, determined I would only draw the very best, that would instruct the people for the highest good. And whenever I get discouraged and cannot carry the work on any longer, I come to hear Margaret Gaule, and then I feel strong enough to take the whole of Jersey City on my shoulders, for I think in the whole world Miss Margaret Gaule is the greatest medium. If I could have any choice of gifts, it would be to comfort the sorrowing, and I would be glad to do so. I am glad to pay this public tribute to Miss Gaule.

Mss Gaule responded: "I am responsible for lots of joys and lots of sorrows!"

Mrs. Aber-Cam closed her address by reading the poem entitled "Some Time," by Mary Reilly Smith.

MRS. MILTON RATHBUN.

"THE WATER WITCH."

Some Startling Evidence in its Favor.

Number 917 of your valuable paper contains "Some Reflections," by Mr. Geo. Thomas, of Easton, N. Y., which bear the impress of sincerity, but unfortunately are not founded on fact.

Many years ago my father undertook to make sport and derision of "water-witching," and was greatly surprised to find that the witch hazel or peach crotch would turn in his hands in spite of his best efforts to prevent it so doing. He located living wells on the old home farm in the town of Lewiston, Niagara Co., N. Y., and in adjacent territory, and I never knew him to fail in locating a vein of water wherever the stick indicated. My uncle, living on an adjoining farm, also possessed the "gift" or ability to do the same, of which he was not aware until he tried to make derision of the mater.

One of our neighbors said he would have his well "just where he wanted it," irrespective of the claims of "water witches." He dug a well on the east side of his barn, and at a depth of nearly fifty feet he failed to find any water. My uncle, with a peach crotch, told him where to dig on the west side of the barn, and at a depth of eleven feet they found a living well that has not failed in over fifty years. Truly, "facts are the most stubborn things in existence."

Wendell Phillips said: "The chief element in obtaining an education is to get rid of our prejudices." I am getting rid of some of them. Haeckel, in "Riddle of the Universe," speaks of Henry Slade as "the clever American conjurer" who "imposed" upon Prof. Zollner and others at Leipsic, and further adds: "The fraud was afterward fully exposed; he was discovered to be a common impostor."

Twenty-five years ago my wife persuaded me to accompany her at a private seance with Dr. Slade. As a precaution, I purchased three slates on our way to Mr. Slade's parlors, and I was permitted to hold two of them together, with no other human hands touching them, and mesages were written between them, which I positively know were not written by mortal hands. Though the whole world assail him, I shall always bear witness in his favor.

In justice to the memory of an honest man, who was my loving, tender father, I write this in defense of the "Water Witch."

Tried and Acquitted.

An Excellent Medium, Mrs. Lydia Marquette, of New Castle, Pa., Passes Through the Fiery Ordeal of a Trial, and Her Mediumship Is Sustained.

Commonwealth of Pennsylvania Vs. Mrs. E. H. Marquette.—On the 2nd day of April, A. D. 1907, and at divers other times within two years last past, the said defendant, E. H. Marquette, unlawfully did pretend, for gain and lucre, to predict future events by cards, tokens the inspection of the head and hands of persons by any vesage and by consulting the movement of the heavenly bodies, and did unlawfully for gain and lucre, pretend to effect a purpose by spells, charms, necromancy and incantations (and did for lucre and gain pretend to tell future by other means than those aforesaid) at her residence, No. 39 Neshannoch avenue, New Castle, Pa., contrary to act of assembly in such case made and provided.

J. S. MARTIN, Complainant.

New Castle, Pa., June 28, 1970.

To the Editor:—The Spiritualists of New Castle, Pa., and vicinity, during the past two months, have been allowed to experience the presence, as it were, of a reincarnation of Cotton Mather, in the physical living entity of one Rev. J. S. Martin, a minister of the Reformed Presbyterian church of this city, who with others conspired to remove from our midst one of our Spiritual Mediums, Mrs. Lydia E. Marquette. One of those who assisted this modern Cotton Mather is the Rev. A. J Magill, who openly circulated around that Mrs. Marquette would surely be sentenced to the penitentiary for her misdeeds. This latter Rev. a United Presbyterian dominie. A third person who was instrumental in the persecution was Deaconess, Mrs. Mame Rice of Epworth M. E. Church. She seems to have been most directly instrumental in securing others of her sex to participate in this reactionary "reform" work. A fourth was Mrs. Rev. Stratton, the wife of a Croton avenue M. E. preacher.

This lady tried in every way possible to place Mrs. Marquette's mediumship into the same category as Necromancy or sorcery, or a pretended communion with the "dead."

(The evidence produced by the prosecution you will find in the various blue penciled items of the New Castle News, and Herald, sent you under separate cover.)

Among the Spiritualists of this and surrounding towns the following were selected to testify as to the genuineness of this woman's mediumship, and to claim for all true mediumship a place in our religion, comparatively the same as the Methodist prayer-meeting, or the catechetical lectures or studies of other churches, etc., and to speak of and testify that to our knowledge a medium never spoke to, or communed nor pretended to commune with the "dead," but with the "living spirits," all of whom are constantly with us if we but know.

This we were not permitted to do as the Judge sitting in quarter sessions court at the time ruled out very nearly all our testimony, claiming that religion had nothing to do with the case. The Judge did, however, allow the prosecution to show that according to their belief Mrs. Marquette practiced necromancy, thereby establishing (in their minds) it as a fact to the jury that Mrs Marquette had been demonstrating a "false doctrine," or had been practicing a false religion before the public of New Castle.

Our witnesses were the following:

Mrs. Wm. Becker, wife of ex-Sheriff Becker of this city, a resident of this community for over sixty years, and a staunch advocate of Spiritualism, for more than 20 years. Mrs. Jas. Peebles, wife of a retired merchant of this city, who carried on a successful business here for 40 years. Mrs. Peebles has enjoyed the pleasure of being a thorough Spiritualist for over five years, and is herself becoming very clairvoyant.

Miss Margaret Evans, a Spiritualistic investigator, and sincere advocate of its philosophy for several years. She is a young lady of culture and refinement.

Mr. Wm. Becker, although not a Spiritualist, gave his moral and intellectual support to our battle for victory, purely upon the principle of "Religious Toleration."

Mr. and Mrs. Frank Megown of Sharon, Pa., both of whom are highly respected by all liberal minds in their town, and Mrs. Hampsen of the same place, a widowed lady of purity and good repute, were among our witnesses.

Last, but not least, was our friend and co-worker, who, ever seems to be on the firing line of our progressive thought forces, and who, although of a rather mild disposition, would at all times rather fight than run when he knows it to be for the upbuilding of our dear cause—Rev. H. E. Boerstler, pastor of the West Side Spiritual Church of Columbus, O., and vice-president of the Ohio State Spiritual Association;

He was here to testify as to the character of Mrs. Marquette as a lady, he having known her for 16 years and was also going to testify as to his knowledge of her religion and the genuineness of her mediumship; but he had scarcely uttered a word before the court ruled him out from further testifying in the medium's behalf.

The court, after having heard the testimony of the prosecution, and after ruling out the evidence offered, left the question of guilt entirely open to the jury, who in just a few hours returned a verdict of "not guilty," which, thanks to the open minds of that jury, has given me courage to strive forward, with our Spiritual Banner in this community.

Several of our best speakers should come here while the iron is hot, and help uplift the banner of our cause until we have won the opponents if not their admiration.

The opposing forces to Spiritualism have planned their diabolical plot very well. Like a good general, they have combined their forces and have struck at our religious liberty at its weakest point. It seems, therefore, at least to the Spiritualists here, the duty of all interested to give their support to our cause, and if possible send into our town a speaker who can thoroughly explain our philosophy to an aroused people. Now is the time.

The reason I name this as the weakest point, is because, as all know, the laws of the commonwealth and the court practice here are not very salutary toward our cause, and we are dwelling in the very heart of commercialism, bustle and industry. There is scarcely a drone of any kind among us except such who are employed for that purpose, the people, in general being so busy at their various trades and business that their ethics and religion are almost entirely delegated to the preachers and the press. These two control the sentiment here—all but the silent monitor of the ego, the conscience. We have now aroused this conscience, and it is for all who love the cause to help convince these people.

Mrs Marquette did not make a specific charge for her readings, but accepted the offering that people gave her. The custom of the people established, fifty cents, and Mrs. Marquette became so used to receiving that sum that if a greater offering was made her she would return the amount over and above the 50 cents. She often held circles, at which I was a frequent attendant. In her circles she refused to receive any money whatsoever, claiming her circles were solely for the purpose of opening the consciousness of the people. We who are Spiritualists repudiate the testimony of the conspirators who testified against her, and we believe all who wish to can easily see that the purpose of the testimony was constructed as it was purely to drive this medium and spiritual phenomena from our midst and prevent the many from enjoying a communion with their loved ones.

The whole trouble with Mrs. Marquette was and still is, that her mediumship was and is so genuine that she became the "talk of the town," and therefore the "Ministerial Association," "Temperance Union," "The Country Detective," etc., made the move given in the News items sent your valuable paper.

Expressing the motive of these preachers, deaconesses and preachers' wives sociologically, I would say: "It was only a matter of Economic Determinism," by a body of "Reactionaries."

The attorney who defended Mrs. Marquette made a very able plea to the jury, and we commend him highly for the honesty and sincerity of this learned man. He defended Mrs. Marquette in his plea to the jury on her and our religious belief and our right under the Federal Constitution to enjoy the same.

(A fair exposition of his pleading is among the news items).

Yours for the truth and Spiritualism.

MRS. JOSEPHINE PEEBLES.

The Society of Spiritual Truth, Kansas City, Mo.

To the Editor:—All the Spiritual societies of Kansas City, Mo., excepting the one above mentioned, go under the name of "The Spiritual Church," while there are a great many people in this city who do not regard Spiritualism exclusively in the light of a "religion," but who attend these meetings because, until the organization of the Society of Spiritual Truth, there were no other spiritual meetings held in this city. But its success from the very start aroused a spirit of rivalry, to use a very mild term, and efforts were made to attract attendance to the Spiritual Church meetings, not characterized, however, by the most honorable means, and not attended with much success.

The fact was realized by many of the most prominent Spiritualists that a mere belief in the continuance of life beyond the grave, the return of spirits and their communion with mortals, and the assurance that no sulphurous flames awaited unrepentent sinners, did not satisfy all the needs of life; and that those who had these assurances and nothing more, might be among the meanest of mankind. There were others who felt there was something more in life that they needed.

They organized The Society of Spiritual Truth, realizing the fact that life is too full of opportunities for the unfoldment of man's higher nature and the enrichment of his life. It was reported that the members of it were "a godless set," "atheists," "infidels," and were holding their meetings on Sunday evenings, in which "religion" was ignored, and the Christian churches objected, and efforts were made to prejudice the people against it; but its meetings were always attended with increasing numbers.

At these meetings Mrs. Inez Wagner, the medium, is controlled by Dr. Lortz, who delivers lectures replete with good, sound, practical sense, dealing with the affairs that come into daily life, declaring that "Truth is truth, wherever found, on heathen or on Christian ground," explaining life, its purposes and duties.

A large and beautiful hall is secured, and good music—instrumental and vocal—is provided. After the lecture Mrs. Wagner gives platform tests of a remarkable character. Slips of paper are distributed among the audience, upon which questions are written addressed to some spirit friend and signed by the questioner. These are gathered and placed upon the stand. The medium is then blindfolded by some skeptic in the audience, who assures the people that it is impossible for the medium to see anything. From forty to sixty of these questions are answered, and in some instances the writer of the question is corrected by bringing to his or her recollection, by the communicating spirit, some long-forgotten event.

An adjournment to the first Sunday evening in September was declared by the president at the meeting on the 23d of June. At this meeting the people were favored by an eloquent lecture from Mrs. Laura Fixen, secretary of the Lily Dale camp, to an audience of nearly five hundred interested hearers.

Spiritualism is not a sect whose instincts are to be controlled by sectarians. It is too deep and too broad for a specialty; and its monopoly in the interests of those who want to manage it after the manner of the churches, is to be deprecated. All have an equal right to accept it in their own way; and to "cut and dry it" for the benefit of a few "expounders" is a serious mistake.

The Race Problem Must Be Solved, and that, too, from a Spiritualizing Standpoint—The Views of Henry Watterson.

The people of the United States (and when I say the people of the United States, I mean all the people, black and white, northern and southern) have no greater issue to meet, no larger problem to solve, than that which goes by the name of "the race question." The institution of African slavery is gone—let us all thank God for that!—but the African we have still with us. He is with us in ever-increasing numbers. He is here to stay.

There are bad white men and there are bad black men; there are foolish white men and there are foolish black men, and what are we going to do with them and about them?

This, our planet, would be heaven, indeed, if all of us were wise and good. But, if all of us were wise and good, why, each of us would be ten feet tall, and beautiful, and educated, and rich—above all, mark you, rich! None of us would have to work; just only to loll back in the shade of summer and eat watermelons, and to snuggle by the roaring log-heaps of winter and tell fairy tales, with angels to wait upon us. That is the promised Jubilo. I am afraid it is a good ways off yet. Meanwhile, both winter and summer most of us—very nearly all of us—have to work; and even the few who have nothing to do but sip custards and clip coupons, to play policy and to beat the races, are not the happiest. What, then, is best for us, black and white alike? For be sure the interest of one race is the interest of the other race, that neither can prosper if either suffers.

I must tell you, after forty years of experience and observation and reflection, that I think we began wrong. We put the cart before the horse. Four millions of poor black people, with some centuries of abject slavery and many ages of barbaric night behind them were not equal to using the freedom that came to them so suddenly and especially the ballot, with prudence or intelligence. How could they? I don't blame them in the least. On the contrary, I sometimes wonder at their self-restraint. As, during the sectional war, they were faithful servants, remaining at home and tilling the fields and taking care of the women and children, so, since the war, according to their lights, they have tried to be good citizens. I glory in every step of progress they have made—and they have made many strides—from that day to this. Temperamentally ever for the under dog—a crank about personal liberty, if I am a crank about anything—my heart goes out to the black man wherever I see him honestly struggling to raise his children to a condition better than his own.

The race question is a mystery. For the matter of that, life is a mystery. The negro—you will understand that I say negro as I would say Briton, or Egyptian, as a racial designation and not as a nickname—the negro is thought to be especially imitative. All of us are more or less imitative—particularly the ultra-smart set of high society—which, on the seaboard, imitates the little it knows about the English nobility, and, in the interior, whatever it can find out about the smart set of the seaboard. It is an unfortunate characteristic of imitation to take for its examples rather the bad than the good of whatever attracts its admiration or its envy. "Jess like white folks" is sometimes heard in colored circles of fashion—that is, among the colored smart set or the colored "four hundred." Now, for my part, I scarcely think much more of the colored "four hundred" than I think of the Caucasion "four hundred," who live for vanity and pleasure, and who, if they can't go to heaven in their automobiles, don't want to go at all!

Every shoemaker to his last, the saying has it, and that say I, each mother's son to his vocation, whatever it be. Men in their places are the men who stand.

"Honor and fame from no condition rise;
Act well your part—"

The lines may be something musty, but they are even truer now than when Pope wrote them, 200 years ago, amid class favoritism and caste distinction, uncontested and immovable. "You cannot make a silk purse out of a sow's ear," the familiar aphorism tells us. No more can you make a musician, or a poet, or a lawyer, or a doctor, out of material that was heaven-sent and earth-meant for blacksmithing, dray-driving and plowing.

All of us are creatures of evolution and education. The white race seems to have got along faster in the great eternal plan than the black races. Why, I cannot tell you. It is a simple fact, obvious to all of us, that, just as Europe and America are farther advanced in arts and arms than Africa, are the Europeans and Americans ahead of the Africans in the developments of modern culture. As this ought not to be the subject of vainglorious exaltation among the whites, it should not be considered or felt as either a humiliation or a reproach by the blacks. In case it should become so, the future would be dark indeed for both races. Each needs to grow in grace; but it is my belief that each can and will thus grow in grace in the south first of all and most of all, and within lines plainly fixed by God and nature, leading to the ultimate peace that passeth understanding, when the lion and the lamb shall lie down in harmony.

We may not escape our manifest destiny. Neither of us can get rid of the other. Schemes to that end, however ingenious, are wholly visionary. Since this is so, let us take account of what has been done these forty years of freedom.

The world has never witnessed any such progress from darkness to light as that which we see in those districts of the South where the negro has had a decent opportunity for self-development. Look at Jamaica—nearly a century of emancipation, the negro at a standstill; look at South Africa—riches piled on riches, the negro still a savage and less considered than the animals, yet it is England that prides herself on what she has done for freedom and the black man.

Let the negro go to any New England community and try to get employment. Barred on every hand; plenty of sentiment, but no work. There are regions north and west which never knew slavery and were a unit for the union where the negro is refused admittance. He is told to move on. He is what the president described the other day as "an undesirable citizen." Turn southward; plenty of work and wages for all who bring tranquil minds and willing hands. Bad people, slothful people, get on nowhere; but nowhere on the habitable globe has the liberated slave fared so well, nowhere has he so fair an outlook, as in the southern States of North America.

Why? Because we know one another and because, no matter what anybody says to the contrary, there is a common bond of association between us. Never can the white man of the South forget what the black man did during a war waged for his freedom; and what he might have done. Never should the black man of the South forget that he is the weaker in the race toward perfection, and for a long time must look to the white man for help of many kinds. It is through these reciprocal obligations and interests that the two races will reach an institutional system of living and doing entirely satisfactory to both.

Nothing is to be expected from the rushing hot-house process, or from any artificial arrangement; everything is to be hoped from nature left to herself, unvexed by misdirected political considerations, uninfluenced by outsiders teaching false philosophies—simple justice and kindness presiding over the ordinary laws of common honesty and common sense.

The negro in Africa has scarcely burst the chrysalis of the primitive state of man. In America he is yet in a state of racial childhood. As he realizes this the faster he will grow, the quicker he will learn, the sooner he will reach his racial manhood. In less than half a century he has done wonders. Before the century we have just begun is half over he will have done greater still. He has yet, and upon an extensive scale, to learn habits of method and order, habits of tenacity and acquisition, habits of sustained industry and sobriety, without which no race—white, red, brown, or black—or any individual man, can get on and prosper.

He is a bad white man who will not help his neighbor black man when that neighbor black man shows the spirit to help himself. He is a bad black man who cherishes hatred in his heart against the white man because he is a white man. He is a foolish black man who thinks because the mirage of social equality, which would prove a curse rather than a blessing, is denied him that the white man hates him. Social questions the world over create their own laws and settle themselves. They cannot be forced. It is idle anywhere for anybody to contest or quarrel with them. No man should want to go where he is not wanted; true, self-respecting men dismiss the very thought of it, going their own way, hoeing their own row, and giving praise to God that their happiness is within themselves and beyond the reach of any man, be he white or black, king or vassal!

Then let the negro forward each to his appointed task no bitterness in the heart, the love of God supreme, but this love of God measured by man's love for man, even as it was revealed to the good Arabian sleeper in that exquisite poem of Leigh Hunt, with its equal blending of religion and humanity:

"Abou Ben Adhem, may his tribe increase,
Awoke one night from a deep dream of peace,
And saw within the moonlight in his room,
Making it rich and like a lily in bloom,
An angel writing in a book of gold;
Exceeding peace had made Ben
Adhem bold,
And to the presence in the room he said:
'What writest thou?' The vision raised its head
And with a look made of all sweet accord,
Answered, 'The names of those who love the Lord.'
'And is mine one?' said Adhem.
'Nay, not so,'
Replied the angel. Abou spoke more low,
But cheerly still, and said: 'I pray thee, then,
Write me as one that loves his fellow men.'
The angel wrote and vanished. The next night
It came again with a great wakening light,
And showed the names whom love of God had blessed,
And, lo! Ben Adhem's name led all the rest."

IS THE EARTH CRUEL?

Mother Earth! Thy children play,
Heed not thy warnings day by day—
A part of thee in every clime,
They gambol on the shores of time
Trusting, confiding in thy toil—
At last they mingle with thy soil,
They course thy waters from shore to shore,
Thy lands they burden o'er and o'er.
Thy zephyrs smile;
Swifter winds beguile;
Thy dimpled rivers swell;
Thy torrents plunge pell-mell;
Thy tidal waves
Sweep thy offspring to wat'ry graves.

In Arc of Noe thyself then stood,
Didst not thou drench thyself in flood?
Thy cyclone's wrath
Leaves desolation in its path;
Thy simoon's blighting breath
Sears its victim unto death;

Thy belching mountain peaks
Dire destruction speaks;
Thy torrid zones
Lie bleeching bones!
Thy desert wastes far-spread,
No living thing—but dead.

The storms at sea
The staunchest craft must flee!
Thy subtle seismic quake
Dost giant cities overtake,
A continent didst thy woe submerge,
Sang swirling seas an angry dirge.

Thy very self in trembling rage
Has terrored man from age to age.
Bounteous Earth, can'st cruel be,
To thy children, land or sea?
On thy bosom let life remain,
And joy to man forever reign.

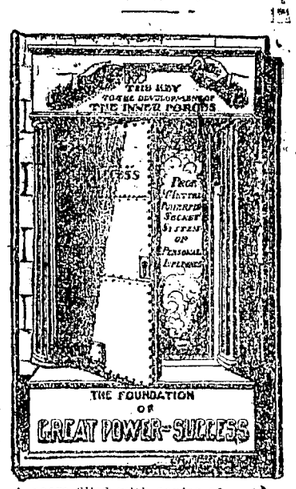
Who Wrote This Wonderful MYSTERIOUS BOOK?



Tells of Startling Secrets Jealously Guarded for Ages by Adepts.

Reveals the Marvelous Effects Produced in the Minds and Bodies of Sick and Unsuccessful People Through the Use of a Strange Force That Has Been Overlooked by the Public for Centuries Past.

Shows in Simple Language and Vivid Pictures How Men and Women May Cure Diseases and Habits as if by Magic and Wield a Powerful Influence Over the Minds and Lives of Others.

Why Some Succeed Where Others Fail.

Peculiar Arrangement by Which 100,000 Copies Are to Be Given Away by Mail—Absolutely Free.

A room filled with copies of a strange and mysterious book that contains startling and almost unbelievable evidence of psychic achievements is on exhibition at an institution in New York City. Copies of it have been read with amazement; speculation is rife among the author's friends as to who wrote it; some contend that no mind of his age could describe the possibilities of these carefully guarded systems of the wise old sages and secretive psychic adepts in such simple language and wonderful photographs.

Professor Frederick T. McIntyre, who claims authorship of the work, offers to send a copy free to any person who will, in his own handwriting, send the following peculiar lines to him:

"I want power of mind,
Force and strength in look,
If my writing is satisfactory
Please send me the book."

Professor McIntyre says that he can tell by examining the specimens of handwriting he receives just what the one who penned them is best fitted for in life; what the writer's strong and weak characteristics are, and whether the writer will succeed in using to advantage the many powerful systems of personal influence and healing described in the book. Should the writer be sick or run down physically or mentally, and give the particulars of the trouble in a letter, Professor McIntyre claims he can tell what to do to get well quickly. He does not wish to send this book to any person who would use the system of personal control for any other than honorable purposes free. Like Andrew Carnegie, he believes in the distribution of valuable books.

This book is full of startling explanations and strange pictures proving that any one can master, in a short time, the power to control and sway the minds of others. It describes the strange phenomena of Psychic and Hypnotic Influence; Mystic Healing; Psycho and Suggestive Therapeutics; Personal magnetism, and a combined, simple system of reading the characters of others, though thousands of miles away. It gives you the key to the development of the inner or dormant forces of concentration, force of character, will power, memory, determination, ambition, enthusiasm, inspiration, continuity of thought and the ability to throw off the evil effects of diseases and habits through an inner, subjective power, as the Hindoos banish disease and despondency.

It is, indeed, one of the most amazingly interesting books of the age, beaming with interest from cover to cover, and all who receive free copies of it can be thankful. It points out the road to financial and social success; it reveals astonishing facts that have been eagerly sought by the public for many years; proofs that almost carry one back to the days of great miracles.

If you wish a free copy of this wonderful book sit down and write the above verse and send it to Professor F. T. McIntyre, Dept. 1664, No. 126 West Thirty-fourth street, New York, N. Y.

All who write will receive it; no one will be disappointed; it will be sent by mail, postage paid and absolutely free.

It will write in full sight—yes, in full sight and it will write more, write better, write easier and keep on doing so longer than any other typewriter.

African Occult Doings.

They Border on the Miraculous, and Illustrate the Universality of Occult Forces, or the Power of Ascended Spirits, as Set Forth in the Occult Review by Ojo Kulekun.

Interior African occultism in the detection of crime may be illustrated by reference to another cult of a very weird nature; it is one which is very rare, and of a high order amongst the tribes. The mystics who practice it are held in great honor and reverence. The aid of this system of detection is generally requisitioned in cases of secret assassination or fatal poisoning, to ascertain the perpetrators of the deed and bring them to justice. On the occurrence of such crime, members of this mystic cult are sent for. It sometimes happens that the abode of these mystics is several miles removed from that of the scene of the crime, this high and dread occultism being professed only by a select few in a very large circuit of country.

The corpse awaits the arrival of the mystic detectives; it is needed by them in the ceremonies, and can be buried only after these have been accomplished. The detectives work in bands; and not less than four of them will be engaged in the work of detection. On their arrival they repair to the house wherein the corpse is laid; and closing every avenue of entrance, so that none may surprise them, they spend the greater part of an hour in rites and ceremonies over the corpse. What these are none but the initiates know; the secrets are more jealously guarded than life itself. Concluding their functions, they at last open the doors, and calling for the next-of-kin, they demand a complete set of garments of the deceased, together with his every-day head-gear (usually a woollen or cloth cap). They then quit the house, and leaving the town or village, take one of the wood-paths leading to the forest; entering this, they penetrate to its deepest recess, and there engage in preparing what may be called their "medium."

What this exactly is none know but the mystics—probably matter belonging to the vegetable kingdom forms the greater part of its composition, such as leaves, herbs and vine-like growths. The result is an object shaped into the form of a human being, with the outward parts complete. This is clothed in the garments and head-gear belonging to the deceased. They next construct a rude litter of light wood, whereon the figure is laid; the whole is then lifted up and borne on the heads of two of the junior mystics.

They retrace their steps to the village, and, as they near it, one of them sounds the approach by blowing on a hunting horn. This is the signal to assemble, in preparation for the ordeal. The detectives, arrived in the village, carrying their figure, halt in the large open space to be found in every African village in front of the hut of the headman, in which space the dances take place on moonlight nights. Already the whole population are assembled to witness the trial, the proceedings in which are as follows:

The chief of the band addresses the people and elders. He alludes to the object of their gathering, he refers to the deceased, extols his good qualities, dilates on the enormity of the crime that has been committed and on the wickedness of the perpetrator. He concludes by invoking the Supreme Being, soliciting His help in their efforts to avenge the innocent and bring to punishment the guilty. At the conclusion of his speech the headman of the village responds on behalf of himself and his people. He welcomes the band, in the name of all; he prays for the help of the Supreme Being in their efforts for the good of the commonwealth, and concludes by asking them to start on their work of detection.

The chief mystic then selects two of the assembled youths. These must be boys, not yet arrived at puberty. He transfers the litter with the figure from the heads of his associates to those of these two boys; it is always a light load. The medium, resting now on the heads of "Innocents," the ceremonyf of invocation begins; it is done in the sight and hearing of all; yet can no one but the initiates understand the purpose of the mysterious words spoken.

The Idea is this:— The figure shaped in human form—i. e., the medium stretched upon the litter—represents the personality of the deceased; hence it is dressed in the garments. The disembodied spirit of the murdered man is now invoked; and the understanding is, that he will either control, influence, or possess the medium, and thus openly make known his mind by outward signs. In this way, when the medium is addressed it answers the same way a man expresses either Yes or No, by different noddings of the head. Only, in this instance, the mysterious force sways not only the figure but the litter on which it is resting, and both the heads of the bearers, independently of their wills. A movement forward and backward, slowly, three times; this means, "Yes." And, when the answer which the spirit would give is "No," independently of the wills of the bearers, and more, in spite of the same, the force again acts, this time swaying the whole connection of bearers' heads, litter and medium, to right and left, slowly, three times.

I must here state that, prior to the summoning of these detectives for the discovery of the secret murderer, recourse has been had to one of the previous systems described in Part I. The Diviner-Detective—one of the cult of the "Finders-out"—has been on the scene, and by his system of divination has determined the personality of the assassin. The latter, having been arrested, has been charged with the crime, but has flatly denied it; and therefore recourse is had to the most conclusive way of ascertaining the truth, by sending for the detectives of this weird cult who are now on the scene. In a case of Life, the spirit of the deceased himself must point out his murderer.

Now everything is ready for the ordeal. The culprit indicated before by the Diviner-Detective, and who all this while has been in charge of the authorities, is brought forward. But not yet will he be subjected to the test. As in the proceedings of the Palm-Oil cult, some of those tacitly declared innocent of the crime are first subjected to it;;; i. e., two or three of the villagers present come forward at the invitation of the chief of the detectives, as volunteers, to undergo the test.

Let us say the volunteers are three in number; one of them is called forth by the chief detective, and is stationed at a spot about ten or twelve feet in front of the bearers of the medium, exactly in a straight line with them. The detective then turns to the medium and addresses it; rather, he addresses the spirit of the deceased, believed then to be present amongst them. He salutes him with respect, and humbles himself in his presence. He admits the spirit's superiority, in that he is himself blind and knows nothing, whilst the spirit in his new and higher existence, is qualified with all high intelligence. For the help of himself and the commonwealth, he asks him to point out, in the usual way, the wicked one who secretly murdered him. He reminds him again, that, whilst they of the world are in total darkness and ignorance as to the matter, he, the spirit, is well acquainted with the same; therefore, he humbly solicits his help, so that no secret murderer may be harbored in their midst. He concludes by a second invocation of the spirit, finishing with a long and solemn murmuring of some mystic words.

Ending this ceremony, he then faces the first volunteer, standing on a spot ten or twelve feet away from the bearers, and bids him be ready. He once more approaches the medium; and standing very close to it, pronounces these words in a loud voice, so as to be heard by all the assembled people distinctly—"Reveal unto-us, O! thou with whom there is nothing that is longer secret, who is he, the assassin? Is he the one now standing before thee? Show unto us by signs."

He ends; and as the people are gazing silently, there is a movement perceptible; the heads of the bearers—outside their own wills—together with the litter and medium, bend slowly to the right and left three times.

This sign indicating a negation, the volunteer is sent away. The second and the third volunteer next undergo the test, and their innocence being manifested by the medium, the business of confirming the "Finding" of the Diviner-Detective in relation to the crime must now take place. Lead-forth the accused to the spot whereon had stood the "volunteers," the chief detective addresses him in the hearing of all; he exhorts him to confess his crime, as that will serve him better than pursuing a policy of unavailing denial, since the ordeal soon to take place will reveal the exact truth. The culprit, face to face with the weird ceremony, may think better of it and confess. In such cases his admission ends the matter, for native law is then put in operation. But when the accused is of tougher metal and continues to deny stoutly, the ordeal is proceeded with forthwith.

The chief detective, taking his former stand by the medium, asks the usual question. He has scarcely ended when an unusual animation is observed to possess the medium; the heads of the bearers, with the litter and medium there on, take a sudden lurching movement forward and backward— bending forward and going backward—slowly, three times. A muffled sound, expressive of amazement, surprise and awe, escapes the assembled multitude. The Affirmative Sign has been given by the medium as its answer.

But this is not all; whilst the people are yet lost in amazement, the chief detective again addresses the medium as follows:

"We have seen thy sign, O! wronged one, answering to the query, and confirming the assertion that he who now stands before thee is truly the murderer. Oh, help us again; and, in place of a sign, perform a plain and direct action conclusive of the fact that this accused person is thy secret murderer."

He has hardly uttered these words, when, as if they had been subject to some powerful wave of electricity, the bearers, who all this while have been standing still as statues—but for the "motions" of their upper parts when giving the signs of negation or affirmation—feel themselves galvanized. Having no will in the matter, the mysterious force impels them; they rush headlong full tilt straight against the accused, bearing him down with them. The accused may be a powerful man whom the combined strength of eight such boys cannot move an inch; yet, in this case, two boys that he could hold together in one hand, and with the other belabor to his heart's satisfaction, bear him down at a charge.

As all three fall in a heap, there is an excited cry from the assembled villagers. The thing is conclusive; the man in charge is the murderer; the spirit has supplemented his sign by his action; the detection is accomplished. The Diviner-Detective was correct in his "finding." The other detectives now approach; and, securing the medium, together with the litter, they are taken in charge by two who will carry them back to the forest, and, destroying both figure and litter, return to the village with the garments and cap of the deceased. These are handed to the relatives of the departed person. The youths, relieved of their weird load, gladly escape to their fellows, and for a time are the heroes of the place, receiving many presents, for only lads of pluck will consent to do this service.

The culprit is handed over to the authorities, to be dealt with according to native law. In most cases he now confesses the crime, giving all the details; but it matters not. The result of his ceremony of detection is conclusive of everything. And finally, the detectives, after receiving high kudos and rich gifts, retire to their place of abode.

The Healing Art.

Let us now deal with another section of the Occult in Africa; this time it is in relation to the healing art. The negro doctors of the interior accomplish at times wonderful results, that where the Western doctor thinks that only amputation of a limb can do his patient any good, the negro doctor can heal the limb so completely, that it will still be of service to the individual. Let us look into the following case. A woodman was felling a tree, using one of the Sheffield hatchets manufactured in thousands for the African trade. By some misadventure, the keen edge of the axe missed the wood and landed on his lower leg, midway between the knee and the ankle-bones. Being a strong man, and hitting with all his might, the blade cut clear through the bone and beyond, all but severing the lower limb; the lower extremity adhered only by a thin strip of the back flesh hardly six inches across. The man was made to remain where the accident happened, his companions helping to lay him down comfortably on the soft grass, with the all but severed member gently and easily placed so as to cause him as little discomfort as possible. This done, they made all haste in securing the services of a specialist.

This great man questions his callers as to the nature of the mishap, and having been informed, sends them back with an injunction not to remove the wounded man from the spot on any account whatever. After the departure of the callers, he sets about preparing his medicines. He hastens to the forest, collects his herbs, and digs out of the earth his roots; he then returns home; and if he can get a young chicken—not more than six days old—either out of his own stock or that of his neighbors, he secures the same. He cleans his mortar and his wooden pestle, and he prepares to compound his medicine. First he throws into the mortar the live chicken, adding the herbs and roots. The chicken being thus covered, he begins beating up the whole, pounding it with the pestle so as to reduce the various ingredients into a pulpy mixture. After manufacturing this he transfers it from the mortar into another vessel; he next cuts up strips of coarse cotton, country-made clothes, to use as bandages; and, lastly, selecting some sticks to serve as splinters, with these things he hastens to the place where the wounded man awaits him. Getting someone to assist, he brings together the two portions of all but severed limb, taking care that the bone fits edge to edge where the severance took place. After thus getting the parts into union, he is helped by his assistants to keep them firmly held together in position, whilst he prepares his mixture and then proceeds to the dressing.

He lays thickly all over the limb—from the very knee to the ankle—the mixture which he has prepared; he next wraps up the whole limb, using the strips of cloth as bandages over the application. Then, adjusting the splinters in the best positions he binds them together with cords. The dressing is now over, and the wounded man is gently carried home, particular care being given to the maimed limb, that no rough shaking or handling shall disturb the "union" of the parts. Arriving at his home, the doctor directs the laying down of his patient, seeing that he occupies a soft pallet-bed on the ground; before leaving, he enjoins on the patient and his relations the most absolute non-molestation of the limb. In the place where he has been laid, there he must continue without any shiftings or changes for fully six days. During this period the limb must be untouched by anyone, and the same dressing is to hold during all that space. The doctor now returns home, promising to put in appearance on the seventh day, to perform the next act in his work of healing the leg. He is not necessary before that time.

About the fourth or fifth day of the dressing, tiny worms begin to show themselves all over the limb, working their way to the light from underneath the bandage-folds; they appear about the splinters, and from there fall to the ground. By the sixth day, they literally swarm all over the limb, giving both the patient and his helpers a rather trying time. On the seventh day the doctor arrives; and, undoing both splinters and bandages, he next peels off the limb the dried and caked "mixture." The limb is exposed to view, and is found to present the appearance of a whole member, but for numerous small orifices on the surface of the shin. Through these orifices the tiny worms had made their way from within the limb to the outside. The several parts hold together firmly, but, as the "cementing" is not quite perfect, the limb must be handled with much care. It is straight and compact-looking already, but it is not strong enough to uphold the trunk of its owner, so that it is not yet fit for use. Once more the doctor applies the mixture, which he has prepared and brought with him; he uses the bandages, and ends the dressing by putting on the splinters firmly held in position by cords. This second dressing is to serve for another period of six days, during which it should be allowed to remain on the limb absolutely untouched. For the first four days the worms continue to be still in evidence, forcing their way from under the folds of the bandages, and swarming all over the limb, eventually falling to the earth; during the remaining two days, they are seen no more. On the seventh day again, the doctor is on the spot; as before, he bares the limb, when a wonderful improvement is observed. The little openings have healed, and where seven days before the orifices were to be seen, now only small dots mark their places. All the worms having escaped from within the limb—by the action of the mixture applied to it—the outlets quickly heal. The limb as a whole looks healthier than it did after the first application; it seems to be in almost natural health; yet it is not strong enough for immediate use, notwithstanding that the "cementing" of the once divided bone is now complete.

The patient can at last be lifted from the spot where he has been lying, and his pallet-bed spread out on another site; but the lifting must be done very gently and under the direction of the doctor. On this new spot he is to lie for another six days, not stirring hand or foot; and the damaged limb is to rest full-stretched-out on the pallet-bed. The treatment is also varied;; the doctor has brought with him a flask containing some medicinal fluid of an oily nature. Pouring out some into the hollow of his hand, he rubs it all over the limb, beginning from the knees right down to the ankle, past this, right to the tips of the toes and all under the foot, rubbing the sole as well. There is one point worthy of notice in connection with this rubbing; it must always begin from the knee, and descend the limb to the toe-extremities; it is always a downward movement; never an up-and-down rubbing.

"THE SECRET KEY."

Abstract of a Lecture Delivered by Mrs. S. B. Seip, of Portland, Ore. —Reported by Rebecca Rowland.

Through and by the spirit of the Father we are permitted to meet with you again, in what we hoped to be the sweetest of spiritual unions, with the overshadowing power of the spirit surrounding and throwing about us a clearer perception and insight into these wonderful truths, this wonderful light, the light that shines for all; the light of the soul, the light of the Spirit, God, in which dwells the secret power of man.

We wish to present to-night for our mutual consideration this question: Where may we find the secret key that unlocks the sacred and spiritual nature of man, that we may attain to these spiritual gifts so much coveted, and realize, to some extent, our higher aspirations.

When we have learned the power of the soul, then we are better prepared to understand the special gifts bestowed to each faculty in man.

We are beginning to realize the great work to be done for those who start out on the road to spiritual unfoldment and spiritual freedom. There is yet much practical work to be done by those who seek spirit and soul culture. We have been moving along through the dark ages, as it were, where we have been afraid of speaking or manifesting anything in advance of the restricted scientific agencies.

But old things are swiftly passing away, and the new order of things is rapidly coming to the front.

This light is not something that is yet to be, or something beyond our comprehension, but it SOMETHING that ALREADY is. NOW is the time for us to open our soul and drink in wonderful light, as does the beautiful flower the sunshine.

We know spirit force is real and tangible. If we are the chosen people, if we are the torch-bearers of this wonderful truth, let us uncover our light to the world, and manifest through the voice of the soul this, our great mission, and message to the children of men.

We have had sufficient proof of the power of spirit and the continuity of life to enlist ourselves in the progress a little further along on the way. We know that death does not end all, nor mean forgetfulness, or lack of love on the part of those gone from the physical form. All these we know. We know there's but a "thin veil between us" and those gone before. We know that many take a very active part in our earthly career and affairs of this life. All these things we know, and in consequence of this knowledge the heart cries out for more knowledge, more wisdom, and for more freedom.

The yearning for more fills and thrills every fiber in our being. Then we turn and ask: How, just how, may we each attain, this unfoldment of the spirit perception within our own organism, that some one of these gifts of the spirit may become yours; may become mine. But just where to enter this great realm of spiritual silence, this secret and sacred arcana, and pluck from the Father's mansion this key that unlocks the choice gift of the spiritual nature of man, the soul, which, when once gained, brings us to our own, and its revelations teach us the real, true faith in Christ, until we may commune with our guardian angel, who prepares the way and makes possible the communion with the spirit and the angel world, where dwells this light, the Christ.

These are the questions that fill the hearts of men, that are asked on every hand. If we could just touch this great question, as if it were a something to open at our touch, and reveal all its intricate mechanism, how easy all the world of knowledge and wisdom would be attained. But to understand ourselves more intelligently, and unravel to some extent this part of our lives, we must begin at the beginning. The substance of existence, spirit, soul, God. Out of its depths of knowledge comes every manifestation.

Only by knowing something of this can we know where to find the key that unlocks the spiritual nature of man.

Our theme should then be that which is at once the supreme subject and object of culture, and the necessary basis of all religion and science, for it is the substance of existence, the soul universal and individual of humanity. Only when we know something of the nature of this can we know what we ourselves are, or what we have it in ourselves to become. For our potentialities necessarily depend upon the substance whereof we are made.

In the soul of man dwells discernment and spiritual perception. Unfold your interior thinking. Prayer for good and deeper insight into these intuitive gifts reveals the knowledge and wisdom of this bond between God and man; and thus we learn that the soul of man must be singled out from the entanglements of external life, and rise above—even in this life—the dogmas, doubts and fears of the flesh, and the light, as bright as it can shine from within, together with the guardian angel, will lead us up and onward, until we gain possession of the key that opens this great spiritual nature of man, where dwells the Christ that waits to speak through every human breast.

We then no longer wander aimlessly searching in the desert of doubt. We know we have come face to face with our own. We know we stand on safe and solid ground.

When science penetrates the arcana of this limited world, and standing below the dome of the unknowable, it says: We have reached thee, thou immortal evidence, but we see that thou art just beyond, we want proof. Intuition, the soul, lifts her dove-like wings over the broad waters and breaks from the tree of knowledge one peaceful branch of faith and bears it back to the ark with her. That ark, my dear friends, is our spiritual reason resting in the soul of man; and while science is vainly seeking for proof, intuition, the soul, has plucked both the leaf and the blossom.

Friends, would you win this prize? It is not won without a price. We cannot ascend this ladder with a halting stride, or with a slippery slide. We must ascend this ladder with a firm step. Do what is right, with all our might. Put down the wrong, in spite of the throng.

Choose for ourselves the infinite rod,
If we would have all power of a loving God.

And now we must say to every cherished heart, to every outstretched hand, know that when the heart is led only and alone by the soul, then, and only then, is the true Christ known. The spirit around us, above and below, is all concentrated in the center of God's child on this earth below; and knowledge of self, my friends, through the voice of the soul, will lead us through the gateway of the portals of our home, where the soul's conscious oneness with eternity's wholeness will at last find its blessedness through its universal perfectness." Lake Pleasant Camp Meeting.

I have just returned from a visit to this famous camp. I am surprised at the rapid erection of new cottages.

There are over one hundred of the former cottages, which escaped the fire.

Now there are thirteen new cottages in process of erection or finished.

Among the campers building new cottages are Frank Bickford, Mr. Waterhouse, A. Fales, Mr. Jordan, Mr. Booth, Frank Fletcher, Edwin Putnam, Mr. Wheeler, Mrs. Jackson, Mr. Fairbanks, Mr. Wilbur.

Postmaster Henry has completed a new store and postoffice at the bridge.

Mr. Carbee, of Boston, is preparing to build a cottage.

There are some seventy-five rooms now ready and furnished for guests.

Hotel Home Comfort, in the park, with a large annex, has numerous rooms for gents and an excellent dining table.

Grove House, on the Highlands, will accommodate many.

Some of the cottages will be fitted for light housekeeping for guests.

The Floyd cottage, in the park, has been nicely prepared and it soon will be for rent.

The water plant is in order so all can have running water in their homes.

People need not hesitate about coming to camp, as rooms and board are ample for a large number.

The programs for the meetings are ready and can be obtained of clerk A. P. Blinn (enclosing stamp), at Lake Pleasant, Mass.

The spacious temple is saved, so the meetings can be held as usual.

Preparations for the Children's Lyceum have been completed and the little folks will be well cared for by the conductors, assisted by Geo. Cleveland.

The camp debt has been largely reduced by the insurance money received. If the bondholders will now evince their love for the cause by accepting fifty cents on the dollar, the whole debt can be canceled.

Ex-president Dailey and family are settled for the season in one of the Haslam's cottages, and Mr. Haslam and her family are in another.

There is a demand for lots on the Highlands—one of Mr. Dailey's having been sold.

President Churchill has taken the Alexander cottage, and is actively at work perfecting the arrangements for the coming meeting.

Clerk Blinn is in constant demand for information, circulars and general help for the campers. He is justice of the peace and can write and execute deeds for those who wish to buy lots.

J. Clegg Wright will arrive August 15, or before, and conduct his classes as usual for a number of days.

For dates of speakers, see the circulars. They are: President Churchill, Nettie Holt Harding, Alice M. Whall, Tillie U. Reynolds, Albert P. Blinn, Carrie E. S. Twing, Geo. W. Kates, Zaida B. Kates, W. A. Hall, Edgar W. Emerson and May S. Pepper.

Mrs. Twing expects to remain at camp some three weeks. She will come August 6.

The public test mediums employed by the association are Tilley Reynolds, Alice Whall, Nettie Harding, Zaida Kates, Edgar Emerson and May Pepper.

A history of Lake Pleasant has been issued by the Star Publishing Company, of Springfield, Mass., which will be on sale at the camp, as well as The Progressive Thinker. This book of 88 pages, with illustrations, narrates the history of the camp for 1874 to 1907, inclusive, and gives a full description of the great fire of April 25, 1907. Price, 30 cents; postage 3 cents.

There are already many campers on the grounds, and the prospect is good (from the large number of letters of inquiry received by the officers) that there will be a satisfactory attendance for the season of 1907. Visitors will do well to come early so that they can have more rooms from which to select.

Come to Lake Pleasant. You need not stay away for fear of want of accommodations. If there should be an overflow, tents for lodging and catering will be put up rapidly.

Herbert Streeter, at the camp, will have a stock of tents to let. Life in a tent, in the still remaining ample grove at Lake Pleasant, will be delightful in the warm, sunny weather of July and August, which generally prevails.

Come early and enjoy the pine-laden air, the delicious water, the pure food from the farms, the fresh berries from the hills, and the comforting and uplifting gospel of the best religious philosophy on earth.

BEREAVEMENT.

No faith is strong enough to heal
The broken links in friendship's chain;
No hope so bright that we can feel
Our loss is but eternal gain.

No power we know can heal the heart
That ruptured ties have caused to ache;
"No balm in Gilead" soothes the smart
That Death and separation make!

What tho' there comes from further shore
A message from departed friend;
It but reminds us o'er and o'er,
Our union here is at an end!

A solace it may be to know
The vanished partner of our joys
Has entered higher spheres, to grow
Away from earthly life's alloys!

Yet faith and hope and fond belief
Cannot suffice to dry our tears,
And banish loneliness and grief,
When loved companion disappears!

"Oh, Death, thy sting" is ever here;
"Oh, grave! thy victory" is won;
When forms of friends we hold most dear
Dissolve, and are forever gone!

YOUR FORTUNE TOLD FREE

My Advice May Mark the Turning Point in Your Life—Unlock Closed Doors Leading to Avenues of Usefulness—Turn Defeat Into Victory.

Knowledge is Power. To know yourself and the times when you can make the most of your inherent powers is to become the Architect of your own Destiny. This information can be secured by you.

You can know how to plan for weeks, months, years ahead. Your life is not the Product of Luck. Success should attend your efforts if they are guided by Astrology. You should be in the possession of the reading I offer to send you free.

Sometimes all goes wrong with you. Forces beyond yourself seem to conspire against you. Darkness and gloom accompany your steps. At other times your plans do not miscarry. Everything that you put in motion works smoothly. Your pathway is strewn with roses. The mysterious reason for both these conditions may be known by you.

At the time of your birth there were certain planets occupying certain positions. Their influence was felt during your babyhood and will be felt to the end of your career. Astrology, as interpreted by myself, takes cognizance of the various positions of these planets and that knowledge may be obtained by you.

A Reading of your Life will demonstrate my ability. You will be astonished and surprised that a perfect stranger can know you so well. The information conveyed will describe you to yourself in a manner that will astonish you.

You, in writing to me, are communicating with one who has made Astrology a Life Work. All that could enrich my knowledge of it has been taken advantage of. I have visited Rome, Athens, Palestine and elsewhere to fully equip myself for my Mission of Helpfulness. Institutions of learning have honored me with Membership and have listened to my lectures. Years of experience, gained while seking to guide thousands of persons, have enlarged my knowledge, giving me the power to be of the best value to my clients.

By my system you can know the kind of person for you to have advantageous relationship with. The seasons that may be used with great profit to yourself will be indicated. You will be shown what will be best for your health.

As you desire to succeed in the affairs of men, of business, of love, of family, of society, of honor and of usefulness, you should be sensible and write me, confidentially at once.

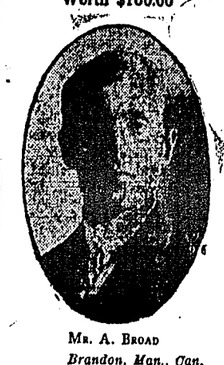
You know of persons high on the Roll of Fame who are frequently consulting Astrology when they wish to speculate or to embark in new enterprises. This same Science is at your disposal. Are you "wise?" Will you seek its help or will you continue to be outstripped by those who are no brainier than you, but who know what to do and when to do it. That is why they win.

Three letters of gratitude are here printed. While all letters are confidential and are so considered these people were so grateful that they insisted upon recommending me to others. What I have done for others is an assurance of what may be done for you. Your life may be cheered and benefited because my advice is given you.

Everything You Predicted in My Horoscope Came to Pass as Accurately as Clock Work.

Miss Bertha Axt

Newark, N. J. Feb. 11, 1907.



Dear Mr. Postel:

My marriage took place just as you predicted and I am the happiest woman in the world. In following your advice, I married the only man to make life a grand success for me. I feel that you are the one really great Astrologer to whom the American people should turn for advice and counsel. Everything you predicted in my Horoscope came to pass as accurately as clock work. My friends are all sending to you for their Horoscopes.

Sincerely your friend and patron,

Bertha Axt.

Says His Horoscope is Worth $100.00

Mr. A. Broad

Brandon, Man., Can. April 8, 1907.

Prof. Postel,

My Dear Sir:

*My horoscope is the best instrument of guidance that I have ever had put in my hands. * * * I would not take a hundred dollars for the information you have given me, unless I was sure that I would get another one as accurate as this one. * * * I feel as though it is my duty to help my fellow men along, and on these grounds I will agree to answer any inquiries upon receipt of a two-cent stamp to cover postage.*

I remain,

Yours very truly,

Says She Followed My Advice and Secured a Position at a Much Higher Salary Than Anticipated.

Miss Bergliot Horne

Lynchburg, Va. March 1, 1907.

Prof. A. H. Postel,

New York, N. Y.

I write to inform you that I am indeed thankful that I received my Horoscope from you just when I did. I followed your advice and succeeded in securing a position at a much higher salary than I anticipated. I consider the Horoscope worth hundreds of dollars to me and wish you much success in your grand work.

I took the trip to Europe and many things happened just as you said.

Sincerely yours,

Bergliot Horne.

Some have written me because they were curious. My reading has convinced them. They are now in constant consultation with me. They are now most willing to be guided by me.

When you write state the day, month and year of your birth. Also sex; if single, widow or widower. It does not matter what your religion, your position in life, the ordeals you have passed through. Astrology will aid you in all matters. There is before you an offer of great value to you. Show your appreciation of it.

My Reading of your Life will make you my friend. You will endorse me to others. In this way I will get pay for my Free Reading. If you wish you may enclose 10 cents (silver or stamps) to pay postage and clerical work. However, the reading will be promptly sent whether you enclose the 10 cents or not.

Shall a Monkey Earn a Living for a Man?

"Man's inhumanity to man makes countless thousands mourn."

Man's inhumanity to monkeys makes countless thousands laugh. The ancient Romans dragged their barbarian captives through the streets chained to their chariots. The modern Roman drags the captive monkey through the streets chained to a handorgan. This poor, weak, defenseless little animal must earn a living for some good for nothing whelp of a man, who ought to be run out of the country.

No matter how hot, or how foul the atmosphere, this little beast must go through his performance. If he is tired, no rest; if he becomes weak and lays down in exhaustion, he is jerked to his feet by the chain, until, in fear and torture, he staggers around again as long as he is able to move. The crowd that watched gladiators fight was on a higher moral plane than the crowd which stands around a chained monkey. Every man who sees such a sight ought to hang his head in shame. It is not the place for children to learn kindness and mercy. The monkey does not know enough to commit suicide. With all his strength he holds on to life.

As he looks on the giant beasts that surround him, he must imagine he is chained in hell. The theory of evolution is that man descended from the beast; yes, descended is the right word—descended lower in bestiality than the beasts; descended lower in degradation, depravity and cruelty than wild beasts. I will ask every reader of these lines to never give another cent to the organ grinder. Give bread to the monkey, if you will, but not a penny to the man until he releases his captive. We would petition councils and legislatures to forbid the dragging of trained wild beasts through the streets in chains. If we can first learn to be kind to beasts, after a while we can learn to be kind to human beings.

Journeys to the Planet Mars

Or, Our Mission to Ento (Mars)

A Narrative by Sara Weiss, Illustrated With Thirteen Original Drawings by the Authoress.

This strangely attractive narrative does not assume to be either scientific, philosophic, or as advancing any special religious creed. It is a plain statement of facts based upon the experience of a woman whose highest aim is to acquire a knowledge of truth, to earnestly strive to live it, and so offer to others a stepping-stone which may aid them, in their progress towards the light.

From the standpoint of Spiritualists this is a most interesting book, as Mrs. Weiss actually took these journeys in spirit and has given them in all sincerity, to the world. The book is uplifting and full of beautiful thoughts. Price $1.50

Human Life,

With Character Readings of Persons Born Upon the Cusp.

The principles found in this volume are both a science and a religion, for a better and a far happier humanity. It points to the planets as an index to the human character and liability to diseases; also gives the gems and colors suited to temperaments evolved under certain planets. But the author, ELEANOR KIRK, lays special stress upon the fundamental principle that "All maladies known to man can be entirely dominated, forever cast out, by those who realize that mind is the master and body the servant." Price, cloth, $1.00.

G. W. Brown, M. D. at Emporia, Kan.

The Emporia, Kans., Gazette says that city was greatly honored at her semi-centennial celebration, July 3. Dr. G. W. Brown, of Rockford, Ill., who was president of the town company that founded Emporia, February 20, 1857, was present and talked to the Old Settlers of the work of the beginnings of this town. Dr. Brown is eighty-seven years old, but his clear, vigorous memory holds much of Kansas history.

The good Doctor has had an eventful history. He was captured by a pro-slavery mob at Kansas City and passed through many exciting incidents, for days expecting at any moment to be shot. He finally reached Lecompton, May 20, 1856, the day before his office was first destroyed. He was held for four months, indicted for high treason, guarded by a regiment of United States troops, Governor Robinson, General Deitzler, Judge Smith and Gaines Jenkins, his companions. They remained until September 10, when, without trial they were discharged on their recognizances.

Major Glotfelter, who presided at the meetings, in a short speech introduced Dr. Brown, who gave the address of the afternoon. The Doctor was president of the town company which located and founded Emporia fifty years ago. As the editor of the Herald of Freedom, an anti-slavery paper published in Lawrence during the fifties, he played an important part in the early history of the state, and as the only living member of the company which founded Emporia, it was especially fitting that he should be there to address the citizens of the town on the fiftieth anniversary of its birth.

Dr. Brown is now 87 years of age, and is a picturesque figure, with white hair and beard. He is still strong and hearty and in his sixtieth year as an editor.

Sabbath-Breaking and Rock-Breaking.

A revivalist down there in Georgia lately beat his twelve-year-old boy almost to death for playing base ball on Sunday. When arrested for the offense, to justify his brutality he said he had prayed to God with the boy before using the lash, and gained the divine will to punish him severely. The court sent the offender to the rock-pile for six months. Will God interfere in the premises, and set his servant free? He should, if he approved of the act; but some people entertain the opinion such claim is a priestly fabrication. God and the Devil are the scapegoats of Christians, on one of whom is piled the vices of the entire church fraternity.

A Penalty Unknown to Law.

"We, the jury, find that Miss Hattie Briggs and Miss Dorothy Tillotson should each be taken from this court room and well and truly spanked."

Such was a verdict rendered a few days ago by a jury in our neighboring city of Aurora. The girls were some 16 to 18 years of age; were daughters of respectable parents, and had been guilty of some trifling misdemeanor. The Justice wisely set the verdict aside and discharged the prisoners.

A punishment of such a character should be inflicted by the defendants on the jurors.

Judge Landis Tells Youthful Defendant That He Must Shoulder His Own Sins.

If you should chance to be haled before the august bar of justice, don't fancy you can issue a subpoena for his Satanic Majesty and transfer the onus of your wrongdoings to the shoulders of that fiery theological abstraction.

The learned members af the Chicago judiciary all admitted, on July 10, that they had not encountered the Arch Fiend since they threw aside the well-thumbed school text of "Paradise Lost" years ago.

As for summoning him in court to appear as a witness against himself—well, there are limits to human courage even if Judge Landis did stretch the limit last week by inviting John D. Rockefeller to appear as his personal guest. And listen! This is a secret. They don't all of them believe in him, anyway.

The truth is that psychology has about ended the efficacy of his Satanic Majesty as a witness in a court of law. Science has erased him from the judicial slate. Wouldn't that grieve the soul of the good Cotton Mather? Just fancy how the starch in his collar would crinkle.

Here is a case in point. Ignorance of the changed judicial attitude involved Samuel Bergh and his clergyman father, Rev. Hans P. Bergh of 272 Grand avenue, in a controversy with Judge Landis, and brought forth the awful secret. Young Bergh admitted that he had forged a money order on the Chicago Medical College. Judge Landis fixed his fine at $200 and arranged to have him pay it in weekly installments.

"Your honor, I don't believe the boy was responsible," interjected Rev. Mr. Bergh. "I'm sure he must have been in the hands of the Devil. He has always been a good son."

"Now, young man," said the Judge, with his most majestic air, "Don't you get into your head that the Devil is responsible for your predicament. It is your fault and not the Devil's, so you can't shift the blame onto him."

Judges who have occupied the juvenile bench, and probation officers who are in the business of exorcising personal Devils, approved of Judge Landis' outspoken position. They said it was no use trying to give the Devil a blacker name than he had already.

Hear Judge Richard Tuthill:

"No, I can't say that I ever had the Devil invoked in court before me, although a good many of those who came seemed to have him in 'em. Of course, I don't care to go into any theological discussions, but seriously, it seems to me that the only way to achieve good is to train youngsters to recognize their personal, moral responsibility.

"Pedagogically, it is certainly unwise to teach them that they are helpless agents in the hands of some external evil force; to teach them that they can compound their quarrels with their conscience by blaming their wrong-doing on Satan or anyone else. They must be taught self-reliance. It is remarkable how young they will seize the idea that you expect them to do right and act on it.

"As regards the theological phase of the situation, I cannot do better than to quote 'Bobbie' Burns:

The fear of hell is a hangman's whip,
To haunt the wretch in order,
But when you feel your honor grip
Let that a' be your border."

Henry W. Thurston, chief probation officer, added his condemnation of using "bogey men" to frighten children into being good.

"I fancy that the Devil has a black enough reputation without gratuitously blaming him with other people's faults," he said. "I can't say that I ever heard him personally invoked as a scapegoat in court. Most of the boys will try to lay the blame on the other fellow, but their imagination doesn't often stretch as far as the Devil.

"The only hope is to eradicate in the boy the idea that he is not a free moral agent. He must be told that he can be good if he wants to and that if he isn't it's nobody's fault but his own. That is the very basis of moral growth in a boy."

The above from the Chicago Record Herald presents a splendid object lesson for the whole world to consider. In due time the Orthodox Devil will be completely extinguished.

Too Good for Earth.

A late forest fire in Wisconsin, easily controlled in the beginning, was allowed to run its course because the property owners were Adventists, and would not labor on the true Sabbath day — Saturday — to extinguish it. Their action proved they were loyal to their creed, but such men with such principles are too good for this earth.

It is related of the Jews that they would not resist a public enemy on the Sabbath, but allowed themselves and families to be slaughtered rather than break their Sabbath, which was as sacred to them as is the "pig tail" of the Chinese to them.

The Jewish Sabbath became a feature of these people while slaves in Babylon. And the pig tail of China is also evidence of their being dominated and enslaved by the conquering Tartars.

Thus marks of degeneration in time become sacred.

The whole Christian system owes its existence to a reconstruction of Paganism, which was forced upon an unwilling people. Scholars know this, and the masses are learning the facts.

Platitudes against sin are as harmful as applause for sin.—Anon.

An Astounding Statement.

John Wilkes Booth, Who Assassinated President Lincoln, Was Not Killed as Asserted at the Time—The Psychometric Reading by Miss Margaret Gaule.

The following remarkable account of a "Psychic Test," made on Sunday afternoon, June 23, 1907, was taken down in shorthand by C. L. Cox, and afterward submitted to Mr. Hubbell, for revision, and may be relied on as accurate and truthful in every particular.

Walter Hubbell, the actor, who has been playing King Herod in "The Holy City," in California and the far west this season, while playing in Enid, Oklahoma, on January 23, 1907, went to see the body of David E. George, who died January 144, 1903, and of whom it is alleged that he was John Wilkes Booth, who assassinated Abraham Lincoln, April 14, 1865, and escaped instead of being shot as recorded in history.

Mr. Hubbell, being personally acquainted with all of Booth's brothers, and particularly so with Edwin and Dr. Joseph A. Booth, was particularly impressed with the resemblance of the body to the Booth family. Without any solicitation on Mr. Hubbell's part, Mr. Penniman (who has the body in his keeping) presented him with a lock of the alleged assassin's hair. At the time it was cut from the head, no persons were present in the room except Mr. Penniman, Mr. Hubbell and Miss Lillian Alexander, a member of Mr. Hubbell's company. Mr. Hubbell placed the lock of hair in an envelope and never mentioned too any person that he had such a gruesome object in his possession, and Miss Alexander also kept the matter secret.

On his return to New York he determined to test the fact of its being the hair of John Wilkes Booth, at the hands of some well-known psychic or medium.

On June 23, 1907, he went secretly and for the first time to the Elks Hall, Columbus Circle, and attended a meeting of the "First Association of Spiritualists," for whom Miss Margaret Gaule is the medium. He does not know Miss Gaule at all, never having seen her before. On entering the hall, Mr. Hubbell placed a small wooden box containing the hair, on the table where objects and letters were placed for "readings," but it was not taken from the table by Miss Gaule.

In passing from the hall, he accidentally met Miss Gaule at the entrance door, surrounded by a number of the members of the Society, and said to her—rather abruptly, perhaps—"Madam, this box was in the centre of your table, and though you "read" articles and objects all around it, you passed it over every time. It is perhaps of great importance) and I am very sorry you did not "read it."

The lady hesitated for a moment, and then said: "Give it to me now and and I will see what I can get for you." She held it for a second in her hand and said:

"I see a large audience room—a building brilliantly lighted, crowded with people. There is music—laughter—all is enjoyment and pleasure. Suddenly there is a crash—some mighty man in power has been overthrown. There is confusion—officers in uniform—Washington—Lincoln—And yet how can it be Lincoln, for this object I hold in my hand did not belong to him. This should have been buried; it has a subterranean aspect. Has it been buried, or should it be buried? What is it? The owner of it died a suicide.' It is petrified. What you have in this box came from the center of the head."

As a matter of fact, Mr. Penniman, who has possession of the body, which is now in a petrified condition (or rather a mummy), is at the present time in Enid, Oklahoma. Miss Lillian Alexander, is either at her home in Kansas or playing in Canada at the present time, and neither of them have been in New York for a number of years, if ever, and neither of them know Miss Gaule or have any connection with Spiritualism; nor has Mr. Hubbell.

Mr. Hubbell's communication with the ghost of John McCullough some years ago, has been published in the "Life of John McCullough," by S. C. Clark, and has also been published by Dr. Funk, in his recent work "The Psychic Riddle."

If David E. George, was really John Wilkes Booth, as positive evidence now in the hands of reliable persons in Tennessee, Texas and Oklahoma, seemingly proves, it is probable that Booth, assumed the "David E." in memory of his accomplice, David E. Herold, who was hanged and the surname "George" after George Washington, Washington City being the scene of his bloody deed.

It is needless to add that Mr. Hubbell is an expert in testing mediums and getting tests that will bear so-called "Scientific Investigation."

The foregoing statement has been revised by me and is correct.

THE PROGRESSIVE THINKER

Glance over the columns of The Progressive Thinker this week and observe the vast amount of miscellaneous matter pertaining to Spiritualism in its various aspects. While four other journals, the Banner of Light the Religio Philosophical Journal and the Light of Truth, and the monthly published by Mr. Howe of Los Angeles, Cal., have suspended, The Progressive Thinker is MORE ALIVE THAN EVER.

It is very sad to contemplate that within a few months four organs of Spiritualism have been compelled to suspend publication—STARVED OUT, as it were, for the want of adequate support. In that one respect the outlook seems deplorable; but when one considers that the publication of a Spiritualist paper is purely a matter of business on the part of those engaged in it, as much so as starting a drug store, a grocery store, a dry goods store, or a machine shop, then one at once realizes that poor business methods or very limited capacity for the work in hand may eb behind a Spiritualist publication, the same as in any other of the various avenues of industry in the mercantile world and failure naturally result.

This view of the case, removes at once all thought of gloom that may arise in regard to any Spiritualistic publication that starts up, scintillates for a brief reason and then dies. Having passed off this line of work, one can then readily discern the causes of the decline and death of any Spiritualistic publication.

But The Progressive Thinker has prospered from the start, pursuing a course in many respects diametrically opposed to the Banner of Light, Religio Philosophical Journal and the Light of Truth. It has worked assiduously for a clean mediumship and a pure Spiritualism, and it has WON A VICTORY of which it feels proud. It is the largest paper devoted to occult and Spiritualistic subjects published in the world to-day, and hence, merits the support of all Spiritualists.

Glance over its eight pages, from the first to the last, and observe the VAST AMOUNT of matter contained therein.

No Spiritualist who wishes to keep abreast of the great movement, which is now assuming great importance before the world can afford to be without The Progressive Thinker.

NOTICE.

Owing to the fact of my being out of the United States for a time as we will be located in Summerland, British Columbia, I have deemed it my duty to send my resignation as National Superintendent of Lyceums. Would ask all Lyceums contesting for Prize to send further reports to Mrs. Mary T. Longley, secretary N. S. A., 600 Penn. Ave., S. E., Washington, D. C.

To all Lyceums I send a tender greeting and loving wishes for future success, and desire to still assist at any and all times you may need me though not in official way. Work hard for your banner or prize and rest assured it will be placed justly and wisely. Yours with love and regret. ANNA L. GILLESPIE.

Two new battle ships are to be built by this government to cost twenty millions of dollars. Instead of laboring to prevent national slaughter, the wealth of the world is being wasted in preparing more destructive methods for human butchery.

COMPETITION IN RELIGION.

That Is What Is Contemplated at the Present Time.—A Revival Christian Science.

That Christian Science is making headway among the other churches has long been evident, but until now none of the other churches has given sign that it is aware of it. In Chicago they have seen five large organizations gradually grow into being, but they have not acknowledged their existence.

But at last there is an indication that one of the churches, at least, feels the competition of Christian Scientists and means to take steps to end it. This is the Protestant Episcopal church, in which a movement has been begun to revive the ancient rite of divine unction for the healing of disease.

A convocation in the diocese of Los Angeles has petitioned the council of that diocese to memorialize the general convention of the church in favor of that revival, and this action has awakened much interest throughout the country. It is argued by those in favor of it that the sacrament is a divine institution that should never have been allowed to fall into disuse. They believe that the power of healing was given by Christ to the apostles, who transmitted it to the bishops, as is shown by that part of a bishop's commission which instructs him to "hold up the weak and heal the sick." That bishops do not now exercise this office is due to lack of faith. If they had faith, it is said, they could perform miracles to-day as well as the early churchmen.

Nothing is more certain than that Jesus practiced healing all through his ministry, or that the apostles were physicians of the body as well as of the soul. "They shall lay hands on the sick and they shall recover." Christ is reported by St. Mark as saying, and all through the writings of the disciples there is evidence that the promise was fulfilled.

Nor is it inoperative to-day, as is shown by the cures wrought in the Roman church, which continually performs miracles in every part of the world. There is no doubt that the Protestant Episcopal church can avail itself of the same power, if it will do so.

All that is needed is a revival of faith among clergy and people to keep members of the church from seeking relief in Christian Science, which grows because orthodox churches have lost belief in their own teachings.

The above from the Chicago Journal indicates that active competition between the various churches and Christian Scientists will become a prominent ifactor in the future, resulting, no doubt, in great good.

REFLECTIONS.

As They Come From Bishop A. Beals, of Summerland, Cal.

To the Editor:—I read a great many interesting and instructive articles in The Progressive Thinker from week to week, and from the pen of able, progressive minds, and upon all subjects, and in a spiritual paper that is, now really the only radical exponent of our philosophy and the cause of spirit communion.

Among the many able writers no one has more merit and interest than the writings of Brother Wilkins, especially his poetic productions, and at this writing I wish to mention and felicitate him on the recent poem entitled "When I Return."

So much has been written and said on this mooted subject of "Re-embodiment," pro and con, of repeated lives on the earth plane, that his poem comes in apropos, and covers the whole debatable ground and gamut of argument, and preaches a sermon on simple life and the law of growth here and hereafter.

A lady subscriber of your paper said to me once, speaking of Brother Wilkins' poems: "I never read one of his poems that I do not feel an impulse to write him and thank him for the good they do me."

Now, as thoughts are said to be things, may it not be these appreciative thoughts from the many admirers may not find wings, and react unconsciously by the objects of their admiration, and are the silent means of stimulating, aye, of inspiring the writer to do his mental work for the etheric waves are the bearers of messages, and from the living sources we little dream of?

Beliefs and theories on doctrinal subjects are often the cause of bitterness to the adherents when contested by the unbelievers, and discord and antagonism cause estrangement of feeling instead of a union of brotherhood as should be.

It is the province of true poetry to lay before the eyes of reason the simple truth, and in such attractive forms that all bigotry of feeling is disarmed, and the dispassionate mind feels the mysterious workings of a divine spirit leading the mind into the subtile process of nature's laws whose cause and effect are operative—not distant and transcendental, but wise and ever near at hand.

It is a good thing, Brother Francis, that our spiritual philosophy is not built on a lie, a myth, but stands upon the foundation of eternal principles, and breathes the divine whisperings of the "Over-Soul," as Emerson puts it, that it dispels darkness through the open door of reason, and makes our lives here under the doom of bitter disappointments the steppingstones to success in some future and fairer world.

The seething turmoil of our spiritual Cause at present, is portentous of much good eventually, inasmuch as we can see the winnowing process going on, eliminating from our ranks the fraudulent element that had become so rampant, and threatening the destruction of our Cause and hampering the arms of our workers, reformers, honest mediums and lovers of spiritual truth.

Mr. and Mrs. Lillie have been working here and at Santa Barbara the past winter, and up to the present time, holding one Sunday meeting a week, and at both places the Cause has prospered, and had a revival and uplifting that it has not had in years before. There is not a more efficient and faithful exponent of our Cause than Mrs. Lillie, nor one more worthy to bear the crown of "well done, thou faithful sister! Enter thou into the glories of thy spiritual inheritance."

It is a pity there are not more who have ample means to come forward to the support of our Cause, instead of masquerading in the so-called liberal Christian churches as they do, notwithstanding the acknowledged fact of spirit communion, and that too, by the intelligent ministers in nearly every Christian church to-day. Yet they fight shy of the spiritual platform, and hold themselves aloof from the movement, and do not encourage it in any way by their presence.

But all great movements and inventions have had their humble beginning and exponents who have given their lives to establish the truth for coming generations that they might reap the benefit.

Inventors as well as simply stewards of the divine mysteries of nature as given them, that the world may be the better for their living in it.

But our workers one by one
From Life's labors depart,
Leaving the work they have done
And the pain and smart,
But in the ages yet to come
Their inspiration will impart.

H. SPENCER LEWIS.

He Is Not the Man Who Wrote the Offensive Letter.

In explanation Mr. Lewis writes as follows: "Mr. Barrett says that there appeared in the Washington Post an attack on Spiritualism, written by me. This he promptly replies to in the same paper. Now, Mr. Barrett is an editor-at-large, but if he had limited his large field for a few hours and investigated the article in the Washington Post, he would have found that the Post has clipped the article from another paper, which is recognized as the most prejudiced against Spiritualism in this country. If he had investigated a little further he would have found that the article was never written by me at all and further, that I never authorized such statements as were made.

"I do not blame Mr. Barrett. He is doing an excellent work in defending the cause of Spiritualism and even though I do not receive pay for doing so, I never lose an opportunity of defending the cause and principles of true Spiritualism."

A Spirit's Explanation.

The Reception and Transmission of Thought Explained—Spirit Writing in a Sealed Envelope.

Much has been written in pursuance of this marvelous influence, or philosophy of the intellect.

Whether (we stand on the side of the pros or contras as to belief, or opinion, cannot be evidence conclusive of its operative influence;; its existence, or non-existence. Scientific research alone can deduce the facts in the case, and spirit manifestation the proof thereof.

As the telegraphic instrument possesses both the receptive, and transmitting influence, or force, whereby thought is symbolized, by sounds and tracings; so the human brain is qualified, by which means the individual consciousness receives, and disburses thought.

As the telegraphic line is necessary over which the vibration extends to convey thought, or intelligence to a given point; so are spiritual chords necessary over which thought vibrations reach a distant sensitive intellect.

In the latter part of 1894, the writer had a seance with Mr. George Cole, of Canarsie, Kings Co., N. Y., (now deceased), whose phase it was to receive communications within sealed envelopes.

On this occasion I enclosed blank paper, addressing one of my guides on the top sheet of paper, requesting him to give me a communication, he to choose his own subject. I folded the paper, placed it in the envelope and sealed it perfectly, and awaited the manifestation. When he had finished, I took the envelope, which remained in exactly the same condition it was in when I placed it for the manifestation, opened it, and found it to contain the same sheets of paper I had placed there, upon which was written in regular order the following message:

"Good Brother in Mortal Life,—The wisdom of the past is about to dawn again upon the world. The thoughts originated in the brains of mortals will again be transmitted to the farthest ends of the earth, and be read more intelligently than if conveyed in the sound of the voice through the modern telephone, which latter, is but the precursor of mental projection.

"In pre-historic times, mortals were obliged to guard their thoughts, else the privacies of the domestic circle would become as public as the daily issues in a modern newspaper.

"There will soon be another thummim such as used by Moses, the Israelitish priest, as a means of communication with spirit messengers.

"This thummim is a mirror of light and knowledge, and the thoughts will be carried in the future, as in the past, by the magnetic currents which also carry the mental vibrations on the spiritual chords, which radiate from every mortal to the four points of the compass.

"Mortal light is red, Spirit light is white, which form these chords; and the electric current conveyed into space, attracts the opposite or negative current, and these currents are proreciprocal in attraction, and produce an equilibria in consonance with mental balance.

"By such means you can send your thoughts to the most distant points of the earth, where the mortals you desire to make mental thought communications with, will be enabled to understand as well as if they were in the same room, listening to your verbal expressions.

"In certain parts of East Indies, this science as a principle, is still understood, having been handed down from generation to generation, for many agea past, and the cave-dwellers of the Himalayas, are adepts in this science, and send their thoughts to their friends at great distances.

"During the Seppy Rebellion, intelligence was conveyed in this manner, and the English were ever at a loss to understand how natives could convey intelligence of intended army movements, when such natives were under strict guard, and by trustworthy sentinels.

"The poor, despised Sepoys descended from an illustrious, and great race, were more intelligent than their presumptuous masters.

"Good brother, then, develope your soul resources, there is more knowledge hidden in its recesses, and imprisoned by false theories, and foolish aphorisms, than would rule a great empire.

"Solomon of Judea, was well versed in this art, and it is the foundation of religion, as by it, if understood, you can commune with the great Infinite God who fills all space.

"A prayer in thought is as powerful as a prayer in words, and herein lies the foundation, or fundamental principles governing the whole range of silent mental telegraphy.

"In conclusion, good brother, you in your profession of music, may think an air, and its melody and rhythm can be understood by a friennd to whom you may wish to project your thought, though he were thousands of miles distant.

Your brother and guide,
SAALAMBO OF SHEBA.

From the fact that this communication was wrought inside of a sealed envelope, by mental force, that controled the material part of the manifestation as well; it might be of interest to the reader to know the process employed by the manifesting spirit to the ultimatum. This can best be given by quotations from a description given by a spirit who was manifesting to her brother at one of Mr. Cole's seances, which was published later in one of the New York papers. It is to-wit:

"How do I write inside this sealed letter? This manifestation of independent spirit writing inside of a sealed envelope, by a spirit, is mysterious to mortals, because the manifestation is not understood. I will endeavor to explain: At seances, a spirit approaches the table upon which is a closed box; in which is found an envelope, and three or four different kinds of lead pencils, well sharpened. By waving my hand over the box in which the letter lays, I detach lead from the pencil I have selected, and bring it out in the atmosphere of the room, where it is brought in contact with the negative principles, sulphuretted hydrogen gas extracted from the atmosphere; it then becames sulphide; but, it is still palpable and ponderable. By treating it with the aeriform principles of sulphide of ammonium, and extracting all organic principles, the substance becomes reduced to air, in which state it is waved inside the envelope, and directed upon the sheets of folded paper, materialized in letters and word forms, in obedience to the thoughts to be expressed in language, and the substance and color restored by the inversion of the method adopted for reduction. This is to say, when I have selected the pencil and commenced to wave the hand, the lead is being extracted from the pencil, brought into the atmosphere and treated as described, at the same instance its air is waved into the envelope, materialized in letters and words on the paper, and the substance and color restored on the paper to their normal condition the following instant. A wave of the hand to the right performs one part of the process; and a wave to the left the other, and so on alternately—a word being written, or materialized at each wave of the hand. This is the manner in which all spirit communications are written inside sealed envelopes."

Signed, SARAH E. BUTLER.

It is not the purpose of the writer at this time, to dwell upon the theme of transmission of thought in all its phases; but simply to call the attention of the reader to the existing forces of Electricity and Magnetism, or, the positive and negative, as responsible influences, whose co-operation is ultimately resultant of motion.

That motion establishes vibration, which in turn is conductive; therefore, a transmitting influence existent throughout space.

That man is possessed of a mental organism capable of receiving, and disbursing thoughts in accord with his individual vibratory forces.

That his power to do so is conditioned by spiritual and material development, which limits his spiritual, or material terminals.

Secondly: That Nature is a great laboratory of chemistry, whose laws and combined forces spiritually, are beyond the conception of mortal brains; but, are better understood by developed spirits who use them to aid in their manifestations on the material side of life. A profound subject, the consideration of which will be as lasting as life itself.

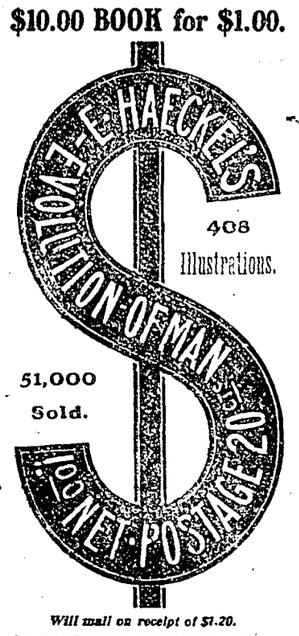
"TRUE TO HIS IDEAL."

This is the title of a biographical novel, founded on the life of a man, "Timothy Trueheart," who, when a boy, resolved to live a true, noble and a useful life, and who kept that resolution to the end. Marrying a girl who was in full accord with him, their wedded life was an ideal one. Indeed, the courtship, marriage and loving companionship of Timothy and Jennie, is one of the best love romances as I have ever written. Through storm and calm, toil and triumph, their faith in and love for each other grew stronger and sweeter. Together they grew in knowledge and wisdom, and together they sought to make the world better and life more earnest and true. Through consecration and serene courage they won genuine success.

This is, in some respects, the best book I have written. In these times of false ideals, such books are needed. I hope to be able to have it published for the early Fall trade this year. I want a few hundred orders in advance to insure me against loss. It will be a book of about two hundred pages, printed and bound in good style at $1.00 a copy. Those who give me their order now, for one or more copies, shall have it for 75 cents, to be paid when notified that the book is ready for delivery. This plan enabled me to publish my "Pioneers of Progress" last year.



You who get this offer, please extend it to your neighbors.

Thanking you in advance for your co-operation in this matter, I am

Yours very truly,

What Is the Message

That Spiritualism Brings to the World, That Is Superior to the Message of All Other Religions?—An Important Lecture Delivered by Mrs. H. L. P. Russegue of Hartford, Ct., at Elks Hall, New York City.

It is well sometimes to remind ourselves that the phenomena of modern Spiritualism is not new, and that it is as old as time. It is well sometimes to recognize the verities that belong to the scriptures of old religions, therefore I shall read to you a part of the 15th chapter of 1st Corinthians, beginning at the 35th verse:

"But some man will say, how are the dead raised up? and with what body do they come?

"Thou fool, that which thou sowest is not quickened except it die.

"And that which thou sowest, thou sowest not that body which shall be, but bare grain, it may chance of wheat, or of some other grain.

"But God giveth it a body as it hath pleased him, and to every seed his own body.

"All flesh is not the same flesh; but there is one kind of flesh of men, another flesh of beasts, another of fishes, and another of birds.

"There are also celestial bodies, and bodies terrestrial; but the glory of the celestial is one, and the glory of the terrestrial is another.

"There is one glory of the sun, and another glory of the moon, and another glory of the stars; for one star differeth from another star in glory.

"So also is the resurrection of the dead. It is sown in corruption, it is raised in incorrruption:

"It is sown in dishonor, it is raised in glory; it is sown in weakness, it is raised in power.

"It is sown in a natural body, it is raised a spiritual body. There is a natural body, and there is a spiritual body.

"And so it is writen, the first man Adam was made a living soul; the last Adam was made a quickening spirit.

"Howbeit that was not first which is spiritual, but that which is natural, and afterward that which is spiritual.

"The first man is of the earth, earthy; the second man is the Lord from heaven.

"As is the earthy, such are they also that are earthy; and as is the heavenly, such are they also that are heavenly.

"And as we have borne the image of the earthy, we shall also bear the image of the heavenly.

"Now this I say, brethren, that flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God; neither doth corruption inherit incorruption.

"Behold, I shew you a mystery; we shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed."

It is well, friends, that the lessons which Spiritualism teaches may be shown as correlated to the teachings of spiritual revelation of the long, long ago.

I shall read a poem by Ella Wheeler Wilcox, entitled:

"The Journey."

I think of death as some delightful journey that I shall take
When all my tasks are done.
Though life has given me a heaping measure
Of all best gifts, and many a cup of pleasure,
Still better things await me farther on.

This little earth is such a merry planet,
The distances beyond are so supreme.
I have no doubt that all the mighty spaces
Between us and the stars are filled with faces
More beautiful that any artist's dream.

I like to think that I shall yet behold them,
When from this waiting-room my soul has soared;
Earth is a wayside station where we wander
Until from out the silent darkness yonder
Death swings his lantern, and cries, "All aboard!"

I think death's train sweeps through the solar system,
And passes suns and moons that dwarf our own,
And close beside us we shall find our dearest,
The spirit friends on earth we held the nearest,
And in the distance God's great throne.

Whatever disappointments may befall me in plans or pleasure,
In this world of doubt,
I know that life at worst can but delay me
From that grand journey
On the Great Death Route.

I shall select for my subject this afternoon,

"What is the Message that Spiritualism Brings to the World, that is Superior to the Message of All the Other Religions.

The door of the kingdom of Heaven has not been ajar for ages for nought. The angels of God have not been descending and ascending upon the ladder of growth for ages without having brought some message and some truth that shall continue its revelations for all time to come. It has been proclaimed that truth is the same forever; that religion is the same yesterday, to-day and to-morrow. It is, if the human mind does not grow. There is no greater interpretation to spiritual stagnation of the lack of the higher conception of truth than the apprehension that religion has attained to a stand-still, and has found its uttermost limitation. It is worthless if it does not keep pace with human necessities, with spiritual desire, with the souls hungry for more wisdom.

It is a parody on progress if we are to accept from any compartment of God's universe any truth that does not bear the most crucial criticism and the most careful dissection. It is a parody of divinity, if it is not, and shall not always be a revelation, and what does revelation mean? It means the unfolding of something greater, something better, something truer, something mightier, something more godlike than has ever been opened to the consciousness of man. Before it implies that the world needs development; it needs the unfolding powers of its inherent processes that are bringing forth to the whole universe the glory of intelligence and wisdom. We are ready to ascribe to the kingdom of nature the power of improvement of culture; of refining processes. We are ready to assign to the outer world the developing forces that are continually beautifying, continually enlarging, continually expanding the uses to which they may be applied, but we have been loth to apply this principle to the spirit of religion that inheres in human nature. It has been labeled by dogma "Thus saith the Lord," therefore we have no right to open its doors to define its mysteries, to penetrate its inner realm, and find its foundations and its summits. But a religion has come to the world as a revelator of human nature, human aspiration, human progress, human intelligence, human intellect, and spiritual unfolding. It has come to the world as the revelator of nature, a revelator of human souls, a revelator of human consciousness, and in the religious realm it has brought us to the doorway that is between the lower and the higher levels of life. It stands in this religious revelation a reformation.

We have come to the consciousness that we need something more spiritual, more spiritualizing, more divine, than we have ever attained in our growth heretofore. Modern Spiritualism, we believe, has brought this message to humanity. It has come to the world a revealer of life's mystery. It has probed nature to its depths. It has brought forth her secrets. It has portrayed her laws. It has revealed her wisdom. It has allied the divinity in man to the divinity of God and in God. It has united the spirit without to the spirit within. It has wrested from the throne of imagination that image or being we call God and brought Him home to the universe of man and enthroned Him in human souls and is revealing the powers of intellectual reason and spiritual growth. It has brought the message that there are no limitations to human consciousness; no boundaries to human intelligences, no such things as walls to protect or shelter good from evil, righteousness from ignorance, heavenly things from earthly things, the spiritual from the material. All are one, because all are quickened by the same spirit.

If God dies breathe his soul, his life, his spirit, into the unfolding leaf, or into the coloring of the flower, or into the song of the bird, or into the glistening stars, or into the glory of the sun, He has breathed it into the souls of men and women, and they are at one with them, because the observer or thinker who analyzes life and its relations, must recognize the inter-dependence between all that is outward and all that is interior to man's life. He is dependent upon nature, and nature is as dependent upon him for the revelation of its mysteries as God is dependent upon His universe that the writing of His law may be read by human consciousness, and is heeded by a wise intellect.

Modern Spiritualism has brought the message that leads us to a clearer comprehension of law. No longer does science stand before the world ready to receive any affirmation without seeking the cause, the foundation of that affirmation. The astronomer when he was gazing into the heavens and saw the erratic action of the planet, was not satisfied with the theory that there was some cause outside that induced that activity, and he directed his telescope until at last he proclaimed to the world, "Lo! a new planet is revealed," and thus the action of the planets so erratically moving is explained.

The chemist in his laboratory is not satisfied in the combination of elements to know that they are combined; he must go to the foundation, and know what causes such combination, and what has been the result. All these things apply to human life. The result has been a better sanitation for the earth, a better condition for the universal health of mankind, and it is what? The revelation of religious wisdom. He who does the most for the benefit of his fellow-men is he who lives the higher religion of the world, and he who accomplishes the greater good for mankind is he who is doing the will of God more effectively than all the others.

Thus we are discovering the relationship to one another, and to the divine source of all life.

Modern Spiritualism has taught no separation of God from man, no high wall built between humanity and the source of life. Its phenomena have demonstrated to the world who think, and whose eyes are open to see, and whose ears are open to hear, the one truth of life is not only eternal, but is eternally progressive; that it not only continues beyond the grave, but it is unfolding continuously—forever, and not only this, but it teaches that there are barriers that can be overcome between all conditions of life.

Have you stopped to consider that there are barriers arising between the different levels of human society that are sometimes difficult to overcome? Have you ever considered that there is such a thing in your experience as a force that you are not able to resist, that leads you or repels you? Have you realized the great psychometric or soul-force that holds you within your orbit, and that your influence may blend with, be attracted to, or repelled from, those who are congenial or repulsive.

These are not outer influences; they are inward forces, and what have they accomplished? They have brought to the scientific world the completion of the wonderful potency of mental telegraphy, but the scientist has stopped at the door of the demonstration, and has not questioned how wonderful the effect must be on society of man can think for the world.

The spirit of man ennobles him to all the universe. Whether a sound escapes your lips or not, you are speaking volumes to mankind; you are telling your story of your life to the world. Hypocrisy, deceit, and no illusion of ignorance can conceal the verity of your spiritual language.

Modern Spiritualism has brought to the world a higher spirit of helpfulness; it has given to humanity a higher conception of human relationships. We have come to know that the man who thinketh evil, or presents undeveloped principles to the world, is injuring his fellow creatures; he is affecting the nerve forces of other individuals, either to depress or enchain those forces. He has learned to-day that these are the sequence of human relationships that are spiritual.

No man dreamed of such a thing as wireless telegraphy until Professor Crookes began his investigations in spiritual telegraphy. He being in London, a person in Manchester, a sensitive, was communicated with, and the experiment was observed by scientific men. Professor Crookes drew upon a blackboard a figure, and being artistic in his cultivation as well as in his natural tastes, the figure could be particularly well drawn, but the ignorant boy in Manchester had the pig and the horse, and the man imperfectly drawn at the same instant that the figure was developed upon the blackboard in London, thus establishing the fact that time and space seemed obliterated in the transmission of thought. It is the wonderful potency of the human soul that can project the thought from one location to another and define itself so accurately through the prism of another mind and brain; but this repeated experiment has been proven beyond all cavil, and to-day the scientific world has accepted it, foretold by the messages from on high that came more than half a century ago.

Out of this has grown the wireless telegraphy that is borne upon the undulating atmosphere from one locality to another. Out of this has grown the knowledge that we may do good as well as evil by our thought acting upon the brain or nerve forces of another individual. Thus a higher level of helpfulness can be established.

Thus mental healing and Christian Science have a grain of truth in their law they have tried to demonstrate, that mind is everything, and the repeating the formula of Dr. A. B. Childs who taught for years that whatever is is right, because right is the law, and the law is God, and God is the Spirit, and now Christian Science heralds it to the world as something new—only new to him who has just discovered it; not new in its existence, or in its apprehension, that it has lived for ages.

In the common walks of life the same influence has been recognized. Neighbors do not associate with neighbors because of the uncongeniality of the influences felt. Children are not allowed to associate with other children whose influence is pernicious to the moral unfolding, and so through every grade of human life you are classifying and creating human society.

What is the law?

It is the law of spiritual communion; the law of your spirit communicating with that of yourself, with that of one another. That is what is doing the work. It has been recognized as caste; been recognized as aristocracy; labeled "society." It has been recognized as the gradations of human life, but if we say that it is the spiritual recognition of our attraction and repulsion, you will come nearer to the truth.

Again the varied phenomena of modern Spiritualism are classed to-day differently from 25 to 50 years ago. We are recognizing where the great, wonderful phenomena finds its origin. In the lower creation, the scientist declares that the lobster, the elephant and the camel are clairvoyant. He affirms that this has been proved beyond doubt. Why? Because there is spirit, living in all those forms of life, thus expressing itself to the outer world, and so far as consciousness is concerned, becoming the acknowledged intelligence that inheres in all life.

Volmer, the wonderful scientist, at first could not accept clairvoyance or mediumship; he could not believe the door was open between heaven and earth. By his careful study of human nature, by the application of intelligent criticism to the varied phenomena presented through mediumship that has been inaugurated by modern Spiritualism, he became so convinced that he was ready to sacrifice position, wealth, everything, toward which ambition had directed his thought, to proclaim that which he believed to be true. To-day this spiritual law has entered the Vatican, and gone to the heart of the Pope, who refuses to condemn the wonderful investigation of its principles blindfolded. Aye, it is not something to be laughed away; it is not something to be eradicated from human society. If there was never another rap, another voice heard from on high, or never another spiritual manifestation through the mediumship of the human organism, the world is awake, and the spirit of God would speak in no uncertain terms to humanity, and the souls of men would be quickened to a higher growth and to a richer development than they have ever known before.

Oh! open your eyes, your souls, your hearts. Do away with prejudice and superstitious awe. Stand upon the high levels, with souls upturned, and your spiritual eyes open, your souls vibrating with the desire for a higher revelation. It will come.

When you think of the messages that have come through the open door upon this platform, they have told you of eternal life, of the joy and perpetuity that belong to those you love; that they carry with them every attribute of their nature; that love and memory are perpetuated beyond the grave, and that individual strength is continually unfolding its potencies.

These messages have been the key to the great vault of the Almighty's truth, the revealer of His laws, and the portrayer of His wisdom. They have told you that there is no such thing as death. They have spoken a language that you have not always heard, for they have told the story of a conscious, growing, broadening, eternal life.

Aye, the world is going on and on, and from day to day to the end of time this wonderful revelation that has come up out of the past will move onward and upward to the higher goal of the spiritual hope.

The sign that comes with all this, the prognostication for the future, is a better humanity.

It has been difficult to sectarianize modern Spiritualism, simply because it has sifted through different brains; it has adjusted itself to different organisms; it has answered the call for different testimonies.

One man is satisfied with the writing upon the wall; another with the three raps, and two, and one; another it may be with clairvoyance; another with clairaudience; another is clamoring for various manifestations. As the need is defined the answer has come, and thus the varying understanding has so individualized the investigator and the thinker that he cannot conform to the experience and theory of someone else.

Spiritualism has answered the call of individual necessity, spoken to individual lives, and told its story in answer to individual prayers. It has come to the sorrowing mother who has grieved, and prayed to know, "Where is my child? who is caring for it; who loves it?"

Theology, vicarious atonement, or dogmatic faith, has never answered the question. The prayers of the multitude have ascended, but the voice has not answered, and the hand has not been touched, the soul has not vibrated to the presence of those they love.

The wife who has laid away the form of her beloved, asks, "Where is he? Oh, what has become of him?" Theology has answered, but modern Spiritualism has come with an unmistakable voice, with no uncertain sound, and has told the story: "I live, and I love you. I am growing into a larger life. I can and will help you. I will aid you along life's journey, and I will meet you at the open door."

Modern Spiritualism has done this. It is not faith, not hope; it is the message that is real, the story that can be measured, that can be proven, until it is no longer a phantom, but a living fact. It solves the problem of life, the problem of death. It solves the problem of God's law, that we are co-eternal with Him, co-eternal with His spirit, with His divinity, with His revelation.

Benediction:—May the angel world seem so near to you that the angelic spirit within your lives may be awakened, and may your hands be outstretched to all who are in need, while your souls are opened to the outpouring of spiritual help from on high. This blessing we ask from one to another here, and from heaven to earth. Amen.

THE BEST THAT HE COULD DO.

If ever man merits just all the kind thought
And love of a world, it is when
The treadmill runs backward and he has been caught
In the cogs with his own fellowmen,
Of labor and failure (success unto some),
Of the old mill that grinds out his food;
When fortune and justice both turn away dumb,
And he did just the best that he could.

'Twas that way with Adam, as told in the book,
Alone in the garden for life—
The job was a good one—the contract he took;
But there was great need of a wife.
He studied and worried till in a deep sleep
He fell, and the Lord, who was good,
Made him a companion—made one he could keep—
He kept her the best that he could.

A kind of helpmate, (and tempter) she proved,
A tempter with wisdom and wit;
The fig-leaves and nudeness this tempter removed
For dresses and clothing to fit.
She gave him an apple, or some kind of fruit,
And told him to taste; it was good;
Although 'twas forbidden, his wife he must suit,
He did just the best that he could.

Man has been striving 'gainst fate since that time;
While some have succeeded quite well—
In making their fortunes, a means to the crime,
And making for others a hell—
The masses were fated to drift on in strife,
And could not succeed if they would,
Except as the servants of masters through life,
Tho' all did the best that they could.

When Noah, the chosen, projected the ark,
And looked o'er the stock he should take,
He labored from morning till long after dark,
The best of selections to make,
And built with his hammers and tools of each kind,
And with his own choice of the wood,
His ark, to leave drowning the masses behind,
He did just the best that he could.

Old Joshua tried it, and tried with a will,
To have his own way in all things;
He made the great sun and moon to stand still Till he trod on the necks of five kings;
He slew many others throughout his whole reign;
The good Lord had ordered he should;
He slaughtered not all—the reason is plain—
But he did just the best that he could.

And Nebuchadnezzar, the king who had dreams,
Prophetic and rare in that day;
Although a great ruler of men, yet it seems
He needed a Daniel one day,
To tell him the drift of a dream he'd forgot,
And that boded his kingdom no good,
But Daniel just gave him the truth of his lot—
And Neb. did the best that he could.

And Jonah, the preacher, and prophet as well,
Knowing the Lord and his wish,
Just disobeyed orders, and over him fell
The jaws of a large, friendly fish.
The storm was a tempest, but soon settled down,
As Jonah had stated it would,
But angels had told him that he wouldn't drown
If he did just the best that he could.

All Solomon's wisdom, his wealth and his fame,
Could stay not the hand of old Fate,
Who, passing his portals and temples of shame,
Just took him to Justice the Great.
He showed how his record in goodness and crime,
As husband and father had stood;
But Justice discharged him, for all that long time
He had served God the best that he could.

Though ancient or modern, the law is the same:
Man needs but the touch of a friend
When downed by reverses, by sickness or flame,
All men are alike in the end.
To-day he is floating or flying with time;
Tomorrow he begs for his food.
Old Fate always rules him, in goodness or crime,
And has ruled the best that he could.

"Temple Oak" Services

At Sunnybrae, the California Home of Elizabeth Lowe Watson.

Mrs. Elizabeth Lowe Watson is well known to your many readers, as an inspirational speaker of high rank, and a spiritual teacher of the lofty principles upon which Spiritualism is founded, therefore they will be interested in a glimpse of her home, as seen by the writer upon a recent visit there.

Sunnybrae, her country seat, is about ten miles from San Jose, Cal., in the lovely valley of Santa Clara, set in the midst of surpassingly beautiful natural scenery, overshadowed with the irresistible influence of invisible harmonies.

The valley spreads out before Sunnybrae like a "calm earth goddess" crowned with fruit, vine and flowers, stretching out in an endless panorama of Nature's master touches—a land most fair, where the dove-gray branches of the olive blends in gentle benediction,

"Where the lemon trees bloom and the gold orange glows,
And the groves are of laurel and myrtle and rose."

Behind are mountains veiled in a mystic haze of purple and gold. Nestling at their feet, a few miles away, is the village of Los Gatos in the northern end of the gap of mountains, that opens to the sea, through which we catch the far-off melody of the "deep-voiced, neighboring ocean." Taken all in all, a picture of Elysium is suggested.

This is the natural environ which this gifted and soulful woman has made her own. Here her heart-treasures have grown in nobleness to man's and woman's estate. Here her son, a splendid young man, just as he touched the noonday of a noble manhood, passed out of the entanglements of Time into the larger, fuller life of the spirit. And the silent white angel has often entered this dear family circle and claimed his own. Yet there are also other angels of Light and Love that have woven their fascinating spell around this sanctuary of home. The beautiful daughter Lucretia was here wooed and wedded by a worthy young man, Grant B. Taylor.

In these softening shadows and deeper melodies of life Mrs. Watson dwells. Here we tarried a golden while with our charming hostess and felt the kindred touch of soul.

Mrs. Watson for sixteen years has held annual memorial services, in the early June days, under the mighty boughs of "Temple Oak." This tree is one of the most magnificent oaks in all the valley round. It stands on a circular lawn near the residence, and its ever-widening branches form a perfect natural auditorium, with a picturesque view from all sides.

The second Sunday in June, the occasion of "Temple Oak" services for 1907, was a perfect California day, the air was redolent with orange and rose and jessamine sweetness.

Mr. Taylor, Mrs. Watson's son-in-law, opened the meeting with a few timely words of welcome to those who had gathered from all parts of the country—numbering about seven hundred. These yearly memorial days have now become an acknowledged institution of this great valley.

The Rev. Edwin Sydney Williams, a prominent minister of Saratoga, closed his church for the day in order that his congregation might attend "Temple Oak," he joining in the worship with the opening prayer.

Mr. Taylor also spoke at some length on matters involving present conditions. His address was suggestive of hope and vibrant with a faith which reaches to a grander and greater humanity as the cycles evolve.

Mrs. Watson's eloquent address was upon "Progress," a theme ever new and ever old. She handled her subject in a masterful manner, with that fervor and earnestness that marks all her efforts. But there is something in the saying which is back of the saying that cannot be transcribed by cold type in all this inspired teacher utters.

The San Jose Mercury pays the following tribute to Mrs. Watson's lecture on "Progress":

"It was a spirited one and fairly overflowed, as her talks always do, with messages of hope, love, courage and faith. She is an inspirational speaker, always speaks without notes and apparently without effort. Her easy-flowing remarks come from the depths of a soulful nature, and she carried her audience with her in rapt attention until the close of her address. She has a cheerful, hopeful philosophy of life and her gospel is one of far-reaching love and helpfulness. It is a privilege to come in contact with such a fine, strong personality. It gives an uplift to one's thoughts and life for days to come. That the speaker is fully appreciated in this county was quite apparent at yesterday's gathering by the large number of people who were present.

"The Union Church at Cupertino was represented at Temple Oak. The Youths' Choir at Cupertino led the singing. The King's Daughters and the Political Equality Club were in attendance. The Good Cheer Club of San Jose attended in a body. Many people from San Jose, Santa Clara, Mountain View, Los Gatos and Saratoga were present. Mrs. Watson entertained a large number of personal friends at luncheon and had as house guests a number of San Francisco people.

"The majority of these attending services Sunday spent the day on the grounds, which are quite extensive and beautiful. Luncheons were eaten under the shade of the fine oak trees and the house was thrown open to guests all day. The people were conveyed to and from the cars in carryalls, although many came in private conveyances.

"Mrs. Watson is not only an interesting and inspiring speaker, but she is also an ideal hostess, radiating love and cheer to all with whom she comes in contact."

As we left Sunnybrae in the mellow evening light we could but feel that

"The touch of an Eternal Presence thrills
The fringes of the sunsets and the hills"— round about the holy shrine of "Temple Oak."

I append the following poem, which was given as the peroration to the address by Mrs. Elizabeth Lowe Watson.

The valleys shake with travail pains,
The shuddering hills show sympathy,
Broad rivers break o'er burning plains
And islands lift from troubled sea.
The cities built by puny man
To gratify his pride's desire,
Give way before God's greater plan,
Licked up by crimson tongues of fire.

Old empires throb with purpose new,
The people's hope like eastern star,
Is guiding to a state more true
And peace is bought in place of war.

The altars built for sacrifice,
Are wreathed in Love's immortal flowers,
And fear no longer blinds our eyes
To good that works in master powers.

E'en Death, that old, old enemy,
Once yawning gulf that threatened all,
Has proven door to liberty
Through which we hear the angels call.

Old things are passing; let them go!
Put shoulders to Progression's wheel;
Plough deep in thought, Truth's sweet seed sow,
Till peace and joy perennial grow
And God as Good, all things reveal.

MRS. J. J. OWEN.

"THE PSYCHIC RIDDLE"

This Remarkable Book is by Dr. Isaac Funk, Eminent as a Profound Thinker, and Published by Funk and Wagnalls, New York and London, and Reviewed by Harbinger of Light, Australia — For Sale at the Office of The Progressive Thinker; price $1.00.

Anything from the pen of Dr. I. K. Funk on the greatest question that can engage the attention of the human mind, namely, the survival of the soul after the change called death, and the possibility of the discarnate spirit communicating with incarnate spirits still upon the earth, is entitled to a respectful hearing and a patient examination. It is so for two reasons. In the first place, Mr. Funk has acquired the academic degrees of D.D. and L.L.D.; and has received therefore a university education. In the second place he is the senior partner in one of the greatest publishing companies in New York and London. For this reason he may be safely credited with exceptional business qualities and regarded as a shrewd, level-headed and successful man of the world. In both these capacities he came before the public some time ago as the author of a striking book entitled "The Widow's Mite," in which he brought together some hundreds of experiences along psychic lines, and embracing the testimony of nearly forty of the best known psychologists of the day in Europe and America, as the result of a quarter of a century's careful and scientific investigation of all the various forms of what are generally known as Spiritualistic phenomena.

This has been followed up and supplemented by "The Psychic Riddle," which is really a satisfactory solution of that riddle. Indeed no impartial critic reading the book from cover to cover with a free and open mind can arive at any other conclusion, I think, than that the potent array of facts adduced by Dr. Funk establish beyond contestation the two fundamental truths of Spiritualism, namely, the continuity of our personal existence after the dissolution of our mortal frame, and the free and full communion between beings on the spiritual and material planes of life, which is enjoyed by hundreds of thousands, nay millions, of the inhabitants of both worlds. In fact Dr. Funk proves these things up to the hilt; and his second book like his first is an armory of trenchant weapons available for employment by every combatant for the truth.

Dr. Funk hesitates however to own himself a Spiritualist! It is as if Copernicus, after the completion of his great discovery, should have exclaimed "Nevertheless I do not believe in the heliocentric theory of the universe;" or as if Blaise Pascal, after working out all the problems of Euclid, should have declared to his father, "I decline to accept these mathematical demonstrations;" or as if Herbert Spencer, at the close of his philosophical career should have assured the world that he was no Evolutionist.

I entirely agree with this able writer that "the science of psychology must be constructed out of a great multitude of psychic experiences." But these lie close to our hand. They are incalculable in number; they are being simultaneously observed, examined and recorded by multitudes of investigators in all parts of the civilized world; and those of an indisputably genuine character related by Dr. Funk in these two books might well carry conviction to the minds of a whole college full of skeptical Montaignes. It would be difficult to imagine anything more rigorous than the test applied to some of the mediums who were experimented upon by Dr. Funk and his friends. Here is a case in point. A sonorous spirit voice was in the habit of speaking with great power and fluency at a seance at which a Mrs. French was the medium. It was supposed the voice might emanate from herself; and she was requested to fill her mouth with colored water and retain it while he was addressing those present. She did so and did not eject the tinted fluid until he had ceased doing so; then it proved to be that which she had imbibed. But this is only one of a great number of test phenomena witnessed by Dr. Funk, who frankly makes the following acknowledgment:—"That intelligences who are foreign to us, that is, who reside beyond our five senses, can and do communicate through the physical sense organs with those—or with some of those—who are living in the flesh;" and yet he resolutely declines to call himself a Spiritualist because he does not consider Spiritualism to be scientifically demonstrated. What further demonstration could any reasonable man require than is to be found in "The Widow's Mite" and "The Psychic Riddle"? J.S.

"The Kingship of Self-Control." By Wm. George Jordan. It treats of the crimes of the tongue, the Red Tape duty, the supreme charity of the world, Bank. Price, 25 cents.

"In the World Celestial," by Dr. T. A. Bland. Interesting, instructive and helpful; Spiritually uplifting. Cloth bound, price $1.

The Psychic Riddle.

By I. K. Funk, D.D., LL.D., Editor-in-Chief of "The Standard Dictionary"; Author of "The Widow's Mite, and Other Psychic Phenomena," "The Next Step in Evolution," etc.

A book full of psychic suggestions, supported by startling experiences, all told in a wonderfully conservative way. It harmonizes with the judgment pronounced by The Review of Reviews, New York, on the author's previous publication of this subject: "A very sensible, cautious, level-headed piece of work all through;" and also with the judgment on the same book pronounced by the Cleveland Record: "There has never been so fair and painstaking a book put forth on this subject as this one." Price, $1.00.

Mr. John W. Ring wishes to announce the marriage of his niece, Miss Lina Grace North, to Alexander Bourg, Thursday, June 13, 1907, Colorado Springs, Colorado. At home Crystola, Green Mountain Falls, Col.

W. P. Brittain writes: "I have read in The Progressive Thinker the opinions of various writers on locating water with a forked stick. I have seen such a method practiced by different parties for over fifty years, and find as many or more failures than otherwise. I have practiced the method, and the stick would turn either way in my hands, and would twist off if held tightly. The whole thing, as far as finding water with the stick is concerned, is a fraud, pure and simple."

Emma A. Ellis writes: "The next Social of the Band of Harmony will be held at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Tressness, 379 N. 51st ave., on Thursday, July 18. The afternoon will be devoted to cards and tea-cup readings. The evening entertainment will consist of music, etc. Score cards are 25 cents, and coffee checks 10 cents. Those attending, bringing their own supper. Everyone is cordially invied. It would be considered very unkind by the writer if mention of the last social were not made at this time. The ladies who went to Elmhurst and enjoyed the hospitality of Mrs. Stone are loud in their praise of the lovely time, and delightful entertainment."

Mrs. C. Northridge writes from San Jose, Cal.: "Dr. and Mrs. Noyes of Utica, N. Y., have been with our First Spiritual Union Society seven weeks, and Mr. Noyes, as he stood before us, with a face radiant with divine light, poured forth words of inspiration and truth that touched the hearts of the audience. Mrs. Noyes followed in her usual way. I have been pleased to find in her one of the very best mental message mediums that I have ever met. Her readings are unsurpassed. Dr. and Mrs. Noyes are on their way to Galveston, Texas, to fill a fall engagement, and will stop at Santa Barbara and other cities on the route for short engagements."

Mrs. M. C. Jacobs, president of the Ladies' Aid, writes: "The Chesterfield Camp opens July 25th, and continues until September 1st. I will call a meeting of the Ladies' Bazaar for Monday, the 29th of July, to elect a Secretary to fill the unexpired term of Sister Adelia Dowell, who passed to the higher life June 26. Any friends of the camp who may desire to send donations for the Bazaar can send the same to my address, 932 North Illinois street, Indianapolis, Ind., and the same will be thankfully received."

The Lynn Spiritualist Association sends the following: "Spiritualists and honest investigators of Psychic Phenomena will take notice that the Rev. May S. Vanderbilt, formerly Mrs. Pepper, of Brooklyn, N. Y., has, after much persuasion by her friends, consented to conduct services at Unity Camp Auditorium, Saugus, Mass., on the following dates: Saturday, July 27; Sunday, July 28, and August 4. Good soloists. Seats will be reserved if notified by responsible parties. Good protection in stormy weather. Fifth Annual Fair, July 25th, 26th and 27th."

Ferd C. Suhrer writes: "Inquiries concerning the Fraternl Camp Association are being received from people in Illinois, who have been waiting for some time for just such an opportunity and we feel elated with the results thus far obtained. Our officers who are more or less acquainted with the speakers of note, are always keeping sharp look-out for the stars that illumine the Spiriualistic horizon, and we take great pleasure in announcing that Miss Elizabeth Harlow of Columbus, Ohio, one of the ablest speakers in our ranks, has finally been induced to come to Chicago, and address the society and its friends on the evening of Wednesday, August 28. Miss Harlow has many friends here who will be pleased to learn of her coming visit, and we expect our hall at 406 Ogden avenue, (top floor) crowded. Those who wish to join our large chorus are requested to send their names and addresses to the writer, 95 Loomis street, that we may arrange for a rehearsal early in September. Our young people are also busy organizing a social club, and will give enertainments during the coming winter. The first meeting was held Friday evening, July 5th, at the home of Miss Loretta Miller, 95 Hermitage ave. We meet again Saturday evening, July 20, at the home of Miss Pearl English, Ogden avenue, and 48th st., and all young people who would be interested are invited to attend, as we will combine business with pleasure. Those who are interested in Lyceum work are requested to send their names to Dr. Alexander Caird, 598 W. Monroe st., as we intend to take care of the little ones also. Repairs in our hall will be completed in time for our opening in October, which will add much to its appearance and to the comfort of our members and friends."

Frank T. Ripley has the Sundays of September open for engagements to lecture and give messages. Terms reasonable. Address all letters to P. O. Box 278, Wonewoc, Wis.

Mrs. Virginie Barrett is now located at Bonfield, Ont., where she can be addressed.

Mrs. Elixabeth J. Demorest of Pittsburg, Pa., has just closed a very successful engagement with the East Liverpool, Ohio, Spiritualists. After another four weeks engagement in Pennsylvania, she leaves for Lily Dale.

Services will be resumed by the Worcester, Mass., Association of Spiritualists September 22, with Mrs. N. J. Willis of Boston, as the speaker.

BEAR IN MIND that the editor of The Progressive Thinker is in no wise responsible for the views expressed by contributors. He may or may not, agree with their respective views.

A large and much interested audience heard the closing lecture by Dr. B. F. Austin before the Spiritualist society in Meadville, Pa.., at the Odd Fellow's temple. The speaker, after giving a brief survey of the principles of modern Spiritualism, related a number of strange experiences that he had personally met with in psychic research. Spiritualism, he said, is a revival of New Testament Christianity. No great religion of the world was ever founded without miracles and prophecy, and these are to be found in Spiritualism. Miracles are not a violation of law. They seem to be a disturbance in nature's order, because they are not understood. They result from a higher law, temporarily displacing a lower law, and in this sense miracles are coming in more and more. Spiritualism is a scientific religion, because it requires no more belief from any man than what can be ratified by facts. No other religion in half a century has ever won the allegiance of so many brilliant minds. No doubt this is due to the fact that it is based on verification more than on faith. However, there is need for faith even in the life of a Spiritualist. The faith of to-day becomes the knowledge of to-morrow and thus faith must ever be the forerunner of knowledge. The address was followed by spirit messages, through the mediumship of Mrs. J. S. Steele, of Pittsburg.

Stuart L. Rogers writes: "I wish to make a statement regarding one of the best all-around mediums it has been my pleasure to meet, in my 50 years investigation of Spiritualism. I refer to "Rev. Mary C. Ward," who has been sojourning in our midst for the past three or four months. Mrs. Ward has made it her headquarters in this hamlet, and filled engagements in Erie, Pa., Buffalo, and several smaller places, and is at this date filling an engagement in Middlefield, Ohio, where she has been engaged many times in years agone."

Mrs. Dobson-Barker writes from San Jose, Cal: "The First Spiritualist Union of San Jose, Cal., held meetings during the month of May, Mrs. Mattie E. Hull being engaged for four Sundays previous to her return east. We have just closed a month's engagement with Mr. and Mrs. Noyes, from Nebraska. Mr. Noyes lectured on Sunday evenings, Mrs. Noyes following with spirit messages and many good tests. They are both good, earnest, honest and faithful workers. We wish them success wherever they may go. July 7th, 12 m., a membership meeting was held and a motion was made and carried that the F. S. U. take a two month's vacation. The Sunset Lyceum and Mutual Helpers, both auxiliary societies to F. S. U., have also taken a vacation. July 7, at 7:30 p. m., Mrs. R. J. Stone gave a very interesting lecture, followed by Miss Tillie Gunderson with spirit readings. We will renew our meetings again September 15, 1907."

Mrs. E. Duncan writes: "The members of the First Spiritual Church of Elwood, Ind., were honored by two very interesting lectures, delivered by Mr. Earnest Amberg of New York. The lecture on "The Spiritual Conception of Jesus Christ, June 30, was to the point, and highly appreciated. The tests were good and all recognized."

Dr. T. Wilkins writes: "The Sunflower Club Picnic and boat ride to Michigan City were all right and the success was pronounced by all who attended. There was some disappoinment about the boat on the outward trip, though all went well in the main. There was no formality used or seemingly desired; it was a free for all picnic, and good social time, and everyone enjoyed it to the limit of their individual capacity. The ride was cool and refreshing to Michigan City and return, and the little city was in its prime On Saturday, July 13 and no ill luck to the little party was experienced on this supposedly unlucky day. About 100 tickets were sold by the Club, and those not in attendance missed a good time long to be cherished in memory. Your correspondent feels just like adding:

Peace to the spirit that strives to give
Some sympathy here to those who live
In sorrow's deep throes, in sickness bent;
Without relief in mercy sent.

Peace to the hearts that throb for those
Hard-pressed by Fate and clinging woes;
Peace to the spirit of harmony;
Peace to this and the life to be.

Peace to the ladies whose hands prepared
The viands of sweetness so freely shared;
Peace to the mothers, companions and wives;
May Sunflowers bloom over their lives.

Peace to the lovers who still are unwed;
Peace to "old baches" and maidens not dead;
Peace to the children; peace to all things;
Peace to the shelter 'neath Nature's wings.

Peace to the paths of men to-day;
Peace to their spirits; peace to their clay;
Peace to the power that makes them mad;
Peace to the power that makes them glad.

Peace to the man with red hair on his coat;
Peace to the zephyrs on which hairs float;
Peace to the widows and widowers too,
Peace to all to whom peace is due.

Opening of the Lily Dale Assembly.

The first blast of the trumpet and the echo by the big base drum announced the opening of Lily Dale Assembly on Friday afternoon, July 12th.

The grounds never looked nicer nor was the weather ever any finer. It was indeed an ideal day.

There are more people on the grounds and there was a larger attendance than there has been on the opening day for years.

Dr. Geo. B. Warne delivered the opening address. It was a masterful effort.

He showed how great strides the cause of Spiritualism had made all over the country, and the victory won through the affirmation of the State Supreme Court of Illinois in the Crumbaugh Will case, involving the largest sum of money ever willed to Spiritualism.

He admonished his hearers each to do their best, that harmony and good will might prevail, calling their attention to the harm often caused through unkind criticism, and said that each would receive exactly in proportion to what they brought and gave to others. The entire address was permeated with a spirit of earnestness and sincerity which deeply impressed his hearers. Mrs. Annette J. Pettengill followed with messages. She gave several very convincing tests and spiritual messages, which brought comfort to hungry hearts.

Mrs. Pettengill is always a welcome guest on our platform and we are glad to have her among us.

In the evening the Board of Trustees gave a reception to all visitors and guests. Short addresses were delivered, after which everybody shook hands with everybody else, and a spirit of harmony and good fellowship prevails. LAURA G. FIXEN.

DEATH IS A BLESSING.

Why should mankind, with bated breath
And fear and trembling look on death?
There must be some good reason why
All things that live are born to die,
And when that reason we can see
'Twill banish fear and mystery.

If it were true that "death ends all,"
'Twere good excuse for crape and pall,
For if it be "eternal sleep,"
'Tis fit for all to wail and weep;
If this short life is all there be
'Tis but a farce, a mockery!

Death is a loan to mortals lent—
Of loving smiles and words bereft;
The friends we've lost, we cannot see,
Nor hear their voices audibly,
And when our hearts are freshly torn,
It is but human we should mourn.

But consolation we should draw
From Nature's grand evolving law
Which shows, when rightly understood,
That every change works out a good.
'Tis even so, as Scripture saith,
With this great change we mis-call death.

'Twas not designed that we should stay
Forever in this form of clay,
For flesh and blood are much too gross,
And longer stay would be our loss,
So Death comes in and sets us free
To have a larger liberty.

Death was ordained in Nature's plan
Long ages ere the birth of man;
It was the method God employed
What lesser creatures then destroyed,
To make the earth a fitter place
To start another higher race.

The change they'll find, when mortals die,
Like that of moth or butterfly.
'Twill give a form of finer mould
That ne'er gets ill, and ne'er grows old,
And for its wants finds full supply
From elements that round it lie.

Each mortal sinner that we see
Is destined yet a saint to be,
But earth conditions are averse,
And oft he goes from bad to worse,
So death removes him to a home
Where earth's temptations cannot come.

What then is death? 'Tis second birth
Through which we leave our Mother Earth,
And as freed spirits then arise
To find our "mansions in the skies;"
There's naught to fear but much to crave,
Let mortals face it and be brave.

Then mourners all, cease tears to pour
For those not dead but gone before,
Whate'er their state in spirit sphere,
They're better off than they were here;
"To die is gain," St. Paul once said,
Then by this truth be comforted.

THE LAST CALL!

The officers of all local spiritual societies in the United States, who have not made their reports for the census, are requested to take notice that this is the last chance. The time is now short and they are earnestly requested to forward the cards they have in hand, filled according to instructions, at the earliest possible moment. The books will close July 20, and it is hardly probable that any society whose report is not in hand on that day, will be recognized after that time. Inasmuch as less than one-half of the local societies that are supposed to be in existence, or are known to have had an existence, in the last seventeen years, have thus far reported, it becomes the duty of all delinquents to attend to this matter at once. Spiritualists and friends of the cause, will you not interest yourselves in this very important matter? Now is the time to act. Let us hear from you at once. If you have no cards to fill for your organizations, send me the name of your societies, their dates of organization, membership and how divided, and I will fill the cards for you, giving you credit for having furnished the information. Remember this is the last call! Further delay is dangerous!

Yours for Spiritualism,
HARRISON D. BARRETT.

Lake Brady Camp.

The meeting of July at Brady Camp was a success, fair weather, a fair audience and fine speakers.

Mrs. Slaughter, Mrs. Judson and Robert Charlie have been engaged for the season to furnish the instrumental music, piano, violin and cornet.

The president, Mr. Hunger, who is a photographer, has donated a picture of the Fox Sisters; he has put them together in one group, and has a copyright on it, so anyone wishing a copy must get it of him.

Dr. Knowles, the Chairman, opened the morning session by reading a poem, "A Gentle Creed," by Ella Wheeler Wilcox. Mrs. D. A. Morrill, the speaker for the day, took for her topic, "How to Unfold," handling it in her usual masterful way. In the afternoon her lecture was on nearly the same lines. This concludes her engagement at Brady for this season, to the sincere regret of her many friends. Trusting she may be with us again next season, we wish her God-speed in her work.

The new rooming house is full and the dining hall well patronized.

Vermont Spiritualist Convention.

The Vermont State Spiritualist Association held the Semi-Annual Conventionin G. A. R. hall, Montpelier, Vt., June 15 and 16, 1907. The following Vermont State speakers were present: Mr. A. F. Hubbard, Tyson, Vt.; Mrs. Effie I. Chapman, Cambridge, Vt.; Mrs. Laura Cummings, Hardwick, Vt. The president, Mrs. Effie Chapman, in the chair. The opening session was taken up with short speeches from different ones.

Mr. Hubbard spoke of the opening dawn of the Twentieth Century; how it brought us in touch with the higher life and the angel world; what progress had been made in the last century, and still more to follow in this. He gave a short account of his southern trip to Lake Helen, Florida; what a lovely country it is there, and what enthusiasm was manifested there in relation to our cause. He spoke of a little incident that happened on his trip back, about a ship in distress, and then sending out a message by wireless telegraphy for help.

Mr. Hubbard is a very able speaker and his lectures are very interesting and instructive.

Music was furnished by Miss Pansy Severance, of Montpelier. She is a fine soloist and her music was very inspiring.

Mrs. Chapman is a fine lecturer and she has a very pleasing way of giving spirit messages, with the best of satisfaction. May she live long to bring comfort to the sorrowing ones of earth.

Mrs. Cummings lectured twice. Her subjects were: "The Creed to Be," and "The New Religion." She handled the subjects in a way that showed she was in touch with progress and the higher life.

The fairest of weather and the best of harmony made our convention one long to be remembered.

PASSED TO SPIRIT LIFE.

[Obituaries to the extent of ten lines only will be inserted free. All in excess of ten lines will be charged at the rate of fifteen cents per line. About 7 words constitute a line.]

John Ray, an old-time Spiritualist, passed to higher life, July 2. Rev. G. E. Chesbro ably officiated. Mrs. Maud Chesbro, inspired by the arisen brother, gave appropriate remarks to the friends and to the brothers of his lodge, F. U. A. The sweet voice of Arthur Howe, president C. S. S. A., soothed the audience with his solos. An onlooker said: "That kind of service brings peace and hope, and shows us our duty to our fellowman here and hereafter.

FRANK WERNER.

Passed to spirit life, at Ft. Wayne, Ind., Charles A. Burchard, June 22, 1907, age 55 years of age. The deceased was a staunch Spiritualist for many years, his wife being a fine medium. Spiritualistic services were held at the home of the deceased, and was largely attended. H. Brindle officiated.

Dr. Alfred Russell Wallace, the world renowned English Scientist and philosopher, in a recent letter to Dr. Bland, pays a high tribute to his new book, "Pioneers of Progress." He says in part: "I have read your 'Pioneers of Progress' with much interest and pleasure. I like the style, which is simple and effective, and in brief space you give an excellent idea of the men. It makes me wish for more. I thank you for what you say about me." This charming book is for sale at this office., for $1.00.

A MASTERLY WORK.

Continuity of Life a Cosmic Truth

By Prof. W. M. Lookwood.

A masterly presentation of an important subject. A powerful argument along new and scientific lines, establishing on a scientific basis the fact of the continuity of personal individual conscious selfhood after laying aside the physical body. A book of rare value. With several fine illustrations. Cloth. $1.00.

Science and a Future Life.

By Prof. James H. Hyslop. Price $1.50; Postage 10 cents.

This work is one of the most valuable acquisitions to the literature of Modern Spiritualism that has appeared of late years. It is scientific in its method, profound in its ethical deductions, unanswerable in its logic, and above all sympathetic to the truth whatever it may be and wherever it may be found. QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

This department is under the management of

HUDSON TUTTLE.

Address him at Berlin Heights, Ohio.

NOTE—The Questions and Answers have called forth such a host of respondents, that to give all equal hearing compels the answers to be made in the most condensed form, and often clearness is perhaps sacrificed to this forced brevity. Proofs have to be omitted, and the style becomes thereby assertive, which of all things is to be deprecated. Correspondents often weary with waiting for the appearance of their questions and write letters of inquiry. The supply of matter is always several weeks ahead of space given, and hence there is unavoidable delay. Every one has to wait his time and place, and all are treated with equal favor.

NOTICE.—No attention will be given anonymous letters. Full name and address must be given, or the letters will not be read. If the request be made the name will not be published. The correspondence of this department has become excessively large, especially letters of inquiry requesting private answers, and while I freely give whatever information I am able, the ordinary courtesy of correspondents is expected.

HUDSON TUTTLE.

E. A. Crepin.—Q. What is your opinion of the book "Angelic Wisdom Concerning the Divine Providence," by Emanuel Swedenborg?

A.—While the high order of the mediumship of the Swedish seer cannot be called in question, unfortunately he was so saturated by his education and surroundings with superstition that his inspirations are all colored therewith. His cardinal doctrine of "biblical correspondence" is interesting as a theory, but has no support beyond his assertion. His books were written in Latin, and the verbose, involved and wearisome prolixity of his style, made more conspicuous by the translators. The reader constantly feels that he is being led through a fog by one who sees through the mists no better than himself.

With these characteristics of the seer, while he at times voices truth, at all times he looks through colored glasses, and must be taken with reservation.

J. B. Alson.—Q. Is it a superstition, or is it founded on fact, that there are more deaths at the going out of the tide?

A.—There is sound science in this saying. It is a fact, from some inscrutable reason, the aged and infirm are most subject to be called at the ebb-tide. A Connecticut physician says: "I have stood by hundreds of deathbeds of fishermen and farmers, old and young, during the last quarter of a century, but I can hardly recall a single instance of a person dying of disease who did not pass away while the tide was ebbing. If a patient who is very low lives to see the current turn from ebb to flow, I know the case is safe till the ebb sets in again."

Of twenty-one cases observed by Captain Edwards, at Orient, Long Island, with only one exception, the aged of those suffering from long sickness died at the ebb of the tide.

Not that the coming and going of the ocean wave as it rolls around the world has special influence; the cause is more profound, and blended with the force of gravitation. Not only is the ocean agitated and piled up beneath the moon. The deeper and more elastic aerial sea is more strongly fluctuated, and the electric and magnetic conditions change with certain periodicity. The maximum of positive force is attained at high tide, constantly increasing as the tide comes in, and then recedes to the zero of negativeness with its outgoing. With the flood of water and higher pressure of atmosphere, the forces of life are stimulated by the increasing positiveness. When these stimulants withdraw, the influence runs to the negative pole, and the spirit ebbs from the mortal shore.

During health these subtile changes are not felt, or too feebly to be remarked. During sickness the physical energies are so enfeebled that slight forces turn the balance for or against.

It is well known that many diseases are aggravated by the approach of night, while others are most severe during the day. All nervous ailments become intensified at the approach of night. During the day the half of the earth illuminated is positive to the other half remaining in darkness. Hence the sensations of evening are different from those of morning. The day is positive, for the whole lighted hemisphere is positive, and the opposite is negative.

T. D.—Q. Can a good, honest, pure-minded person become obsessed, or does like beget like, in that as in everything else in nature?

A.—Experience and conclusions reached by experienced observers seem to conclusively show that low and mischievous spirits cannot control the pure-minded and honest sensitive. "Obsession" is understood by this correspondent as having the usual meaning given that word, the possession and continuous control by an evil-disposed spirit. A loving and pure spirit might control in precisely the same manner, but it would not continue if it produced annoyance and discomfort. It may be taken as a general expression of the truth, that as the recipient is—not in exterior appearance, but in inner soul—will be the spiritual beings who can come near to him, and the more similarity, the nearer will they approach, and more persistent their abiding.

E. W.—Q. What is the difference between diabetes and Bright's disease? Are they curable?

A.—There is a wide difference. Bright's disease, or nephria, is a degeneration of the epithelium of the kidneys whereby the excretory functions of those organs is impaired, and albumen excreted. The presence of this albumen is an important indication of the disease, and shows that, contrary to the received theory, the trouble alone lies in the kidneys; that it involves the digestion which takes place in the blood.

Diabetes may not in the least disturb the healthy functions of the kidneys. It appears in two forms: insipidus and mellitus—the latter being usually understood when the disease is mentioned. The first is not alarming, but may drift into the latter, which may be set down as incurable. It involves the processes of blood-digestion, the sugar and starch in the food remaining, in the partially digested state, as a form of grape sugar (in the scarcely distinguishable modifications of muscle-sugar and liver-sugar). The secretion of the kidneys is excessive and sweet from the excreted sugar.

As for cure, medical science is hopeless for a remedy and the treatment is empirical, and simply bluff. Whatever may be done, the end is certain, yet the patient may be relieved and life indefinitely prolonged by careful diet, and as far as possible removing the causes. As in diabetes, the starch and sugar are excreted only partially digested, and hence cause a waste of energy instead of strengthening; they are useless or harmful as food. Substances like gluten flour, eggs, milk, etc., should be selected.

But the physician who holds out the hope of permanent cure of these diseases when well established, knows very well it is an illusive dream that will not be realized. Hold fast to right living when well. Do not believe for a moment that the human body is like a machine that can be repaired by some mechanical tinker, and oiled, with medicines so as to run easy as when new.

A GOLDEN SHEAF.

To Our Friends: — October next will bring the 50th anniversary of our marriage, and nearly the 55th of our labor in the field of Spiritualism. In the first years we published a volume, "Blossoms of Our Spring," thinking that should the time come in the autumn of life, we would have a volume fitting the occasion of the closing years, of fruitage. A half-century has almost gone by, and this 50th anniversary gives the occasion for the issuance of this volume, which we have entitled A GOLDEN SHEAF. It will be made up of selections from matter not before published, in prose and verse; selections of the best sentences and paragraphs scattered through our various books; a new spiritual song with music; illustrations of fac simile automatically written manuscripts; photogravures of our home, birthplace, and brief autobiographical sketches

We propose to make the book in paper and binding as superior as the price, $1.00, will permit. Every copy will be numbered and contain our autographs.

The number of copies will be strictly limited to the number of subscribers, and the book will not be placed on sale after publication. As we have reached the conclusion to publish at a somewhat late date, if you favor the undertaking you will confer a favor by sending your name, by card or letter, at once (the price is not now wanted).

A list of names of subscribers will be published in the volume.

We thank you beforehand for your favor in inviting our book to your homes.

Mrs. Martha Woolsey in the East.

To the Editor:—I left Indianapolis, June 20, and had a very pleasant trip. I arrived at Newport News on the evening of the 21st, and had to wait for some time for a boat to convey us across to Norfolk. It was a delightful trip.

The city proper is quite a business place, but very uncleanly and negroes at every step—beggars everywhere.

Well, I took in the Exposition. The ride by Ocean View is a delightful one, and about fifteen miles, and every time the car stops, one comes and collects a fare. Great crowds get off at Ocean View; it is a beautiful place, but few stay on for the Exposition. The grounds are not near completed; and the buildings not half done; the exhibits not more than half in place.

Well, I must say something of Spiritualism. There it is on the decline, or never has been resurrected, I don't know which.

The officials will not allow, so they say, a Spiritualist to come there and give lectures and tests from a public platform, and take money at the door. All mediums must pay a license of one hundred dollars for one day or one year's work, and this does not entitle you to hold public meetings.

Our next trip was a delightful one, up the Bay to Washington. I took in the sights there a few days and also called on Brother Barrett and Prof. and Mrs. Longley, and spent a very enjoyable hour with them.

I hope to meet lots of Indiana and Illinois people at the convention, and hope every society will feel it a duty to be represented there. Let them feel that each one makes our own beautiful religion still stronger and paves the way to a brighter future. We cannot stand alone, friends, everywhere, buckle on your armor. Conie prepared to work for the good, the true and the beautiful, and success will only follow you.

Humane Education.

A Lecture by Mrs. Emma Rood Tuttle, before the Literary Club at Berlin Heights, O.

Madame Chairman and Friends:—I was more than glad when the ladies of the T. T. C. programmed this afternoon for the consideration of Humane Education. It is a good subject to be understood, because if it is once comprehended it is never set aside, but is a guide to good actions every day. It civilizes, it refines, it benefits the whole world for it unitizes all sentient life.

The result of humane education is to make us considerate of the sensibilities of others; to feel their needs and try to relieve their sufferings; to be kind, benevolent, and to make all lives happy lives, whether of humans or animals. A good humanitarian is in touch with every creature about him, and tries to get at the understanding of things. He works for a moral brotherhood, and that aim has been growing through all ages.

Whether we wish to or not, we must learn our lessons, and we must put them into practice.

From low to high the notion of eliminating barbarism and cultivating civilization is growing and spreading out.

Just recently our loved President Roosevelt has been taking a strong lesson in humane education from Mr. William J. Long, the nature writer, whose books Mr. Roosevelt, who is a hunter but not a naturalist, took it upon himself to criticise, and to state that Mr. Long is not true to nature. Mr. Long refutes this by giving the way he gets at the hearts of the wild things, and how Mr. Roosevelts gets at their hearts. The latter goes out to hunt, and the only way he gets at their hearts is to put bullets into them—the more the better—not to use, but to kill. He quotes from Mr. Roosevelt's own books to prove the accusation. Here is one instance of a sportsman's keen enjoyment: A deer and fawn appear. "He bore his antlers aloft; the snow lay thick on his mane; he sniffed the air as he walked. As I drew a bead his bearing of self-confidence changed to one of alarm. My bullet smote through the shoulder blades and he plunged wildly forward and fell full length on the blood-stained snow. I jumped off my horse and covered the fawn. As I pulled the trigger, down went the deer, the bullet having gone into the back of its head. I felt much pleased with it. My nerves were thrilling and my heart beating with eager, fierce excitement. Drawing a fine bead, I pressed the trigger. He did not reel, but I knew he was mine, for the blood sprang from both his nostrils and he fell, dying on his side before he had gone thirty rods, his hind quarters trailing. Racing forward I broke his neck. Two moose birds followed the wounded bull as he dragged his great carcass down the hill, and pounced with ghoulish bloodthirstiness on the gouts of blood that sprinkled the green herbage."

Was it after such a hunt that Mr. Roosevelt wrote: "No sportsman can ever feel keener pleasure and self-satisfaction than when he walks up to a grand elk lying dead in the cool shade of the evergreen."

It is a barbarous way to take pleasure. It is not the way of the scholar and naturalist, and we are sure that Mr. Roosevelt will feel, after his lesson from Mr. Long, that he is only a big boy in the primary, when he sets out to criticise the nature-writers who go into the solitudes to learn the heart of the wild things, "never killing except when in need of food, and then with a heartache." He will have a conviction that he needed a lesson, just such as William J. Long has given him, and which press and people approve.

Looking back we could learn a lesson from Pharaoh, of the twenty-fifth dynasty, who left a sermon in stone which has recently been deciphered and thus brought from ancient Egypt into the present:

In an inscription on an Egyptian memorial stone discovered recently at Mount Barkal, there is evidence that acts of cruelty in high places by educated men were severely punished in the days of the twenty-fifth dynasty in the land of the Pharaohs. Dr. Brugsch thus translates the passage to which we refer:

"When his majesty visited the stables and the studs of foals, he observed that they had let them starve. He said, 'I swear, as surely as the youthful Sun-god Ra loves me, as surely as I breathe in life, it is a viler thing to my heart to let the horses starve than all the other faults that thou hast committed. That thou hast laid thy heart bare through this, evidence is furnished me of thy habitual views. Hast thou forgotten that the shadow of God rests upon me? The proof thereof shall not be wanting to Him on my part. Would that another had done such a thing to me, an ignorant man, not a haughty one, as he is. I was born out of my mother's womb, and created out of the egg of a divine essence. I was begotten by a God—by his name; I will not forget Him in what He has commanded me to do." Then he ordered his (Nimrod's) possessions to be assigned to the treasury, and his granaries to the property of the government. Amen of Apet."

Looking again into the past we find that the ancient Greeks were most merciful to animals, and that it was a part of their religion to be so. Death and torture had no place in their daily pastimes. The laws of justice and mercy were strenuously observed, and the entire scope and bearing of humane education was comprehended by the Greeks as by no other nation in that remote age.

Triptolemus was one of the most learned and cultivated men of his century. One of his three precepts was, "Hurt not animals." He it was whom the people of Attica honored as being chosen by the goddess Ceres to drive her chariot, drawn by two dragons, to distribute corn all over the earth and establish festivals, to commemorate the great good of the grain in making bread.

Phocius expatiates with delight on one occurrence which gave an opportunity for a strong expression against cruelty as disqualifying a man for the administration of justice.

The Areopagites of Athens was a society of the highest importance. It looked after the welfare of the nation; its morals, health, the treasury, idleness—which it regarded as the most dangerous of vices. It aimed to secure the administration of justice. The members must lead noble and blameless lives. Their demeanor must be serious. Their meetings were held in the open air, usually at Mars Hill, a short distance from the Acropolis in Athens. It was a Court of Justice.

In an open space were two rough stone seats; one for the defendant and one for his accuser. In trying the cases no blandishments of oratory were used for fear they might bias the judgment. Decisions were rendered in the night, that the eyesight might not divert from justice.

One of these august meetings was convened on Mars Hill one day in old Greece, when it chanced that a tragedy was going on in the air overhead. A sparrow was pursued by a hawk and to escape death the little bird flew down and took refuge in the bosom of one of the members, a man who was naturally of a harsh, cruel disposition. He seized the little trembler and threw it so violently from him that it died instantly.

The whole assemblage was disgusted with his refusal of protection to the helpless sparrow, and declared it showed a lack of principle, which would interfere with the administration of justice.

By the unanimous vote of the society the cruel man was deprived of his senatorial dignity and barred from membership in the Areopagites.

We hold that a thorough humane education will build up men and women who can be trusted in all positions they qualify to fill.

MAN, KNOW THYSELF.

Gerald Maesey on the So-Called Christian History.

To the Editor:—I would like to draw the attention of your many readers to the champion trust-breaker, Gerald Massey, in the Historical Jesus and the Mythical Christ, a book of 224 pages. Gerald Massey, being like Thomas Paine, turning his spiritual searchlight onto the false trust established by the Emperor Constantine, in the year 325. On pages 178-9 of the book we find the following:

"Never were men more perplexed and bewildered than the agnostic Christians of the third and fourth centuries, who had started from a new beginning altogether, which they had been taught to consider solely historic, when they turned to look back for the first time to find that an apparition of their faith was following them one way and confronting them in another; a shadow that threatened to steal away their substance, mocking them in its aerial unreality; the ghost of the body of truth which they had embraced as a solid and eternal reality, claiming to be the rightful owner of their possessions; a phantom Christ occurred in cloud-land; a parody of the drama of salvation performed in the air, with never a cross to cling to; not a nail wound to thrust the fingers into and hold on by; not one drop of blood to wash away their sins.

It was horrible, it was devilish. It was the devil, they said, and thus they sought to account for gnosticism and fight down their fears.

"You poor ignorant idiots," said the gnostics, "you have mistaken the mysteries of old for your modern history, and accepted literally all that was only meant mystically."

"You spawn of Satan," responded the Christians, "you are making the mystery of converting our accomplished facts into your miserable fables; you are dissipating and dispersing into thin air our only bit of solid foothold in the world, stained with the red drops of calvary. You are giving a satanic interpretation to the word of revelation, and falsifying the oracles of God. You are converting the solid facts of our history into your new-fangled allegories."

"Nay," replied the gnostics, "it is you who have taken the allegories of mythology for historic facts," and they were right.

It was in consequence of their taking the allegorical tradition of the fall for reality that the Christian fathers considered woman to be accursed and called her a serpent, a scorpion, the devil in feminine form.

Such was the Christian trust that was organized by the Emperor Constantine in 325, which Gerald Massey worked at twelve years faithfully to discover its falsehood, and hypnotic power, that the writer of the Great Psychological Crime is warning humanity about, so they can escape the withering curse of hypnotism that is being used so freely at present by mortals and spirits to the detriment of all that comes under its blighting curse. Man, know thyself.

THOMAS PAINE.

Freedom bent over thy cradle the day
thou first saw thy mother,
Lighting thine eye from hers as a flame leaps on a new altar:
High and serene at the startling out,
fed by the woe of thy brothers,
Soon, soon roaring and spreading the doom of Cant and Oppression;
Melting and fusing cold T formulas.
Strange stuff was this new metal
Flung on Thor's anvil before thee, hot, strong smith of Equality,
Hammering eyes into sword-points,
filling the world with the clamor,
Liberty! Liberty! Liberty! blows like passionate heart-beats,
Only to find thou were freeing arms to be quick raised against thee.
Casting thy life in the balance, vainly, for that of a puppet;
Then at the last in the prison, planning to topple the temple,
Seeing the sword over-pass thee. Dying alone in the open—
Ishmael, to storm down the centuries, a ghost fighting ghosts and forever.

Morris Pratt Institute

The catalogues and circulars of the Morris Pratt Institute—17,000 of them—are now ready for distribution. In sending these where they will do the most good, you who read this article can be of great assistance.

Do you not know of workers in our ranks who would be benefited by a two-years course at this school? If so, please send me their names and addresses, that I may write them and send them notices of the school.

Do you not know of others, not active workers, but who could become so did they possess a better education? If so, will you not hand me their names and addresses also?

Do you not know of people who have a taste for study and who have money and time to gratify that taste for self-improvement and yet are too old to enter the public school, and who are not qualified to pass the examination required to enter any other advanced institution of learning? If so, please let me have their addresses, that I may inform them of this school, where no examination is required and where anyone over fifteen can enter.

Do you not know of Spiritualist parents who have sons or daughters graduated from the public school and yet who intend to give them a still higher or more special education? If so, please write me of them, that they may be made to know they are not obliged to send their children to institutions where Spiritualism is ignored and often insulted.

Do you not know of men and women who would like to fit themselves to be workers with tongue and pen in the great field of human welfare outside as well as inside the ranks of Spiritualism? If so, and you will inform me, I will write them and call their attention to the advantages of this school over the more conservative schools of the land.

Furthermore, if there is a society of Spiritualists in your city or town of which you are a member or with which you are acquainted, is there not some one of its members whom the society would be glad to aid in coming here? Some state associations have already voted to send one student from each of their respective states. Would it not be well for every state organization to do the same?

Not only does the school need students, but direct contributions of money as well. I receive letters from those who want to come, and who ought to come, but who are kept from coming by the lack of means. Are you not willing to aid such? Can you contribute money for a noble purpose?

The world needs nothing so much as schools whose class-room work is illumined by the light of Spiritualism; as teachers, who understand and accept the principles of our phenomena and philosophy. We have heretofore bent all our efforts toward pushing Spiritualism into the realm of religion. We have organized churches and religious bodies throughout our land that we might aid in reforming and even reconstructing the religion of the world. This is a noble work. But is it not time we take another step in advance by bearing Spiritualism still further on into another great field of human activity—into the field of education?

Let us not forget "'Tis education forms the common mind." Let us remember that it is the teacher more than the preacher or lecturer that moulds the character of the coming age. Spiritualism is needed nowhere more than in the educational world; and this is the very world we have neglected to enter. This school is its introduction into that world, and this introduction must not, shall not fail. The school is small now, but the Spiritualists of America have the students, the money and the ability to give it a commanding position among the schools of our land.

I can remember when Oberlin was the only college of letters in this country which admitted women on an equality with men. Now co-education is almost universal. Morris Pratt Institute is the first school in America, or even in the world, to admit Spiritualism and make it one of its chief corner stones. Doing this is a new departure in Spiritualist work, and it calls for the support of every man, woman and child in our ranks. It calls for students; it calls for money; it calls for sympathy; it calls for words of encouragement from every speaker on our platform and every writer for our papers and periodicals.

Spiritualists of America! Send your young people; send your sons and daughters, seeking an education, to Morris Pratt Institute instead of patronizing Unitarian or other Christian institutions, unless you wish to be disloyal to truth and to yourselves.

This magnificent property, worth from $15,000 to $20,000, and almost free from debts, belongs to the Spiritualists of America so long as it is used for School purposes. When such a noble gift as this is made to us and we prove unfaithful to the trust or incapable of its proper management, or indifferent to its interests, can we find fault if moneyed men bequeathe their property to Christian or other people who are glad to accept it and use it? If we turn our backs on education—on genuine intellectual culture—can we or ought we to expect to have the confidence of the educational, or even of the commercial, world?

Let this call go to the head and heart of every Spiritualist in America. This school has been deeded by Morris Pratt to you and it is yours.

What are you going to do with it? Let us prove by our words and acts that Morris Pratt did not cast his pearls before swine. Let us repudiate such an idea. It is false.

TAKE NOTICE!

Spiritualists Everywhere Be On the Alert.

Spiritualists of the United States, do you want Spiritualism properly represented in the report of the Director of the Census? If so, urge the officers of your local and State association to fill and return the card sent them long ago, by the Department. Every opportunity has been given us to prove by figures how many we are, and it will be our own fault if we are incorrectly reported. Spiritualists, have you the courage to stand up and be counted? If so, send in the reports of your local societies.

Interesting Notes of Work.

Letter From Mrs. Anna L. Gillespie.

Since leaving Pittsburg I have had a busy time of it, but it has been a pleasant one. On my way down the coast I stopped at San Francisco, and words fail to describe the awful changes since I last was there; but in spite of the unhappy state of affairs, the city is growing phenomenally, and debris is fast giving way to order and progress. I was most cordially and lovingly entertained at the handsome home of Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Wells, where also was Aunt Fanny, of my old home, and they made my stay most pleasant. On the following Sunday I met with the Lyceum, which is under the care of Mr. Wadsworth, who, under the most trying circumstances, is holding the scattered children together in a wonderful manner. We had a good lyceum and a most happy time. In the evening I lectured for the Ladies' Aid Society, of which Mrs. Ella York is most able president. A large audience welcomed me, many of whom were members of the People's Church. Memories of all the happy past brought smiles and tears, but with all it was a glorious meeting.

Thursday the several societies tendered me a reception at the home of Mrs. Sexton, where a dainty collation was served and a happy social time was enjoyed. From there my course was due south and I arrived in Los Angeles on Saturday afternoon. The following day I found I was advertised for five addresses: Lyceum, Mrs. Vlasek's meeting, to open the Los Angeles Camp in the afternoon with an address, address the Young People's Progressive Club at 6:30 p. m., and a lecture for Truth Seekers' Society at 8 p. m. It was a strenuous day, but a happy one, for never have I met with a warmer welcome, meeting old friends from many cities as well as the resident city. On Monday evening the State Association and local societies under management of President Arthur Howe and Mrs. Howe, gave me a public reception at Burbank Hall. Many speakers took part, among them Mr. and Mrs. Howe, Mrs. Nettie Howell, Mrs. Ada Patterson, Mrs. Vlasek and many others. I must not forget to mention the address of the president of the Young People's Progressive society. This society is one of the best signs of the growth of Spiritualism in the city of Los Angeles. They are a splendid working body, and as an honorary member I am truly proud of its work, and wish for it all the success its earnest efforts can make. This society and lyceum are both under the directorship of Sister Vlasek, who is one of our best lyceum workers and builders, and whom it was a pleasure to meet. In fact the cause of Spiritualism in Los Angeles is a growing one and every meeting well attended. The camp opened with a large attendance and best of conditions, and gives evidence of being one of the best. The situation of the grounds is ideal, and best of all nearly clear from debt.

The Truth Seekers' Society, where I lectured at night, had an overflow meeting; the hall could not accommodate all who came.

After a pleasant introduction by the president, Mr. Dryden gave a short address in a most able manner, followed by a solo by Mrs. Lettie Allen, after which the writer was presented for an address. Mr. Gillespie had then joined me and we started out for the trip to San Diego. It was full of pleasant events, meeting there Mr. John Ring, the pastor of the church there, and Mr. Buss and family and Brother Gaines and family of Anderson, Ind, with many new friends.

My work there consisted of a lecture Monday night in the new church owned by the society, and of which they may well be proud. It is most modern and complete in every respect. Mr. Ring, as resident party, is doing a great work for the young people and lyceum, as well as for the older ones, and is loved by all. On the following night the lyceum gave a unique reception to the writer, holding a lyceum session in full to show their work, which is splendid in every respect. This was followed by short speeches and addresses by children. One of the happiest events was the presentation to Mr. C. Buss by Mr. Ring of a handsome gold badge as a token of the love and appreciation felt for him by the lyceum. A handsome donation was also made the writer to assist in the expenses of traveling, and a store of good words with it. It was a grand meeting and the value of lyceum work was most apparent. A trip to National Park next day, where to our surprise we found a lovely little church owned free from debt by the society under charge of Mrs. Jane Lemmon, a grand worker and loved and respected by all. We had a fine meeting, with Mr. Ring as speaker of the day, whilst I followed with a few remarks which were all too weak to express my delight at the pleasant meetings.

After lingering good-byes we left the beautiful city of San Diego, only hoping that the wings of fate would some day blow us back to the dear friends who made our trip so delightful. We stopped over one Sunday on our return trip, taking part in the meeting conducted by Mrs. Nettie Howell, known as the People's Mission. Mr. Will Hodge was speaker and gave one of his best lectures. It was truly a pleasure to listen. The audience was large for the morning. Mr. Gillespie sang and I helped a little and we had a most enjoyable time. In the evening I lectured for Mrs. Vlasek to a large audience, thus closing my work in Los Angeles.

I stopped in San Francisco for an all-day meeting, beginning with lyceum and ending late at night. Mrs. Wells, Mrs. Place and Mrs. York gave addresses and a number of message bearers assisted. It was a grand day, every moment full of interest. I can't tell how I felt when leaving all the dear ones there. It seemed as if they had doubly endeared themselves to me. I must not forget to speak of the entertainment by Mrs. Thomas Johnson and Mrs. O'Brien, for they were among the pleasantest of the many kindnesses shown us.

Mr. Howe, as State president, and his able board, are doing a great work for our cause, and too much cannot be said as to the results of his most earnest efforts. God and the angels bless California, and out of the sorrow of its past, the trouble of its present, may it rise to greater heights and grander work, is the prayer of ANNA L. GILLESPIE.

"How to Train Children and Parents." Mrs. Elisabeth Towne takes the position that in many cases it is the parents that need the training more than the children, and advises parents to look to themselves. Twenty-five cents could not be better spent than in buying this little book. Anyone that has the care of children should read it. Price 25 cents.

THE WATER WITCH.

Some Interesting Particulars in Regard to It.

In No. 917 Progressive Thinker, I find an article entitled "The Water Witch," signed Geo. Thomas, bearing on what he designates "The Water Witch Superstition." His criticisms are laughable.

During the last 20 years I have repeatedly seen the fact demonstrated that certain people of sensitive natures can and do designate localities where those wishing to dig wells can find a supply of water.

My cousin, Justin Hulburd, was such a sensitive. Twenty-one years ago, being desirous of locating a well to supply the house with water, I requested Justin to assist in selecting a spot most desirable for sinking a well to give us a permanent supply. I procured for him a crotched branch of willow, which he took in his hands, walked around the premises, and finally designated a spot which he said would furnish what we wished.

We located the well at the spot he indicated and from that time to this have a bountiful supply of good water, the drouth of several years in Southern California having no perceptible effect except a slight diminution in the quantity.

A widow lady living near us wishing a well, requested Justin to locate one for her. He went to her premises and told her where to dig, but the location not suiting her, she said she didn't take much stock in witches, and selected another place, with the result of digging to a great depth without finding water.

I several times took the "witch hazel" and went over the same ground after Justin, holding the stick exactly as he did, but could obtain no movement, others had the same experience. Your correspondent's statement in regard to the manipulation of the "witch hazel" by the witch, or sensitive is simply bosh. I have watched Justin and others, and know there was nothing of the kind. Justin told me that at the same time the "hazel" moved he felt a strong influence in his legs, that as he walked beyond the certain spot that feeling would cease, at the same time the "hazel" stop moving, I have seen the matter tested scores of times, resulting as Justin stated it would.

I had a neigbor who was a highly educated lawyer and an ex-judge, who would frequently, through a metallic witch indicate where water or mineral could be found. He located several gold bearing ledges in San Diego County, all of which turned out as he predicted, when developed.

He traced the course of the subterranean stream supplying our well with water. He followed it about three-fourths of a mile in all its windings, until it apparently reached the Sweetwater river. During the years of drouth, when the Sweetwater showed no running water above this spot, it was always running below it, which proved he was correct.

A neighbor who, for three years resided in a house near mine, was of the same sensitive nature as Cousin Justin. The witch hazel would turn for him and he would feel the same sensation in his legs. They both said they did not require the forked branch.

The Thomas article reminds me of a seance given by Wm. Eddy in Ohio. I forget the name of the town—which I attended. I had heard he was there and with two others I went from Cleveland to witness materialization. We arrived there in the evening and after supper at the hotel, went to Mr. Eddy's residence in the outskirts of the town. It was a cold winter night and we found him and his family huddled around the kitchen fire. He said he had not intended giving any seance that evening, but as we had come from Cleveland he would see if the spirit would assist him. With our assistance a big box-like arrangement was moved and placed in a doorway for a cabinet. It was enclosed on the back, both sides and both ends. It filled the doorway exactly, except there was a space of about an inch between the top and the door casing. Then a curtain was hung, covering the entire front of the cabinet.

Mr. Eddy entered the cabinet and soon spirits began appearing all sizes, from small children to large, tall men and women appeared. As we were returning to the hotel we naturally talked of the manifestations, when one of the gentlemen remarked that he thought it wonderful until it occurred to him how easy it would be for a confederate to get in the top of the cabinet and push the clothing through that space between the cabinet and the door casing, with the curtain hung close to the wood. Every spirit that appeared was clothed differently from the others. Some children, some adults of both sexes, 12 to 15 in all. No two dressed alike, and the curtain was not disturbed. That man and your correspondent were endowed with about the same reasoning faculties.

During my pilgrimage of eighty years I have many times seen verified the truth of the old adage, "None so blind as they who will not see."

E. W. HULBURD.

WARNING.

The paths of life are devious;
Tread carefully, my boy,
For days of gloom and nights of doom
Go forth in hand with joy.

Beware of witching damsels, boy,
Whose charms strange ways may prove,
For this is not the sacred spot
Where dwells the God of Love.

Judge not too quickly, it is not Within your hands to give
The words to chide or hands to guide
The sinner here to live.

Be kind to older persons, boy,
No manhood can be true
That seeks for youth without a truth;
Be sure it is not you.

Trust not to those who show you, boy,
Where leads the path of scorn,
For those, too soon o'er waning moon
Will break the judgment morn.

UNIVERSAL SPIRITUALISM

Spirit Communion in All Ages, Among All People—by W. J. Colville.

This work has two distinctive features: (1st) A resume of the Spiritual faith and practice of Egypt, India, Persia, Greece, Rome, China, Japan, and other ancient nations, not excepting Europe during Christian centuries. (2) A summary of recent experiences in America, Great Britain, Australia, France, Germany, Italy, and other modern lands, all tending to show the persistent continuity of spiritual revelation. Clairvoyance, Telepathy, and Psychic Phenomena in general is dealt with in separate chapters at the end of the volume, making it a highly useful textbook for all who are interested in the great question of human immortality. The Author says: "The libraries contain a large number of extremely valuable works dealing with every imaginable phase of Spiritualism and occultism, but I have searched in vain for a single portable volume, issued at a popular price, which gives a brief and lucid statement of the claims made in all ages and in all countries on behalf of the mighty truth of communion between inhabitants of earth and dwellers disrobed of flesh in the one vast spiritual universe. The enormous and ever increasing interest in "Psychic" problems and the eager, constant demand for historic information coupled with a rational setting forth of intelligible spiritual philosophy, has led me to appear once again before the public with a book." Price $1.00.

AFFLICTIONS OF THE EYE

Successfully Treated By "ACTINA"
Without Cutting or Drugging
SPECTACLES MAY BE ABANDONED

There is no need of cutting, drugging or probing the eye for the relief of most forms of disease, as a new method—the Actina treatment—has been discovered which eliminates the necessity of former torturous methods. There is no risk or necessity of experiment, as many people report having been cured of failing eyesight, cataracts, granulated lids and other afflictions of the eye after being pronounced incurable, through this grand discovery.

THESE LETTERS SHOULD CONVINCE YOU

Inflamed Eyelids Cured. Eyesight Improved.

Petersburg, Tenn., Oct. 6th, 1906.

GENTLEMEN:—I have been using one of your "Actinas," and am glad to testify that I have been greatly benefited by its use. My eyelids were much inflamed, and my sight failing fast—but now they are entirely free from inflammation—and my sight much strengthened. Think it has benefited my voice, also. I believe it will do all that is claimed for it.

MRS. S. R. RAMSEY.

Would Have Been Blind but for the Timely Use of "Actina."

Beauvoir, Miss., July 27th, 1906.

GENTLEMEN:—I would have been, I think, entirely blind but for the benefit received from the "Actina." Am writing now without glasses. Am 76 years old and when my health is good I can read my Bible at night without my glasses. Could not do without "Actina." MRS. M. B. ATKINSON.

Eyesight Strengthened—Eye-Glasses Abandoned.

Methodist Parsonage, East Springfield, N. Y., Jan. 24th, 1907.

GENTLEMEN:—I want to send you a testimonial to the effect that "Actina" has had on my eyes. I have made a severe test of "Actina" by casting aside my glasses as soon as "Actina" came to me and have not had them on only, to see if any change had been wrought in the eye since treatment began.

My eyes gradually gained in strength and power by a faithful treatment by "Actina," and now my glasses are no longer necessary for I see as well, if not better without them.

I send this testimonial now, as I feel it is due to you gentlemen and to my fellowmen. I send it without solicitation on your part for I feel I owe you something in return for your liberal treatment. I have recommended "Actina" to all my friends.

You may use my name as reference.

Fraternally yours.

"Actina" Corrects Defect in Eyesight After Oculist Failed.

Los Angeles, Cal., Jan. 15th, 1907.

GENTLEMEN:—About two years ago my eyesight began to fail very rapidly. I consulted the so-called scientific oculists and was examined by them and had special glasses made galore, but all to no avail. My eyes grew worse all the time and I had enough special made glasses to stock a peddler. To say that I was discouraged and heart-broken is putting it very mildly. My wife read of "Actina" and urged me to give it a trial. I read of a Mr. Baker of Ocean Park, Cal., a suburb of our city, who had used "Actina" with great success. I called on him at his home and he convinced me that "Actina" was just what I needed. I bought "Actina" and in less than 30 days threw away my glasses. I could scarcely read and write and then only for a few moments at a time. Thanks to "Actina" I now read and write for hours every day and night. I have never used "Actina" as often as per your directions, as I was too busy. I now use "Actina" once or twice a week and would not be without it for any amount of money.

Wishing you and "Actina" every success, I remain,
Very respectfully yours,
S. M. WALKER.
(Owner of Pioneer Boiler & Machine Works, S. W. Cor. Carolina and Palmetto Sts.)

Hundreds of other testimonial letters equally as strong will be sent on application.

Actina is purely a home treatment and can easily be used by anyone—and by all members of the family. It will save you many a doctor bill.

Actina will be sent on trial, postpaid. Send for Prof. Wilson's Treatise on Disease, it will interest you. It is Free. Address

The Grand Ledge Camp, Michigan.

Grand Ledge, Michigan, Spiritualist camp meeting opens July 21. The speakers and mediums engaged this year are among the best known on the Spiritualist platform.

The programme for the forenoons, Sundays and Mondays excepted, will be varied and interesting, consisting of mediums' meetings, conferences, etc. Mediums who are developing, as well as others, will have an opportunity to participate. These exercises are a great aid to those expecting to take up the work.

The fact that Oscar A. Edgerly is being engaged for the fourth season as speaker and chairman of our camp is sufficient warrant of his congenial and affable manner as chairman and entertaining and instructive as a speaker, to insure the successful direction of our present camp.

Mrs. A. E. Sheets, our former president and chairwoman for many years, is so thoroughly established in the hearts of the progressive and initiated public mind that the mere mention of her name as the first speaker upon the list is an agreeable insurance of intellectual eminence in spiritual ethics and oratorical pleasures for the opening session. Her homely welcome to each and all will be a cordial and sympathetic feature in the social environments of the camp.

Mrs. R. S. Lillie, known throughout the length and breadth of America as the "Queen of the Rostrum," is comparatively a new speaker with the patrons of Grand Ledge Camp, but who has been in the spiritual field since (nearly) the advent of modern Spiritualism, but because of the unremitting demand in other fields for her labors have we been unable heretofore to secure the services of this far-famed oratress. That her inspirational gems of thought will be a delightful treat is forecast in her presence with us.

Elizabeth Harlow, who was a new speaker with us last year, proved to be one of our best and will be with us again. She comes highly recommended to the management as having been long in her appointed vocation of saving souls to higher and brighter spiritual aspects of life here, while the future of eternity will take care of itself, and none should miss hearing her.

Mrs. A. Atcheson, of Buffalo, N. Y., with us last year for the first time, is a very good and true message medium, has acted as pastor of a Buffalo Society for several years and is highly recommended by them. She will give messages during the greater part of camp. They are always convincing and to the point.

Geo. A. Letford, known from North to South as the Drummer Medium, and one who has done some wonderful work in Georgia and Florida, where he travels, and has made the South more liberal toward Spiritualism, will also be in attendance and follow some of the lectures with messages.

Spiritualist, skeptic, and all friends are cordially invited to attend Grand Ledge Camp. Remember the date it opens, July 21st, lasting until August 18th. Don't fail to attend.

THE PATHWAY of the Human Spirit, or the Pathway of the Spirit Traced, by Dr. J. M. Peebles.

Did it pre-exist and does it reincarnate again into mortal life? When did it enter the body? What is its form—how does it relate to the soul body? Can it leave the human body and return again? Can it live in and control another mortal body? These questions and many others are asked and answered by the Doctor in this, his latest book, of two hundred pages. Price 75 cents; postage, 12 cents.

OUR CHILDREN.

Hints From Practical Experience for Parents and Teachers.—By Paul Carus.

In this little book "Our Children," Paul Carus offers a unique contribution to pedagogical literature. Without any theoretical pretensions it is a strong defense for the rights of the child, dealing with the responsibilities of parenthood, and with the first inculcation of fundamental ethics in the child mind and the true principles of correction and guidance. Each detail is forcefully illustrated by informal incidents from the author's experience with his own children, and his suggestions will prove of the greatest possible value to young mothers and kindergartners. Hints as to the first acquaintance with all branches of knowledge are touched upon—mathematics, natural sciences, foreign languages, etc.—and practical wisdom in regard to the treatment of money, hygiene and similar problems. 207 Pages. Price, cloth, $1.00.

CONCENTRATION.

A Valuable Work.

Concentration, Meditation and Inspiration. How to develop these desirable gifts according to the most approved methods of ancient and modern teachers, together with a set of six symbols comprising six months' study. By Laura G. Fixen.

A course of practical experimental lessons, of especial value and assistance to those who desire to be benefited by the development of powers of concentration of thought, clear meditation and superior inspiration.

SPIRITUALISM—Progress, the Universal Law of Nature; Thought, the Solvent of Her Problems.—SPIRITUALISM

VOL. 36 CHICAGO, ILL., JULY 27, 1907 NO. 922

THE FUTURE OF SPIRITUALISM.

Abstract of Lecture by Mr. Oscar A. Edgerly, Delivered Before the Worcester Association of Spiritualists, Sunday, June 9, 1907—Subject, "The Future of Spiritualism."

Mr. President, Ladies and Gentlemen:—Once again we are glad to find the requisite conditions whereby we can express, in a brief address, fragments of our independent thought. While a dweller in the earth world, he who speaks to you to-day was for forty years a Presbyterian minister, and to-day for the first time in all my public work, I am called upon to speak upon a subject selected and presented by one of my listeners, a subject I was not familiar with while dwelling in your midst, and one which at that time I would have refused to consider; as I believed it to be my duty to reject any innovation which was not in strict accordance with the tenets of my faith. This is a new departure, and the Spiritualists are the first to introduce it, however, I believe it to be the right one. In the past you all know there was a great distance between the man in the pulpit and the man in the pew. In those times the minister went into his pulpit and delivered a sermon and his listeners were supposed to sit like a young robin and accept anything that was offered them any argument, questioning, or antagonism on their part would call down upon their head the anathema of the church, and possibly excommunication. To-day, in the twentieth century of the world's progress, no man in the pulpit or on the rostrum has the right to claim he is greater than his listeners.

My friends, the brother has asked us to consider the future of Spiritualism. First, I would give my own definition of the word Spiritualism, which is Naturalism. While living in the material world, I labored for forty years, as I believed, to save the souls of men. I was sincere in my belief. I firmly believed that salvation through Christ was the only way, and when after forty years of faithful service I passed out of the material life, I had reason to expect I would be among the saved. I expected to hear the words, "Well done, good and faithful servant," and to the lost, "depart from me, ye cursed, into everlasting punishment."

But my expectations were not realized. As a decarnate spirit dwelling in the realm of souls, I have seen thousands of spirits enter the spirit world disappointed, unhappy, and I believe it devolves upon the Spiritualists to instruct the people, to prepare them for what is to follow in the next stage of existence, that their expectations may be fully realized.

At times, from the present outlook, it may seem as if Spiritualism was waning, but not so; there never was a time in the history of the movement when Spiritualism per se occupied the minds of the world's greatest thinkers as at the present. If we go back fifty years or more we will find that greater progress along all lines has been given to the world since the inception of modern Spiritualism. We see progress in the trial and sentence of your so-called criminal classes; we see progress in the care and treatment of your insane, in the beautiful parks which are laid out in all your large cities—those veritable breathing-places for the inmates of the tenement districts and those who are confined during the hours of the day in the factories of your large cities; we see progress in the religious thought of the world to-day, in the various cults which are springing up all over your land—"Christian Science," "Theosophy," "Mental Science," "New Thought"—all a part of Spiritualism; while to-day seemingly they do not affiliate with each other, and their paths seem to diverge, they will in the future converge and come together in one amalgamated whole.

To-day we see churches with their spires pointing heavenward adorned with a cross, the symbol of a by-gone age, colored glass windows with pictures representing the myths, the fables, the errors of the past. The meeting-house of the future will be erected on the grounds of your beautiful parks.

You ask, what is to be the future of Spiritualism? My friends, before me is a mental picture. I see a building, a temple, if you like—no spire adorned with a cross. We enter the building. Here we find the observatory of the astronomer, furnished and equipped with telescope and spectroscope, where we may gaze out into the abysmal depths of space and behold the planetary system and view the very genesis of all world-building in the starry heavens above. We find the laboratory of the chemist, the physicist, the X-ray, the seance room of the Spiritualist. Now a large audience is presented to my view. Here by my side stands a living man; now the room is in darkness; out there the X-ray focused upon him. It has been said of old, "Man, know thyself," and yet to-day in the twentieth century of civilization the masses are still in ignorance. We look at the man by my side; we see the red blood coursing through the veins and arteries, we see the wonderful mechanism of the human form in action, we see the brain in its functioning, we watch the thought waves come and go, the soul and its relation to the physical body is revealed to our gaze, and here we learn more in twenty minutes than we have learned in two thousand years through the teachings of Christianity.

"Man, know thyself." When this time shall come, then conditions shall be right, and the materialized spirit form will stand upon your rostrum and deliver a lecture; then will you receive these truths direct, and not strained through the borrowed mentality of the medium. Such is the future of Spiritualism or Universal Naturalism which shall be known and accepted by the masses of the world's people.

A good Christian should never go to law; rather should he give up his coat and his pants, and everything that he hath. Churchmen never go to law; they are the most docile and easy creatures in the world on matters of business.—Voltaire.

The Red Bird.

A Curious Phenomenon at Kansas City, Mo.

Elijah Cooper Tells of Messages from His Son Who's Dead—The Red Bird Has Quit Coming Now, but Cooper Explains that Its Mission Was Fulfilled When He Was Converted to Spiritualism.

"Yes, I believe that communication between the living and the spirits of the dead is possible," said Elijah L. Cooper, of Thirty-eighth and Cherry streets last night. "And I'm willing to tell of my experience with spirits, and make oath that it is true, to anyone who is honestly interested in the question."

"Through the redbird?" the reporter asked.

"Yes, through the redbird," Mr. Cooper replied.

Mr. Cooper's case is to be studied by Prof. James H. Hyslop, late of the faculty of Columbia University, while in the city. The substance of Mr. Cooper's story as he gave it last night is as follows:

On April 30, 1904, Willie Cooper, 20 years old, son of Mr. Cooper, died of typhoid fever. The family noticed that on the morning of his death a number of birds hovered about the window sill near the sick boy's bed. Conspicuous among them was a red bird. None of the birds seemed in the least afraid of persons in the room. Mr. Cooper, affected by the scene, stepped into the yard. After a few minutes he said everything about him seemed to suddenly glow with a very bright light. He said he felt strange and turned to go into the house. Mrs. Cooper met him in the hall and told him that Willie was dead.

The Knockings of the Bird.

One night about a week after the son's death Mr. Cooper's daughter and a friend visiting her were disturbed by repeated knockings in the folding bed in which they were sleeping. Thee girls were frightened and called Mr. Cooper. He says he laughed at them but investigated to please them. He took everything off the bed, leaving the bare springs. Then, he declares, all present heard the knocks again. Three distinct knocks in succession seemed to come from the interior of the bed, he says. After that they heard no more knocks from the bed, but for four months after the son's death a red bird came every morning and chirped, whisked and pecked on the glass of Mr. Cooper's room just as he was getting up.

"Just as soon as my foot would hit the floor," said Mr. Cooper, "that bird would be at my window. He seemed to come from a grape vine that hung on the side of the house near the window. We could not understand the bird's actions, but grew accustomed to its visits after a while."

The morning of February 6, 1905, at 5 o'clock, Mr. Cooper was going to the barn as usual to milk the cows. He carried a pail in his left hand and lantern in his right.

"About ten feet from the stable door," said Mr. Cooper, "the form of a man rose suddenly from the earth right in front of me. I jumped back and drew back my lantern to hit him with it. Then I recognized Willie. He had disappeared in an instant before I could open my mouth to say a word. He looked exactly as he did in life. The corner of his handkerchief was sticking out of his pocket just as it is in a picture we have of him."

Then He Consulted a "Medium."

This incident continued on Mr. Cooper's mind until some time in the following March, hearing that a "trumpet" medium was conducting a circle, he decided to go.

"There for the first time I had a conversation with Willie's spirit," said Mr. Cooper. "I asked him if he was happy and he said 'yes.' I was so excited that I could not ask him questions very well, but he talked anyway. He told me that happiness in the spirit world depended upon the conduct of our life here, and said that I should mend my ways."

In the spring the red bird made daily calls again.

"What does the red bird mean," Mr. Cooper asked the spirit.

"That is my emblem, father," the spirit replied. 'It will answer your questions. One knock means 'no,' two mean 'don't know,' three mean 'yes.'"

"You'll Get a Letter To-Day."

The next morning when the red bird came they asked it questions. Miss Cooper asked if she would get a letter that day. The bird pecked on the glass three times. A letter came that day.

"We had frequent conversations with the bird and always spoke of it as Willie," said Mr. Cooper. "It never answered incorrectly, but sometimes pecked twice, meaning 'don't know.'"

"The bird has continued to come occasionally up to the present time," said Mr. Cooper, "but does not come regularly any more."

Mr. Cooper is an ardent Bible student and believes that Spiritualism is the explanation of all its wonders.

"Peter communed with spirits on the housetop," he said, "so did John on the Isle of Patmos and Paul on the way to Damascus. The mind must be in just the proper state before we can commune with spirits. It must be full of good. Christ held more comunication with the spirit world than any other man has. That was because His mind contained more good than that of any other man."

To Study Cooper's Case.

Prof. James H. Hyslop, the leader of the American Society for Psychic Research, who is in Kansas City, has not yet seen Elijah L. Cooper, the man who says he has received messages by means of a red bird's tappings on his window pane, from his son who is dead. Prof. Hyslop expects to interview Cooper to-day with a view to studying and classifying the case.

Hyslop Once a Skeptic.

A crowd, in which there was a majority of women, filled to standing room the Unity chapel, 911 Tracy avenue, last night to hear Prof. James H. Hyslop, head of the American Society for Psychical Research, speak on the principles of the society. The lecture was followed by an hour of questions and answers.

"I put no faith in supernatural physical occurrences," said Prof. Hyslop. "If a table moves in a seance, it is the result of physical energy, either conscious or sub-conscious. My point is that all communication from spirits must be through natural agencies. I say this as a scientific man, because I have in my records no definite proof of anything further.

"Up to the late '90s I was a thorough materialist and at this time I do not believe in a conscious existence after death, except as I have seen perfectly authenticated messages from persons who have passed over."

Prof. Hyslop says that he has received messages from his father and many other persons, who are dead, through various mediums. "The medium," he said, "goes voluntarily into a trance and sits perfectly unconscious of her surroundings, holding a pencil over a writing pad. The subject, whose identity she has no means of knowing, enters and summons through her the spirit he desires. He asks questions aloud and the hand writes the answer on the pad. It even happens sometimes that the answer is written in a language which the medium herself does not know. My father once gave me a pass sentence whereby I might always identify him. No one besides myself knows this, yet he has introduced himself to me by means of it through several different mediums. There isn't much room left for doubt.

"I do not think these psychic phenomena are inconsistent with Christianity. I am inclined rather to believe that future developments will bring the two beliefs very close together."—Kansas City (Mo.) Citizen, July 9, 1907.

LECTURE ON SPIRITUALISM.

Interesting Talk by Dr. B. F. Austin —The Speaker Related a Number of Interesting Psychic Experiments —The Lecture Was Followed by Spirit Messages Through the Mediumship of Mrs. Steele—Another Lecture To-night.

Dr. B. F. Austin, of Rochester, lectured before the Spiritualist society last evening on the importance and the reliability of the truths advanced by modern Spiritualists. The speaker related a number of interesting psychic experiences, and said in part, that Spiritualism, if true, is one of the most important truths that has been revealed to man. It is even of greater importance than any of the wonders of physical science; for, let a man once become firmly convinced that his spirit survives bodily death and that man's character is strengthened. He begins at once to live for more than the things of this life. He begins to live for spiritual things.

Though Spiritualism may not be able to demonstrate the immortality of the soul by establishing the fact that the personality of man survives the death change, nevertheless it gives the strongest presumptive evidence obtainable in favor of this doctrine. If the spirit can survive bodily death, the presumption in favor of immortality is greatly strengthened.

Spiritualism is the only religion that claims to demonstrate the truth that has been taught by the church for centuries. And in these days of higher criticism, when the old foundations of belief in the Bible are shaken, the church should embrace Spiritualism as a friend; for the miracles that are occurring to-day substantiate the reality of the miracles occurring in ancient times.

This movement is not the product of man's power of organization, but has arisen naturally in many places. In the Methodist church, in the Catholic church, in out-of-the-way places, as well as with the professional and private mediums, Spiritualism springs up here and there spontaneously.

The question is often asked, "admitting that the phenomena is all true, how do you know that it was produced by spirits, and may it not be the working of the sub-conscious mind? This sub-conscious mind is sometimes called the divine part of man. Now, how does it happen, that instead of this mind affirming that it is the operation of one's own sub-conscious mental powers, it almost invariably affirms that it is some spirit that is communicating? Thus it turns out, if this theory is true, that the divine in man becomes one of the greatest of falsifiers."

The lecture was followed by spirit messages through the mediumship of Mrs. Steele.

The second lecture will be held this evening at the Odd Fellows temple. Subject: "Strange experiences in Psychic Research." The address will be followed by spirit messages. No admission will be charged.—Meadville (Pa.) Mesenger.

May be another Christ. We all may be
The saviors of the world if we believe
In the divinity which dwells in us
And worship it, and nail our grosser selves,
Our temples, creeds, and our unworthy aims
Upon the cross. Who giveth love to all,
Pays kindness for unkindness, smiles for frowns,
And lends new courage to each fainting heart,
And strengthens hope and scatters joy abroad,
He, too, is a Redeemer, Son of God.

A BRIDGED GULF BETWEEN HEAVEN AND HELL

"I Do Not See How the Old Notions About Salvation and Character Can Long Be Maintained With Their Arbitrary Division Between Good and Bad, Therefore I Look for a World-Wide Modification of the Old Conceptions of Heaven and Hell That Will in Large Measure Conform to the Ideas Taught by Modern Spiritualism."

Long have the old theological systems taught that there were but two places in the future life, a hell to be shunned, and a heaven to be gained. And only two kinds of people were supposed to inhabit this other world, the good and the wicked, the saved and the lost. Between these two people a great gulf was fixed, and once in hell, always in hell, and once in heaven, always in heaven, was the hard and fixed notion with regard to these two opposite places or conditions.

These notions reflect faithfully the compound ideas that were taught with regard to character. A man was either saved or in his sins; either entirely good or entirely bad. No gradation existed between the two, nor was it believed that a good man might have bad streaks in him, or that a bad man might have good streaks in him. There were the sheep and the goats; those who were to inhabit the kingdom prepared for them from the foundation of the world, and those who were to inhabit the region of everlasting torment prepared for the Devil and his angels.

But these old conceptions of character are breaking up. They are not found to be true to life. Many of those who profess salvation do not seem to have it, while others who do not profess salvation seem to have it.

All degrees of goodness and iniquity are discoverable in every-day life.

From the lower levels we ascend into the higher by a series of fine gradations; and man is beginning to show greater caution in drawing lines, and saying just where the bad leaves off and the good begins. As evidence accumulates, showing the influence of heredity and environment upon character, man sees the futility of declaring this person to be wholly good or that person wholly bad.

As ideas of religious education or spiritual nurture gain ground, we see less insistence on some catastrophic religious experience, by means of which man must necessarily acquire character.

As the idea becomes prominent that both character and salvation, the latter considered as one's safety in the future life, depend upon the normal unfoldment of all the gifts or talents with which we are endowed, and that the line of progress is in the direction of the ideal, the old distinctions fail, and a new heaven and a new hell are necessary to accommodate this new estimate placed upon character.

More humane and just notions of life require a bridging of the gulf between heaven and hell, over which bridge both the good may pass to redeem the fallen, and the fallen may pass when they are ready to rise.

This new concept of heaven and hell, which makes travel possible between the two places, is an idea current in the messages and literature of modern Spiritualism.

We also learn that both heaven and hell are graded. There are to be found in hell various degrees of repentance and longing for a better life, and in heaven there are degrees of righteous achievement and exaltation.

By this means the arbitrary division between heaven and hell, as between the good and bad in character is largely done away with, and spiritual growth in the other world, as in this, becomes a process of climbing heavenward.

The religious value of this concept over the old notions must be readily apparent to all humane and fair-minded mortals. A dash of the idea of karma is thus given to the situation. Whatever strength of spirit a man achieves in earth-life will be retained in the other world, while the insincere however exalted they may become in this life, will drift to their proper level in the spirit-world.

To feel that all persons will in the long run be fairly treated, and to feel that by continually choosing between the high and the low we are daily determining our spiritual level in the other world, gives an added impulse to achievement.

When one is convinced that there is no short cut to heaven, the idea of immediate work presents itself, and we all feel that the sooner we get to work, spiritually, the better it will be for ourselves and all concerned. The moral unfortunates need not utterly despair, for whatever good there is in them will stand to their credit; nevertheless, the horrors induced by self-wielded ignorance or wickedness are to be dreaded and avoided.

This view of heaven and hell brings God nearer man. His justice and mercy become more akin to what man understands by these words; and man feels safer in interpreting the love of God by the highest impulses that he finds in his own heart.

I do not see how the old notions about salvation and character can long be maintained with their arbitrary division between good and bad, therefore I look for a world-wide modification of the old conceptions of heaven and hell that will in larger measure conform to the ideas taught by modern Spiritualism.

Love and Life.

Through the ages runs the spirit
Of the all-pervading good;
We but catch its radiance dimly
In our weakness understood.

We see glimpses through the darkness
Of the law of love and life.
Love unselfish, pure and Godlike,
Calming all unearthly strife.

We are brothers, sisters, ever,
Through this sacred love sublime,
And we bow in trustful worship
To this law and love divine.

Count Nelidoff, President of the Peace Congress.

During our interview with and while Count Nelidoff was carefully perusing the address that I handed him as representing the sentiments of the Societies from which I bore credentials, there was an oppertunity to study the man.

Past middle life, bald on the top of his head and with gray hair and long flowing side-whiskers, also aquiline nose and sensitive, refined face, in any other time and place the president of the Peace Congress might be taken for an artist, a poet, or a litterateur. He possesses the charmingly simple manner and gracious presence of the real nobility, and when he spoke it was like an echo of our own thoughts: of the "Ideals" of peace, of the great influence and moral effect of the opinions of the people upon the subject of Peace and Arbitration. And after receiving and retaining all the credentials and the address, he seemed to wish to converse longer, and in closing the interview said: "America belongs to the future; here, unfortunately, we are living in the past."

He is intuitive and perceptive, seeming to realize in a subtle way the atmosphere that accompanied us.

Certainly he seemed to us to be the right man in the right place.

His great simplicity of manner and dress (a morning business suit of gray) impressed us as conveying the idea that his rank and position as president of the Peace Congress made no barrier between him and us. Whatever the Congress may do or leave undone, we feel that M. Nelidoff in his innermost heart desires peace.

Mr. Stead.

The chairman of the other Conference (International) is too well known to require a description, yet he has revealed a breadth of thought and moderation of views since we came in contact with him here, that show results of discipline and experience, not only as a writer and editor, but as a reformer. He publishes the Courier de Conference every day, containing the exact proceedings of the Peace Congress, borne by some little bird—for the Congress sits with closed doors. In treating of the subject, "Should the Congress sit with Closed Doors, Excluding the Press" Mr. Stead presented many reasons why upon delicate international subjects, there should be secrecy until results are arrived at, and he deplored, as we all do, the unbridled license of the press. Sometimes in England, more frequently in America.

Mr. Stead is rather more impressive than eloquent, and talks in a pleasing, conversational style. When off duty at social functions, he is almost boyish in his good-nature, and manifest enjoyment.

Dr. Eykman and Mr. Pinter.

Through the kindness of these two gentlemen of The Hague, Dr. Eykman and Mr. Pinter, the "Internationale Circle," or place of re-union and conversation—and of lectures and conferences is made possible. The Internationalist Magazine is published by Dr. Eykman, and the true Internationalists recognize these gentlemen as their friends. Dr. Eykman has a most commanding and charming presence, with iron-gray hair and flowing beard. His wife is a slender, pleasant woman, who believes in her husband and appreciates all that is going on.

Mr. Pinter is a man of affairs and seems to be a strong bulwark to Internationalism here. He is rather short and stout, with close-cut hair and beard, and a very pleasant, appreciative countenance. These gentlemen have arranged with Mr. Stead for the carrying out of these conferences—who knows but they are more important than the Congress of Governments

The Hague

Is enchanting. A town of 200.000 inhabitants, close to the sea, with a fashionable watering-place (Schevenengen) as one of its suburbs, it reminds one of both New York and London, and at the same time, of Hartford and Venice. Canals lined on either side by fine residences, and sometimes by long rows of elms and beautiful promenades—canals in which are boats laden with flowers, fruits and other products, and sold to venders and dealers from the boats. Canals in which are reflected official buildings and beautiful gardens, wide streets with modern electric cars ("tram" cars) and in a step or two narrow, winding streets, crowded with people down which dash bicycles, automobiles and tram cars at a rate that would cause the death of a hundred or two a day in Chicago—but here no one seems to be hurt.

The happy population going to and from their pleasure or work. And the Hotels (not 20 stories, like New York and Chicago) two and three stories high, stretching along the sides of parks shaded by trees with the flags of many nations floating from them. Sojourning within hotel or suite of rooms is occupied by English, American, Russian or other delegation.

Certainly The Hague is a most charming place. But when do they have summer? Every day it is cold, we are told that it may be this way all summer (?) and it may be warm and pleasant in July and August. Verdure flourishes here as in England, and in the country crossed and marked with canals and ditches that look like a chess-board, the grass flourishes and the herds of cattle look fat and happy. Gardens and beautiful fields of grain and flowers are everywhere. Everything reminds one of a dream.

On the streets we are in Paris or London, or Chicago, until suddenly we encounter a woman or group of women dressed in the Ancient Hollandese costume and caps or bonnets, which certainly are unique, but when surrounded by a modern togue or hat the effect is irresistible. The Dutch language seems to me a combination of German and Norwegian or Swedish; there are many consonants, yet most of the educated people here speak French fluently and not infrequently a little or more English.

The sea is so near—and the winds from the "Nordzee" and the Zuyder-Zee are so cold one wonders at the quantities of delicious strawberries sold everywhere,

Of the dykes and canals cleansed by the great tides of the sea, and regulated by locks at important points—in fact the whole drainage system of Holland is a wonderful study. We who have mountains, valleys, rivers and plains unparalleled in the whole world, cannot realize at what labor and cost this land has been redeemed from the clutches of the water and made one of the most fertile and productive on the earth.

HELL-FIRE—BRIMSTONE.

The Part They Have Played in the Churches.

There is a burning hell, a located place of eternal torment to the doomed and damned. Read your Bible. Continue as you are, and you will soon be there. Your unbelief will not check the current of that swiftly flowing stream that is carrying you on. The boiling, hurling, foaming, seething, angry waves are irresistible, and you are going down, down; DOWN. There will be awful screaming, howling, gnashing of teeth, torture and torment indescribable, undefinable. This is the sinner's doom! Sinners will make more noise in hell-fire than they ever did on earth. They will long despairingly, for something to soothe their pain and ease their awful suffering. They will writhe in fearful contortions and gnash their teeth through infinite ages. These things will take place in the lake of fire and brimstone. This will not be figurative, but actual. Everyone who does not repent of his sins and get fully saved will go into the lake of fire and brimstone that burneth eternally. Let this be a timely warning to all."

The above is taken from the "Rocky Mountain Pillar of Fire," published at Denver, Colorado, June 5, 1907.

It is just such dogmatic doctrines as the above, hurled from the Christian pulpits, written and published and spread abroad, that are undermining the churches of to-day.

"Hell-fire and brimstone"—superstitious bug-bear of paganism!

Even our children are taught thus, and in fear and trembling they try to honor and obey that mighty supramundane God, who will cast into everlasting fire and brimstone poor, weak, struggling mortals who do not bow down in worship before him and tell him repeatedly what a good and generous Father he is.

Perchance my Christian father, you have a weak and erring child; perchance a daughter.

From your happy home in heaven you look down upon that child. You call the wife of your bosom that she too, can look with you upon the offspring of your mutual love.

Together you watch those loved limbs twisted in torture; those eyes aflame with the everlasting fires of hell; those hands uplifted, begging, pleading for one drop of water—only one little drop of water, but across that gulf that yawns between, you cannot pass; no not for one moment to her relief.

Then, my orthodox father and mother, go back to your God, and as you sing his praise, tell him of his mighty love to save, his wondrous goodness to all mankind. Say to Him: "Not my will, but thine, O, Lord!" and be happy if you can.

The Spiritualist's God is one who loves all—not a chosen few, and is the most beautiful thing in all the world.

Our God of Love does not keep us down in the dust upon our faces, begging Him to be merciful to us poor sinners, but through his divine wisdom permits us to know beyond a doubt that we are loved, and that our loved ones are waiting just over the line.

Does not such knowledge help us over the thorny path of life? What a boon to our weaknesses, our shortcomings, our failures.

How it throws the pure, delicate mantle of charity over our faults, and covers our human defects and imperfections.

Like the Rev. Minot J. Savage, I say, "I would go to hell, if there were such a place, with any friend of mine, and would want no heaven of which I have ever read, if any friend of mine were in the outer darkness."

AN IMPRESSIVE TEST.

A Spirit, at the Request of Those in Attendance, Imitates a Clog Dance With the Raps.

Reading of the wonderful musical exploits of "Ikey" a few weeks ago, in The Progressive Thinker, recalls to my mind a similar occurrence.

The incident I am about to relate was produced through the mediumship of a young lady who never sat for development or tried in any way to unfold her psychic powers, in fact, I believe her to be unconscious of her own great possibilities. She has only to sit down at a table and lay her hands upon it when the raps come, loudly and distinctly, and in a perfectly intelligent manner, so that any person may converse with them. Sometimes they follow her around the house, rapping on the floor and on the different articles of furniture as she passes by.

One evening some of her friends called and asked her to sit with them. They had brought one or two unbelievers whom they wished to convince of the truth of spirit return. They formed a circle around the table with the usual result. After some conversation in the language of the raps, the young medium said to her guide: "You say you are Johnny Dolan. Now I am going to put you to the test for the benefit of those present who do not believe the spirits of the dead can return to earth. Those of us who knew Johnny Dolan in the body, know that he was a musician, and an unusually fine clog-dancer. If you are indeed he, will you prove your identity by dancing Wilson's Clog on this table?"

Immediately the answer came, and every note of the difficult clog dance was rapped out clearly and distinctly upon the table, without one break or a moment's hesitation.

This demonstration, though it might not be convincing proof to the skeptic, at least goes to show that there is an intelligence too back it up, a something that possesses sense and reason, and able to hear, understand, and answer promptly and correctly.

IMPORTANT DISCOVERY.

Amenhotep IV., 1400 B. C., Given Honors by U. of C. Explorers.

Previous ideas of ancient history and the development of religion have been revolutionized by the discovery made by the Egyptian exploration expedition of the University of Chicago, and announced by the University of Chicago Weekly. Prof. James H. Breasted, in charge of the party which has explored the region tributary to the Nile, has declared that his discovery of a relief of Amenhotep IV., the great monotheist Egyptian king, in a temple in Nubia, proves that his sway embraced not merely the city and environs of Thebes, but all of Egypt.

This discovery means that in the fourteenth century before Christ there existed a highly developed and highly civilized state, with a religion in which there was one single supreme God, and that the religious conceptions of the Egyptians were about 1,000 years in advance of those of the Jews. While the barbarous scattered tribes of the Jews were wandering through the hills of Palestine, Egypt, a nation embracing millions of inhabitants, was highly civilized, and enjoying a monotheistic religion of the highest development.

This religion established by Amenhotep, whom Prof. Breasted calls the greatest figure in the world's history, because he established a system of philosophy in direct opposition to all the ideas which preceded him, is the earliest known monotheistic worship. At this time in the culture history of the world all peoples were gradually evolving the idea of one supreme God having authority above all the rest, but it remained for the Egyptian reformer to first announce the theory of monotheism. The expressions of this religious system are very similar to those of the Jewish faith ten centuries later.

The existence of the religion of Amenhotep IV. has been known for years, but until this discovery by Dr. Breasted it was thought that his actual power was confined to the immediate neighborhood of Thebes, the royal city. It is now proved that instead of a small circle of philosophers, almost members of the royal household the system of philosophy of Amenhotep dominated the whole of Egypt.—Chicago Daily News.

A SONG.

(Dedicated to my wife on the sixty-first anniversary of our marriage.)

We're traveling on, dear, we soon will be there, soon will be there, soon will be there.
Where Summers of Joy replace Winters of Care,
And smiles follow tears in that land over there.

I now look in vain for those sparkles of joy,
That once were so sweet to behold in your eyes,
But no disappointment through life could destroy
That child-love which still is my pleasing surprise,
But traveling on, dear, we soon will be there, soon will be there, soon will be there,
Where Summers of Joy replace Winters of Care
And smiles follow tears in that land over there.

Ah, never again, in this world of care,
Shall we feel as we once did, that mutual bliss,
But we know of our Eden, the land over there,
Where home-life is sweeter than even in this;
And traveling on, dear, we soon will be there, soon will be there,
Where Summers of Joy, replace Winters of Care,
And smiles follow tears in that land over there.

PHILADELPHIA SPIRITUALISTS.

The Old First Association Has an Enjoyable Occasion.

The First Association of Spiritualists of Philadelphia (the oldest one in the world), which has been making such marked strides in the past six months toward a permanent flourishing condition, arousing the interest of Philadelphia's "lethargic populace (?)," has ofttimes had pleasant fetes, in the past, but the climax was reached in a sociable and entertainment given under the supervision of the directors on Tuesday evening, June 18.

Captain Keffer, Mr. Thompson and Mr. Morrill occupied the rostrum.

After singing America, Capt. Keffer (an honored Union veteran of our Civil, as well as a veteran of the Mexican, wars—the present president of our association—its oldest member and lifelong worker in the cause of Spiritualism, who is well known both to Spiritualists throughout the country and many of our nation's honored men) was introduced by the chairman for the evening (Rev. Mr. Thompson) to give us the address of welcome. Very ably, indeed, did he speak to us in his familiar style, and most pleasantly, deserving the hearty applause he received.

Following this the members and friends in attendance from the right and then from the left, beginning at the rear, filed to the front to be welcomed by the president, pastor and secretary, to whom they were presented by Mr. Lawrence.

The Rev. G. Tabor Thompson (who has been doing such a noble work toward Spiritualism's advance in our city since his renunciation two years ago of the Baptist faith and ministry after twenty years in it—who has been the steady speaker for the Temple since the first of the year, and is chosen as the pastor from September first next) then took the rostrum, an in his inimitable manner spoke on "The Coming Year," predicting to us that the membership, the financial support, the work of the whole church, including the Lyceum and various societies connected with the association, would far exceed the quarter-century just past, if we would all work with him in harmony and sympathy, and further: "It will come about that we will make a name for for Spiritualism in the community, spreading the cause of Truth to limits which have been hitherto unthought of, attracting from the various Christian denominations an influx of new blood. In the coming year we will have," said he, "in addition to the two Sunday meetings, a midweek service for the Philosophy, at which meeting an opportunity will be given our young mediums (those who are just developing) to enlarge their psychic abilities, and do away with our old form of having a hired and single medium. On Sundays we will have the best mediums obtainable, even if we have to import them, in order positively to prove to some skeptical attendants the continuity of life. We want to have a training school for those of our young people who are developing in message, trance or physical mediumship, in public speaking and singing. The fact is this, we want to have our association deserving of the title THE OLDEST."

Alluding to our library, he continued: "The books have been recently re-classified and arranged, and, since there is so much information on our Philosophy to be obtained from the numerous fine works conveniently accessible and which can be borrowed from our librarian, we hope those interested will avail themselves of an opportunity, such as this is, to become acquainted with the classics of our Truth." Somehow, by innuendo, he led us to believe all through his remarks there are many surprises for the good of the cause, and of us collectively and individually, which could only be known as they materialize.

Mr. Thompson is the most able man who has been on the local rostrum for a long time, and it is devoutly to be wished that we will avail ourselves of his ability. We expect to send to The Progressive Thinker some interesting extracts from his discourses, for publication, in the near future.

I would insert here that during the month of August (while our services are discontinued) Mr. Thompson will be available for camp meetings.

Mr. Lawrence (our vice-president since December, 1906, and the chairman of the finance committee, and who, in the interval which has elapsed since that date, has been an untiring worker day and night, weekday and Sunday, to get the society rejuvenated in the lines of work of which he is in charge) was presented and spoke on the topic "The Financial Outlook for the Coming Year." He outlined the development in the mode of procedure for collection of revenue since his accession to the chair, and told us the proceeds had served to increase our income considerably:—That "we have acquired a guaranteed income from contributions received through the introduction of the Friendly Contributor envelope system of $50 a month, in addition to the regular collections through offerings at the door and membership dues;" that "we intend by means of this voluntary contribution to obtain a stipend of $150 per month, which would make a guaranteed income beyond the ordinary cash receipts, thus relieving our secretary, Brother Morrill, from the necessity of financiering our deficit when receipts are inadequate, as has been his good-natured custom for some years past." Our vice-president made the remark respecting the suggestion of a member to the effect that all could not afford to pay the small sum of 25 cents per month, that "almost anyone could make this contribution by laying aside one cent per day and he would then have five cents per month in excess which would pay his trolley fare to the park; however, if he cared to ride back, by saving two cents a day and paying fifty cents a month to the cause he would have remaining the requisite funds for the return trip. We have 336 members enrolled on our old books of which number we are able to locate 103. Of these 36 contribute toward the $50 while 18 of our friends help to make up this sum. How about the remaining members contributing? How about the contributing friends becoming members?" He advised "if one begins in a small way the larger will open as it ripens; starting to lay aside will cultivate the ability to save more to devote to the worthy purpose, and what we want is this: We want sufficient funds to advertise us. We want to make our "Little Church Around the Corner" known broadcast. Almost everyone who has any idea of our city's geography knows the location of Twelfth and Thompson streets, but what we want is for everyone to know it not because it is where these two streets intersect, but from the fact that the Temple of Spiritualism is situated here." (Applause.)

Interspersed among the above were periods when we were held spellbound (as usual) by the fine voice of our soloist, Miss Margaret Teale, who in exquisite tones sang "Sing, Sweet Bird," "Coming Through the Rye," "Angus MacDonald," and also, in a duet with Mr. Stretton (our organist, who had in charge the arranging of the entire function of the evening) her voice blended with his most harmoniously in "Larboard Watch," to Brother Stretton's accompaniment. We listened to treats on the banjo by Brother Ogden, who had been conductor of our Lyceum a portion of the past season.

When the time for "conversazione" arrived, the Captain arose and complimented us, remarking: "In times of war the opposing army seeks to capture the enemy and glories in it. We glory in having captured, for another year, one who is a friend—some of you may have thought he was an enemy—we know he is a friend. I mean Mr. Thompson, our pastor." (Applause.) The latter, in recognition of this, came forward and, after a few appropriate remarks, gave us his subjects for next Sunday's discourses.

The round of enjoyment was brought to a finish by a liberal supply of ice cream and cake, served by our good ladies and their helpers, thus ending in a jolly good time, to the great satisfaction of the inner man. Of that which remained enough was sold to defray the entire expenses incidental to the time.

We hope to have many good things to tell you of the Grandparent Association in time to come.

What True Religion Is.

From Ingersoll's Address Before a Unitarian Club in New York, Jan. 15, 1892.

Now, then, what is religion? I say, religion is all here in this world—right here—and that all our duties are right here to our fellow-men; that the man that builds a home; marries the girl that he loves; takes good care of her; likes the family; stays home nights, as a general thing; pays his debts; tries to find out what he can; gets all the ideas and beautiful things that his mind will hold; turns a part of his brain into a gallery of fine arts; has a host of paintings and statues there; then has another niche devoted to music—a magnificent dome, filled with winged notes that rise to glory—now, the man who does that gets all he can from the great ones dead; swaps all thoughts he can with the ones that are alive; true to the ideal that he has here in his brain—he is what I call a religious man, because he makes the world better, happier; he puts the dimples of joy in the cheeks of the ones he loves, and he lets the gods run heaven to suit themselves. And I am not saying that he is right; I do not know.

That is all the religion that I have; to make somebody else happier if I can.

I divide this world into two classes—the cruel and the kind; and I think a thousand times more of a kind man than I do of an intelligent man. I think more of kindness than I do of genius; I think more of real, good, human nature in that way—of one who is willing to lend a helping hand and who goes through the world with a face that looks as if its owner were willing to answer a decent question—I think a thousand times more of that man than I do of being theologically right; because I do not care whether I am theologically right or not. It is something that is not worth talking about, because it is something that I never, never shall understand; and every one of you will die and won't understand it either—until after you die, at any rate. I do not know what will happen then.

I am not denying anything. There is another ideal, and it is a beautiful ideal. It is the greatest dream that ever entered the heart or brain of man—the Dream of Immortality. It was born of human affection. It did not come to us from heaven. It was born of the human heart. And when he who loved kissed the lips of her who was dead, there came into his heart the dream: We may meet again.

And, let me tell you, that hope of immortality never came from any religion. That hope of immortality has helped make religion. It has been the great oak around which have climbed the poisonous vines of superstition—that hope of immortality is the great oak.

And yet the moment a man expresses a doubt about the truth of Joshua or Jonah or the other three fellows in a furnace, up hops some poor little wretch and says, "Why, he doesn't want to live any more; he wants to die and go down like a dog, and that is the end of him and his wife and children." They really come to think that the moment a man is what they call an infidel he has no affections, no heart, no feeling, no hope—nothing—nothing. Just anxious to be annihilated! But, if the orthodox creed be true, I make my choice to-night. I take hell. And if it is between hell and annihilation, I take annihilation.

I will tell you why I take hell in making the first choice. We have heard from both of those places—heaven and hell. According to the New Testament there was a rich man in hell, and a poor man, Lazarus, in heaven. And there was another gentleman by the name of Abraham. The rich man in hell was in flames, and he called for water, and they told him they couldn't give him any. No bridge! But they did not express the slightest regret that they couldn't give him any water. Mr. Abraham was not decent enough to say he would if he could; no, sir; nothing. It did not make any difference to him. But this rich man in hell—in torment—his heart was all right, for he remembered his brothers; and he said to this Abraham, "If you cannot go, why, send a man to my five brethren, so that they will not come to this place!" Good fellow to think of his five brothers when he was burning up. Good fellow. Best fellow we ever heard from on the other side—in either world.

So, I say, there is my place. And, incidentally, Abraham at that time gave his judgment as to the value of miracles. He said, "Though one should rise from the dead he wouldn't help your five brethren!" "There are Moses and the prophets." No need of raising people from the dead.

That is my idea, in a general way, about religion; and I want the imagination to go to work upon it, taking the perfections of one church, of one school, of one system, and putting them together, just as a sculptor makes a great statue by taking the eyes from one, the nose from another, the limbs from another, and so on; just as they make a great painting from a landscape by putting a river in this place, instead of over there, changing the location of a tree and improving on what they call nature—that is to say, simply by adding to, taking from; that is all we can do. But let us go on doing that until there shall be a church in sympathy with the best human heart and in harmony with the best human brain.

And, what is more, let us have that religion for the world we live in. Right here! Let us have that religion until it cannot be said that they who do the most work have the least to eat. Let us have that religion here until hundreds and thousands of women are not compelled to make a living with a needle that has been called "the asp for the breast of the poor," and to live in tenements, in filth, where modesty is impossible.

I say, let us preach that religion here until men will be ashamed to have forty or fifty millions, or any more than they need, while their brethren lack bread—while their sisters die from want. Let us preach that religion here until man will have more ambition to become wise and good than to become rich and powerful. Let us preach that religion here among ourselves until there are no abused and beaten wives. Let us preach that religion until children are no longer afraid of their own parents and until there is no back of a child bearing the scars of a father's lash. Let us preach it, I say, until we understand and know that every man does as he must, and that, if we want better men and women, we must have better conditions.

Let us preach this grand religion until everywhere, the world over, men are just and kind to each other. And then, if there be another world, we shall be prepared for it. And if I can come into the presence of an infinite, good, and wise being, he will say, "Well, you did the best you could. You did the best you could. You did very well, indeed. There is plenty of work for you to do here. Try and get a little higher than you were before." Let us preach that one drop of restitution is worth an ocean of repentance.

And if there is a life of eternal progress before us, I shall be as glad as any other angel to find it out.

But I will not sacrifice the world I have for one I know not of. I will not live here in fear when I do not know that which I fear lives.

I am going to live a perfectly free man. I am going to reap the harvest of my mind, no matter how poor it is, whether it is wheat or corn or worthless weeds. And I am going to scatter it. Some may "fall on stony ground." But I think I have struck good soil to-night.

And so, ladies and gentlemen, I thank you a thousand times for your attention. I beg that you will forgive the time that I have taken and allow me to say, once more, that this event marks an epoch in Religious Liberty in the United States.

Charity.

I gave a beggar from my little store
Of well-earned gold. He spent the shining store
And came again, and yet again, still cold
And hungry as before.

I gave a thought, and, through that thought of mine,
He found himself the man, supreme divine,
Fed, clothed, and crowned with blessings manifold,
And now he begs no more.

ELLA WHEELER WILCOX.

MONUMENTAL HYPOCRISY.

Harry Orchard and the Preachers—Infernal Falsity in Christian Guise.

Harry Orchard confessed that he murdered some eighteen persons, and that he is a bigamist, burglar, incendiary, forger, sheep-thief, gambler, and habitual liar. He says he killed Ex-Governor Steunenburg and had to run rapidly to get away. He was arrested soon thereafter, and the proof was so strong against him he thought he would better confess. There is evidence to show that his motive for confessing was the hope of escaping the gallows. By asserting that he was hired to do the deed by Haywood, Moyer, and Pettibone, he would divert attention from himself and center it upon these Labor Union leaders. As the officers of the Union and the mine owners were at serious outs, Orchard evidently reasoned that by making the criminal charge against the labor leaders he would win to his defense the mine owners.

He had, he says, an interview with detective McPartland, who told him that King David was a liar, an adulterer and a murderer, and he repented, and he then became a man after God's own heart, and has been honored ever since. Orchard thereupon "confessed," but said he was not so much to blame as Haywood and Moyer, who paid him a regular salary to go out and kill enemies of the Miners' Union. Since his confession he reads the Bible every day, and says he has a clear conscience, and knows that he is a good Christian, and is assured that he will in the hereafter go straight to heaven, and be seated at the right hand of God.

A number of clergymen in different parts of the country also contend that Orchard is now a good Christian man, because God, for Christ's sake, through the shed blood of the Savior, has blotted out all the sin-stains from Orchard's soul, and that Saint Orchard now holds a through ticket to a high seat in heaven. There will be no stop-overs on the journey.

The preachers said about the same thing about Theodore Durrant, of San Francisco, who brutally outraged two young girls and then murdered them, and who was executed for the crime. Several years ago, in Iowa, a man kidnapped a young girl, kept her closely confined in his hovel four days, repeatedly assaulted her, and then stamped out her brains with his heavy boot-heels. He was arrested, and failing to escape, he sent for a clergyman and "confessed." The "man of God" sprinkled water on his head, mumbled over some paragraphs printed in a book, and assured the prisoner that he would go straight to heaven through the merits of the "atonement made by the Lord Jesus Christ." Many similar instances might be given.

Now here let me remark, that a sincere confession from unselfish motives and an honest desire to cease to do evil and to learn to do well, is most commendable; but such confession must have no taint of selfishness, and must be followed by good works, and the undoing of the wrongs committed; or when that is not possible, that which is equivalent thereto must be rendered, either in this or the next state of existence.

Is it not about time for the press and all intelligent people to vigorously protest against the paganism which teaches that criminals can dodge all the consequences of their acts by loading all their sins on Jesus? Men who teach the criminally inclined that they may shift their meanness on the Savior, and when arrested for crimes committed, can "confess" and sign their names to a church creed, and then with one bound go to eternal glory, are unquestionably doing society a flagrant injury. The doctrine is a most prolific promoter of wickedness and crime. It is paganism or worse. Much that claims to be Christianity to-day is paganism. Jesus is reported as saying, "He that sows to the wind shall reap the whirlwind;" "As ye sow, so shall ye reap."

Irrefutable Evidence

That Spirits From the Celestial Spheres Do Return to Earth.

Spirits—meaning both those that haunt and those that merely show a desire to—have received [says the Chicago Inter Ocean] a new convert in no less a person than Lombroso, the famous Italian psychologist. And his admission that he has experienced certain spirit manifestations adds another name to the list of people who have been investigating psychic phenomena from an unbiased standpoint. The Rev. Dr. Isaac K. Funk, writer and publisher, after eliminating fakers and charlatans who have tried to delude him, has announced his belief that there is a spirit world. He goes further than most of the other converts and sets up the theory that vibration causes these strange phenomena to be seen by earthly eyes and to be heard by earthly ears. He believes that the entire universe is made up of vibration.

"For fourteen years," writes Lombroso, "I have believed in psychic phenomena, and I have witnessed many wonderful things under satisfactory conditions—among these have been cases of genuine materialization."

Dr. Funk adds:

"These psychic phenomena, if they are real facts, we may rest assured will fall into their proper relations and will be found to be natural—not uncanny nor shivery—will seem a matter of course when once they are assimilated by our sensory and social and intellectual consciousness, and will belong to the science of living as much as do eating, the making of money, music, pictures."

And so the question naturally arises: "Are we knocking at the door of the unknown?"

The most ardent converts to the belief in spirit life—that there are what we call ghosts—frankly admit that there is much that is fraudulent. They point out that what has been done so far is not the fruit of ignorance or of superstition. They argue, instead, that it is the result of the experiences and observations and reasonings of such trained scientists as Lombroso, of Italy; Richet, Flammarion and Maxwell, of France; Crookes, Lodge and Wallace, of England, and Hyslop, James and—until his recent death—Hodgson, of America.

Can the Dead Live Again?

This is their chief problem:

"Do the dead live and do they commune with those who are in the flesh?—this in a manner that makes possible their identification? And if this be so, can the fact be scientifically demonstrated?"

"It is impossible," say many of the scientists, "that the dead can live again."

And then those who have investigated give innumerable instances in which there could have been no fraud or no coincidence, and in which life after death is proved—to their satisfaction, at least. Here is a typical instance, as related by Dr. Funk:

The mother of a public man of some professional fame, who lives not far distant from my home in Brooklyn, told me a few days before this writing that one morning a valued servant who had a great affection for her was severely burned and was taken to the hospital.

"She says: 'On the evening of that day I went to bed leaving the light in my room dimly burning. I was suddenly aroused from sleep by a noise as of the falling of a weight in the room. As I opened my eyes I saw standing in front of my bed the servant whom I had seen that day taken to the hospital. I sprang immediately from the bed, but the form had disappeared. I turned the light up full, but no one was in the room except myself. Looking at the time, I saw that it was 11:30 o'clock.

"'Next morning as quickly as I had breakfasted I started for the hospital, but was met by one of the doctors, who was coming to tell me that the woman had died during the night, and upon inquiry I found that she had died at 11:30 o'clock.'"

And then Dr. Funk recalls the fact that Columbus was laughed out of court; that scientists scoffed at Jenner, who introduced vaccination; that Professor Magendie pooh-poohed the idea that anesthetics could make painless the amputation of a leg or an arm; that Bouillaud, of the French academy, said that the phonograph was only a trick of ventriloquism; that the eminent Lavoisier proved to his own satisfaction that there were no such things as meteors because he had never seen one actually fall from the sky, and that Lord Bacon thought the magnet a trick and a fraud.

Stead Knows 'Em, Too.

On the other hand, William T. Stead, editor of the London Review of Reviews, who has recently been here attending the peace conference, frankly says that many times when the conditions are favorable he sits at his desk and writes down the thoughts of friends hundreds of miles distant.

Is it reasonable to attribute to coincidence the many cases reported like that of the mother in New York who was awakened from sleep by the cry of her son, a thousand miles away: "Mother, mother, the doctor says I have typhoid?"

The boy had uttered this cry in the far West.

Professor James H. Hyslop, of Columbia University, emphatically declares that he has heard from Dr. Richard Hodgson since the latter's death. They had a compact that the one who should go first to the great beyond would try to communicate with the one left living. Professor Hyslop declares that communication was established eventually through Mrs. Piper, the famous Boston medium.

These were the results:

In these spirit communications through Mrs. Piper, Dr. Hodgson told Professor Hyslop that since his death he has visited another medium and "I found things better than I thought."

He reminded Professor Hyslop of a certain colored water test that Hyslop had applied in testing a class of phenomena some 500 miles distant from Boston, and concerning which tests nothing had been mentioned in Mrs. Piper's presence prior to this spirit communication.

He reminded Professor Hyslop of a discussion that they had had over cutting down the manuscript of one of Hyslop's books several years ago.

In making these communications there was, according to Professor Hyslop, a display of a number of mental idiosyncrasies which were peculiarly characteristic of Dr. Hodgson.

Some New Ghost Stories.

There isn't a day that some new and apparently authentic story of spirits is not told by a person of undoubted credibility. One of the latest is by Sir George Cooper, who married the sister of the late Silent Smith, the multi-millionaire.

Sir George exiled himself from his beautiful country place at Hursley, England, because of the ghosts there, he frankly admits. He grew morbidly nervous because of the apparitions he had seen, which he declared constantly haunted him. He could not sleep and his nerves were completely unstrung. Finally Lady Cooper took him off to Egypt and gave orders that during their absence the house should be redecorated and largely rebuilt. Then the apparitions disappeared and Sir George recovered his health.

From Fairmount, N. Y., comes another ghost story, which is vouched for by all concerned. Mrs. Henrietta Hemmings begged her husband, Charles Hemmings, to bury her beside her second husband, Oliver Colburn.

"If you don't, I'll haunt you!" declared Mrs. Hemmings before her death.

But Hemmings buried her beside his first wife at Onondaga Hill cemetery. Now the family say that her ghost has reappeared and they want to reinter the body in accordance with the late Mrs. Hemming's wishes.

"My wife's spirit," says Hemmings, a man of unchallenged veracity, "has often appeared to me. I have frequently seen and heard her moving about the room in which she died."

No less a personage than King Edward of England vouches for the existence of at least one of the four ghosts which are believed to haunt Bufford abbey. His majesty visited the abbey last autumn for the Doncaster races, and, according to his custom, inhabited the state apartments which are supposed to be in the haunted part of the abbey.

"It looked like an old monk," said the King most seriously.

And in the courtyard is the tombstone of a man "who died of fright after seeing the Bufford ghost."

All Morgan county (Virginia) is excited over certain strange manifestations in the house of Emery Lopp, across the Potomac river from Hancock. Spirit pictures have suddenly appeared all over the walls.

"No human hand," said Mr. Lopp, "could have painted the scenes on the walls that appear in outline representing angels and devils, snakes and other weird creatures that crawl and fly. There are beautiful vistas and pits of flaming fires in such strong and striking contrast that the observer is awed by the seeming presence of some unseen power, and its work.

Dreams That Have Come True.

"I am at a loss to account for the mystifying affair. I first noticed the pictures about a month ago. At first the wall appeared to be discolored, as by smoke, and gradually the scenes began to take shape and the outlines became clearer and I called some neighbors in to inspect the scenes. They, too, were struck by the weird shapes and scenes upon which they looked with wondering eyes. The news went abroad until everybody in this part of the country became interested in the matter."

Closely associated with spirits are dreams that come true. The latest comes from Lakewood, N. J. At St. James' hospital lay Jack L. Chamberlain, an artist, suffering with heart trouble. The sisters tried to cheer him up, but he waved them aside. He knew better. Some unseen power had told him. He said:

"I have only three days more to live, Sister Josephine, so it is useless to hold out hope to me. But, nevertheless, I am very grateful for your words of encouragement."

In just three days to the hour he died."

"Timothy Carey, fourteen years old, of Bayonne, N. J., had a death dream that nearly came true. He dreamed that he had been killed while stealing a ride on the railroad. When the boys asked him the next day to come along and steal a few rides he tried to back out.

"Mamma's boy!" sneered his chums.

That piqued him; he took the dare and jumped on the first train that came along. When he jumped off he just missed falling under the wheels. As it was one of his arms was broken in four places and his head was gashed.

Oscar L. Austin and Lewis D. Austin were two brothers who lived in separate houses in Yonkers. The other night Oscar dreamed that he had seen Lewis lying dead on the floor. The horror of the dream awoke him. He put on his clothes and went around to his brother's house to find the dead body lying in the hallway just as he had seen it in his dream.

Who can explain this?

And here is a strange incident, narrated by Dr. Funk, which he vouches for absolutely:

"The wife of Judge A. H. Dailey, of Brooklyn, is a sensitive. One of her controls is a man who claims to have been a sea captain when on earth, declaring that he passed out of life during the civil war. To identify himself he described his early home in a small town in Massachusetts, where, he said, his mother's grave could be seen in the old graveyard, the tombstone having on it her name, which name he gave to Judge Dailey.

"The Judge determined to visit the town, a town which neither he nor his wife had ever previously visited, nor had they ever heard of this sea captain or of any members of his family, knowing nothing, in fact, about him. He and his wife went to the town, found the gravestone in the old graveyard, and the name inscribed as told by the spirit. This was a trivial fact, but to Judge Dailey it was conclusive."

"The Infidelity of Ecclesiasticism. A Menace to American Civilization." By Prof. Wm. M. Lockwood, lectures upon physical, physiological and psychic science. Demonstrator of the Molecular or Spiritual Hypothesis of Nature. Scholarly, masterly, trenchant. Price 25 cents.

"How to Train Children and Parents." Mrs. Elizabeth Towne takes the position that in many cases it is the parents that need the training more than the children, and advises parents to look to themselves. Twenty-five cents could not be better spent than in buying this little book. Anyone that has the care of children should read it. Price 25 cents.

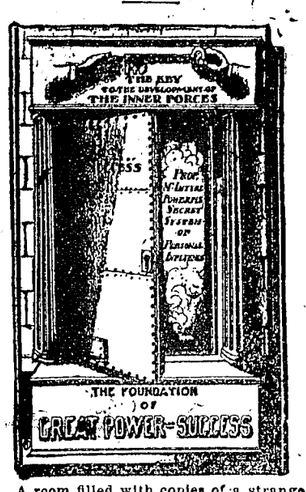
Who Wrote This Wonderful MYSTERIOUS BOOK?



Tells of Startling Secrets Jealously Guarded for Ages by Adepts.

Reveals the Marvelous Effects Produced in the Minds and Bodies of Sick and Unsuccessful People Through the Use of a Strange Force That Has Been Overlooked by the Public for Centuries Past.

Shows in Simple Language and Vivid Pictures How Men and Women May Cure Diseases and Habits as if by Magic and Wield a Powerful Influence Over the Minds and Lives of Others.

Why Some Succeed Where Others Fail.

Peculiar Arrangement by Which 100,000 Copies Are to Be Given Away by Mail—Absolutely Free.

A room filled with copies of a strange and mysterious book that contains startling and almost unbelievable evidence of psychic achievements is on exhibition at an institution in New York City. Copies of it have been read with amazement; speculation is rife among the author's friends as to who wrote it; some contend that no mind of his age could describe the possibilities of these carefully guarded systems of the wise old sages and secretive psychic adepts in such simple language and wonderful photographs.

Professor Frederick T. McIntyre, who claims authorship of the work, offers to send a copy free to any person who will, in his own handwriting, send the following, peculiar lines to him:

"I want power of mind,
Force and strength in look,
If my writing is satisfactory
Please send me the book."

Professor McIntyre says that he can tell by examining the specimens of handwriting he receives just what the one who penned them is best fitted for in life; what the writer's strong and weak characteristics are, and whether the writer will succeed in using to advantage the many powerful systems of personal influence and healing described in the book. Should the writer be sick or run down physically or mentally, and give the particulars of the trouble in a letter, Professor McIntyre claims he can tell what to do to get well quickly. He does not wish to send this book to any person who would use the system of personal control for any other than honorable purposes free. Like Andrew Carnegie, he believes in the distribution of valuable books.

This book is full of startling explanations and strange pictures proving that any one can master, in a short time, the power to control and sway the minds of others. It describes the strange phenomena of Psychic and Hypnotic influence; Mystic Healing; Psycho and Suggestive Therapeutics; Personal magnetism, and a combined, simple system of reading the characters of others, though thousands of miles away. It gives you the key to the development of the inner or dormant forces of concentration, force of character, will power, memory, determination, ambition, enthusiasm, inspiration, continuity of thought and the ability to throw off the evil effects of diseases and habits through an inner, subjective power, as the Hindoos banish disease and despondency.

It is, indeed, one of the most amazingly interesting books of the age, beaming with interest from cover to cover, and all who receive free copies of it can be thankful. It points out the road to financial and social success; it reveals astonishing facts that have been eagerly sought by the public for many years; proofs that almost carry one back to the days of great miracles.

If you wish a free copy of this wonderful book sit down and write the above verse and send it to Professor F. T. McIntyre, Dept. 1605, No. 126 West Thirty-fourth street, New York, N. Y.

All who write will receive it; no one will be disappointed; it will be sent by mail, postage paid and absolutely free.

It will write in full sight—yes, in full sight and it will write more, write better, write easier and keep on doing so longer than any other typewriter.

"I AM GOD!"

The Superlative Ignorance of Mahatma Agumya Guru Paramahansa.

"THE WISE ONE."

Some Particulars in Reference to the Noted Hindoo, Mahatma Agumya Guru Paramahansa—His Pretended Wisdom a Sham and Delusion—He Claims to be God, and Says that Spirits Do Not Return to Earth and Communicate.

In the course of this Hindoo's interview with William E. Curtis he said:

I asked the Mahatma's opinion of Jesus and His teachings.

He replied that Jesus was a pure soul and a sincere teacher of good, but His qualities of mind and His intellect corresponded to the people. He was sent to teach humble fisher folk. He was not a great thinker or a great metaphysician. "He had the power to work miracles," said the Hindu, "which is given only to those teachers who go among the ignorant masses that cannot be convinced in any other way. And Jesus was only the Son of God, WHILE I AM GOD. I am the incarnation of Krishna. I am from the beginning. This body that you see is temporary. It is like the clothing that I wear, and has nothing to do with the soul any more than this house has to do with my existence. I leave this house and pass into another at will. So the body may be discarded and the soul may pass into another."

"If you wise men of India have the light and know the way so much better than those of the western world, how do you account for the fact that the people of Christian nations are so much better off than the people of India?"

"Through all ages," said the Great Teacher, "India has preserved the philosophy which is the source of all the happiness and all the religions in the world. Those who comprehend such high philosophy unfortunately are few in number. Precious things are always rare. Spiritually India is very much in advance of the western world, but in the past India has been very cruel and corrupt and unjust, and is now being punished. Part of that punishment is to be ruled by an alien conqueror. But pain, misery and suffering are good for the soul, and to-day there is more real happiness in India than in the United States, because the people of India have the light and know the way. The naked peasant of India, sleeping on the ground, is nearer happiness than the millionaires of the United States, because true happiness comes only from within, and is not found in material things."

The Mahatma never leaves his room. He has not been outside the house in which he is stopping since his arrival, and probably will not leave it until he leaves New York. He visits no one he goes nowhere; those who desire to see him must come where he is, and visitors are always welcome. But, at the same time, they must observe certain conditions which are explained upon a slip of paper handed me as follows:

"Visitors to the Mahatma should bear in mind that he answers no questions relating to material things and does not care for conventional remarks about anything.

"He never voluntarily offers anyone a lesson. He never seeks a disciple. He is the source of all wisdom. To those who ask in all sincerity he always gives.

"If one wishes to become a disciple of truth and learn the method of mind control and happiness, then one must ask to be taught and he will teach him. The three conditions necessary to become a disciple are:

"1. Faith in the Mahatma.

"2. Absolute secrecy regarding the lesson. It cannot be mentioned even to another disciple.

"3. Absolute loyalty to the Mahatma in defending his name against any attack or criticism.

"Failure in any of the above conditions will deprive the lesson of all benefit and only result in injury."

I was permitted, however to ask him why he did not go out into the world and teach the common people. He replied that he taught only the intelligent few. He has no time to enlighten the ignorant. That would be a task that he could not undertake, and so he remains in semi-seclusion communing with disciples and explaining The Truth to them daily. He has no connection, association or sympathy with the theosophists of this country or Europe. He says that they misrepresent the philosophy of India; that they know nothing about it; that they are silly, arrant humbugs and impostors and are either suffering from delusions of their own or are purposely attempting to delude and mislead the public.

"They say in their books," he said, "that Mahatmas are mysterious, invisible beings who are never seen and communicate only with the chosen few on the astral plane, which is all humbug, and either dishonest or ignorant misrepresentation. Spiritualism is humbuggery. No spirit ever returns to the world except as the soul of a new-born child. The so-called clairvoyants are humbugs who make money deluding and deceiving people, principally women and young boys."

I asked the Mahatma about the famous Fakirs of India, those yellow-robed ascetics, who do such wonderful and mysterious things that you have heard about in the tales of travelers. He replied that he was not interested in the occult, but said that anyone who cares to spend the time and make the effort can acquire similar miraculous powers by going into the forests of the Himalayas, sitting naked for three years under the trees, eating the roots and berries that grow there and concentrating his mind upon the subject. But while such miraculous powers are genuine, he said, they are not to be encouraged. They distract the minds of the people from The Truth; they do not contribute to enlightenment and are a detriment to those who acquire them.

"Where did you acquire your wisdom?" I asked.

"I am Wisdom," replied the Great Master, with dignity.

"How long did it take you to acquire your knowledge?"

"Countless ages. I have existed from the beginning of things. Each individual reaps the crop that is sown by him in one life in the next. If good predominates, he is born in a better condition. If evil predominates he goes down to an inferior position. That is the law, and it explains the apparent injustice in some lives where good men are overtaken with misfortune."

"How do you know that yours is the true philosophy of life?"

"It is hard to teach owls, even when the sun's rays are shining on their backs. How can I explain to an ignorant man the subtleties of actual knowledge? Suppose you were living in a dark room and found your way into another room that was ablaze with light. Would you have any trouble to distinguish between the light and the darkness? I am the Light. Therefore I know," said the Mahatma impressively.

I asked if he had found any wise men in America, and he replied sadly that he had sought for them in vain.

I asked the Mahatma if enlightenment contributed to the material prosperity of the individual.

"Everything is possible to attain if the proper efforts are used, but without such efforts all claims to Higher Things are the works of defective egotism, and that is most harmful to the state of the mind. I see in your western land that everyone wants to perform miracles without doing anything to deserve such power. But you must bear in mind that, although you perform penance for the attainment of mortal prosperity, which will meet you according to the degree of your penance, it is a waste of time. In the garden of illusions all things are arranged to ensnare visitors. You must soar above these illusions and meet the Ultimate Source, when you will be so prosperous that you will bestow prosperity. If you will accept the help of High Thinking you will overcome all impossibilities. Think what was with you when you came into the world and what will accompany you when you depart from it. See how the mischievous desire for riches and fame often compels people to do things against their will. It makes them slaves and entangles them like miserable birds in the net of the Great Illusion. When I see countless birds ensnared in this net I want to release them.

"Ask the business men who are occupied with art, science and invention; ask the rich people who are eating at decorated tables, and those sleeping on silken beds, if they have happiness. They are sometimes contented with what they have because they cannot see beyond, but in their hearts they know that they are quite miserable. Riches, fame and the prosperity of the world will never satisfy you. No shadow ever satisfied the pursuer, because the shadow is his own. Stand firmly and ignore the shadow. The cause of all ignorance and distress is the Ego in you. If this Ego is swept away you are in peace. The Ego is yours; you are the owner, and if you will change it to the side of Ultimate Source it will be your slave and show you the Way, carrying the torch in its hand."

These words of the Great Master mean that all the sorrows of men, the troubles and misfortunes we encounter, are purely mental, and are the creations of an untrained mind.

"Sit down and close your eyes," he said, "and notice how your mind wanders and where it goes. It can rush to India in an instant, or to Paris or around the world, and in its incessant changings you can realize what a restless thing it is. Now if the mind can be controlled, which is the object of Yoga, it can be placed in accord with the high super-consciousness, which knows no anxiety and is all happiness."

"How is that power acquired?" I asked. "How can the vibrations of the mind be controlled."

"That is a secret which varies with the individual seeking The Light. It cannot be learned from books; only from a true teacher like Mahatma Agumya Guru Paramahansa."

* * *

The above constitutes the views of the celebrated Mahatma Agumya Guru Paramahansa. He exposes his extreme ignorance when he declares himself to be God, and that no spirit ever returns to earth except as the soul of a new-born child. The fact really is, practically speaking, these Mahatmas cannot impart anything of real value except what is already known here. Spirit return is known in India to be a grand truth as well as here, and those who seek "light" from this newcomer will receive a great deal of "darkness" instead. Give such teachers a wide berth.

A BEAUTIFUL DEATH.

An Angel Came With a Crown to Bestow Upon the Dying Woman.

To the Editor:—Our meetings have closed for the summer. I hope greater interest will be taken in true Spiritualism, and not so much attention, time and money given to phenomena (the genuineness of which is questioned even by those who attend) when our meetings start again in the fall.

As May brought a marriage, June with her roses brought a beautiful resurrection. Sarah A. Stiles, 82 years of age, passed to the spirit life June 20. She had been a true Spiritualist for thirty years, and "the change" was welcome to her.

It was truly a spiritual feast to sit by her bedside and watch the dear departed spirit forms come and go, and it was soul-inspiring to hear their beautiful messages. Three sons, husband, father, mother, brother, sister and sister-in-law, all came and gave her greetings, singing songs of love and home, and often among the rest were seen her two little babes and two or three grandchildren. One granddaughter, a beautful young spirit, spoke lovingly to "grandmother;" everyone knew her by that name, and gave her a hearty "welcome home."

The most beautiful thing, however, was the crowning of grandmother. For several hours she had not moved her head, when suddenly an angel appeared with a crown. Grandmother raised her head as the angel placed the crown on her. She smiled, and then laid her head more sidewise, as if to preserve the crown, and never moved again.

She had truly won her crown by good deeds and thoughts for every one. Her mansion, not made with hands, will indeed be large and beautiful. A few days before her passing on, she smiled sweetly and said: "I have not an ill feeling toward any human being." We can all learn a lesson here, and it would be well for us to be able to say the same every hour of our lives.

The writer preached the funeral sermon from Spirit Constance's beautiful thought, "The death sleep of earth is but the waking life of eternity."

More than one was made to know that our loved ones, passed on, can and do return and commune with us, in that beautiful "death chamber" of our arisen Grandmother Stiles.

INTERESTING PARTICULARS

About Animals and Their Psychic Perception.

"Die Uebersinnliche Welt," for for June [says Light of London] contains a lecture delivered by Colonel Josef Peters before the Society for Scientific Psychology at Munich, in which he gives several instances in which animals have apparently seen phantoms, whether perceptible or not to human beings, and in which the forms of animals have been seen by clairvoyants; many of these narratives have already appeared in "Light" and other English publications. He says that the country people in Denmark and Scotland have the same belief in the "second sight" of animals, and that Homer and other ancient authors speak of it, and attribute to animals a prescience of disasters about to happen, as appears to have been exhibited by the birds and animals in the West Indies before the volcanic outbreak of Martinique in 1902. Meier, a follower of Leibnitz, considered that animals had a soul similar to the human one, but of coarser material. This soul possesses sensations, but not intelligence in the higher sense.

If we suppose that the "soul," or psychic body, is the intermediary between the conscious spirit and the physical body, and that this spirit body is the true seat of sensations, which are transmitted to it by the physical brain, the center to which sense-impressions are led by the nerves from the sense-organs, then we cannot deny that animals must have such a psychic body, seeing that they, too, are conscious of sensations. In many respects the senses of animals are keener than our own, and therefore it is not surprising that they are sensitive to psychic impressions taking the form of sight and sound, for these are more nearly allied to objective sense impressions than to the purely intellectual or intuitional impressions which are received by mediums for mental phenomena. Every logical consideration points to the possession by animals of a psychic body with its proper faculties, though we may not credit them with mental and spiritual characteristics.

The same periodical contains a letter headed "Telepathy Between Human and Animal Souls," but which we think relates to another class of experience, either genuine spirit action, or perception "while out of the body." While the lady who narrates the occurrence was very ill, a favorite dog was sent to another house, and some days afterward brought back again. The dog was accustomed to lie on a rug in the hall, but on the first night after its return the rug was not given to it. In the morning the nurse said she had heard her mistress call to her during the night to go into the kitchen, get a certain key to open a certain door, find the rug, and give it to the dog. She went and found everything just as described; the singular thing was that the key and rug were not in their usual places, and that her mistress could not have known normally where they were, as she had been confined to her bed for several days; the lady was unaware that the dog had been brought back to the house, or that she had given these orders during the night.

My sister had for a few years a little Skye terrier, the pet of the house, which died of the distemper. We all mourned for "Toby," as she was called, and when my sister was taken from us, two years later, I wondered if she would ever meet her little loving favorite. Some years passed, and I learned of the blessings of Spiritualism, and was asked to meet a private medium, Mrs. S., at a house which I had never been in before. The medium saw and described my sister standing with her hand on my shoulder and gave me several clear proofs of her identity impossible to doubt. After the seance Mrs. S. went upstairs to put on her hat and we other visitors waited to say good-night in the hall. Our hostess called over the stair to me; "Had your sister a little gray dog? Mrs. S. sees your sister here with a dear little doggie jumping up on her, so full of loving attention." "Yes," I cried, "it will be Toby." "Oh yes," was the response, "she is so pleased to be recognized, and seems to be much with your sister." Now that was quite five years after Toby died.

May it not be that with all animals, human and sub-human, the duration of life will depend on the "power of love?" What we require to complete our happiness may be just the presence of these loving creatures who were cared for here, and were so constituted that they return a measure of love, and so are linked onto our humanity. Will it be possible, will it be desirable, for anyone to persist after love is exhausted? We may exist for a time after we leave this "body of death," but our life in the spirit, or psychic, world may be only for a time, and if we have not built up a spirit body for our soul life, we may find ourselves unable, and even unwilling, to remain. As on earth, even there the company and affection of a favorite animal may be helpful to develop the affections of some lonely souls. An old maiden lady apologized to me, one day, for making so much of her little lap-dog; "You see, my dear," she explained, "you think I should adopt some neglected child and give it my affection, but I dread the responsibilities, and I must have something to love!" I assured my friend that she was wiser than she knew; she might spoil the little dog with over much care, but less harm would be done than with a child, and she was certainly better to love her dog than to shut up and wither the plant of love in her heart!

If there are any horses and birds in heaven, or the spirit-world, why not dogs and cats? Yet all animals and all men and women may remain but for a time. Someone says that a man may lose his soul—but this does not mean that the man is lost; he may evolve another soul and take on a new life and attain, even late, to the true humanity.

Under Spirit Control.

Youngest Candidate for Ministry—Remarkable Three-Year-Old Chicago Boy Evangelist, Whose Great Memory Astounds Eminent Theologians—This Boy Is Undoubtedly Controlled by Spirits Interested in the Spread of Orthodox Teachings.

There is a story somewhere of a strange lost chord of music that when struck by chance one day, shattered an ancient jeweled vase into a million fragments. In the same mysterious way a single note from a violin has been known to break a champagne glass into a heap of sparkling dust.

Legends, too, have come from Thibet, where the holy men of India gather in their hillside temples, of an astral bell, the single ring of which wakes into understanding the elusive human soul, teaching the secrets of the unknown God and the meaning of life itself.

Down in the Pacific Garden Mission on Van Buren street the other night an incident occurred which strikes at that strange relation between music and the strings which make up the human heart, giving the human counterpart to the mystery of the jeweled vase. The incident also brought out the fact that Chicago has the youngest candidate for the ministry in the world—a little boy of three summers, whose life is dedicated by his own wish to the salvation of sinners and the spreading of the gospel throughout the nations.

On the night in question John Frederick Bromley, the three-year-old son of J. C. Bromley, one of the group of evangelistic students who act as guards on the Northwestern elevated railroad, made one of the audience at the mission.

Sunny Child Among the Outcasts.

The little boy sat with his father and mother, his great blue eyes wide with wonder, his sunny hair the one bright spot in the gloomy scene. The hobos and tramps and beggars who had shuffled into this slum mission from their beats on Clark and State streets gave the little visitor more attention than they gave to Harry Monroe, who was telling again the wonderful story of how he was saved from a drunkard's grave through the helping hand of Mrs. Clark, who runs the mission.

It came time when the "workers," one of whom was John Frederick's father, moved among the audience, seeking to turn the sinners from the error of their ways. This old, old tune was struck up:

"Tell mother I'll be there,
In answer to her prayer."

As the low, sad refrain breathed forth from the great audience of men, some of whom sat with bowed heads, the tears coursing down their cheeks, the little visitor burst into tears and hid his dainty face in his mother's lap.

"Muvver, don't sing 'at," he choked. "Please, muvver, don't."

The boy's whole body was trembling with the stress of his emotion.

Overcome by Strain of Music.

As he never had heard the song before, the boy's actions troubled the parents. They took him home, but it was a long time before he could be soothed. Every time that his mother starts to hum the tune John Frederick's little face puckers up, his eyes fill with tears, and he runs to his mother's knee. He cannot bear it.

Since that day if anyone asks John Frederick Bromley what he is going to be when he grows up he will reply: "I be peecher."

The lost chord had been struck in that plaintive old mission song, which found its echo, its refrain, and its complete expression in the white, tender soul of the student evangelist's son.

But with all this solemn calling John Frederick's life is not gray. In ordinary times he is as playful and care free as other boys who intend to be presidents and engineers and policemen some day.

There is another scene in his life which sets him aside from ordinary boys, however.

Born in the shadow of the Moody Institute on Chicago Avenue, where his father is a student, John Frederick has had all his short life the surroundings of a religious devotee. His mother is passionately religious, and the boy is taken to meetings and revivals of all sorts.

A month or so ago his father took him to one of the receptions given to the students of the Moody Institute—the solemn young men and women who are studying to be missionaries, preachers, and evangelists.

Quotes Scripture to Preacher.

In the hall the Rev. A. C. Dixon, pastor of the Moody church, was the central figure. He walked about among the students until he came finally to the corner where Mr. and Mrs. Bromley sat with their infant son. Mr. Dixon was pleased with the bright-faced little fellow and began to question him.

"Do you know the bible?" asked the minister playfully, expecting some childish answer. But instead John Frederick straightened up and began declaiming in a childish, lisping voice, but with great accuracy, verses such as these:

Romans iii., 24: "For we are saved by hope, but hope that is seen is not hope; for when a man seeth, what doth he yet hope for?"

John iii., 16: "For God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten son, that whosoever believeth in him shall not die, but have everlasting life."

The minister was astonished.

"And a little child shall lead them," he said softly, stroking the child's golden curls.

Singing Gospel Songs to Students.

But the assembly of divinity students still more was astonished when the child marched to the front of the room, and, as his mother played the piano, picked up a stick and began beating time in true revival fashion and singing:

"'Tis the old time religion, the old time religion,
Makes me love the good old bible,
makes me love the good old bible,
'Tis the old time religion and it's good enough for me."

Other songs sprang to the child's lips. The wand never failed to rise and fall to the correct inflection of the church music.

"Now sing the Glory Song," said the boy. The mother played the opening chords and this came in the sweet, piping baby voice:

"When all my labors and trials are o'er,
And I am safe on that beautiful shore,
Just to be near the dear Lord I adore,
Will through ages be glory for me."

And the chorus, with the wand going up and down and the fascinated students joining in a rush of devotion:

"O that will be glory for me,
Glory for me, glory for me,
When by his grace I shall look in his face,
That will be glory, be glory for me."

The eyes of the boy glowed with a divine enthusiasm as the last words fell from his lips. The students crowded around him and wondered.

Mrs. Bromley is more than proud of her boy. She worships him, and never tires telling of his marvelous ways.

Prefers Hymns to Mother Goose.

"I first discovered his tendency for religious things, especially sacred music, last summer," she said, "when I took him down to my mother's farm in Maryland. His uncle began to teach him the ancient Mother Goose rhymes and he learned them so quickly that I thought it better to teach him something it would be good for him to know. So I began telling him bible verses and selections from revival hymns. It was wonderful the way he picked them up and the passion he displayed for them. I never could teach him enough."

In his home at 117 Locust street, a flat in a street of flats, the boy is sweet and natural.

"Has oo found key for me car engine?" he asked a visitor the other day as he appeared romping in the parlor dragging a broken toy engine with him.

Before this question was answered he had taken the visitor's hat and was in the act of crushing it over his own golden curls.

The hair is the boy's chief glory. It hangs down to his shoulders in soft curls that never are in order. The sun lingers lovingly on his head wherever he walks. His eyes are a deep, wonderful blue, soft and clear, and subject to sudden storms of tears like the blue sea of the tropics. His mouth is like a rosebud, and the rest of his features soft and vague and childish.

"Will you repeat verses for the visitor?" asked his mother. But the boy preferred playing with his engine. No amount of persuasion could conquer his shyness at that moment. Finally he was asked to sing. His face flushed with joy.

Keeps Time Like a Choir Leader.

He ran to a corner and fished out a stick such as choir leaders use. Then planting his sturdy little feet squarely together he waved it in signal for his mother to proceed.

"What shall I play, dear?" she asked, seating herself at the piano.

"Frowning," answered the boy.

"You mean 'Crowning'? No, try 'Step by Step,'" said Mrs. Bromley. The boy nodded, raised his baton, and began:

"I need not ask what time will bring,
While to my Savior's hand I cling,
A song of trust my soul can sing,
For step by step he will lead me.

Chorus—(Boy waving stick in ecstasy.)

"Step by step to the glory land,
My Savior guides with a loving hand;
I go to dwell with the blood-washed band,
And step by step he will lead me."

Other songs were called for. The boy seemed to have the book of Moody hymns on the tip of his tongue. His eyes were raised to heaven and a rapt expression crossed his face.

Finally he asked in the most natural manner in the world:

"Me p'ay for oo?"

The visitor nodded and the boy knelt at his mother's knee and began:

"Our Father, who art in heaven, give us this day our daily bread."

"He won't let his father go to work in the morning without praying," said Mrs. Bromley.

When the visitor came to go he offered John Frederick a dime.

"Buy some peanuts," said the visitor grandly.

"No; me take Sunday school," said John Fredtrick.—Chicago Tribune.

PRODIGALS.

I.

How strangely prodigal we are
Who have so short a while to stay!
We fear to die, but journey far
For help to pass our time away;
Because the moments drag we fret,
Yet dread the end to which we haste;
We view the past with keen regret,
And still the precious present waste.

II.

We sigh at night for day to dawn,
Tho' we may never, all our lives,
Bring back a moment that is gone,
Or keep an hour when it arrives;
Impatiently we watch and wait
For pleasure that shall briefly last,
And, having won them, add the great
Day of their coming to the past.

III.

We sigh for manhood when the ways
Are strange and long and stretch ahead,
And sit regretting wasted days
When youth and youth's fond hopes are fled;
Yet, even as we voice regret
For those glad seasons, hurried through,
We nurse impatience and we fret
For next year and for something new.

IV.

How strangely prodigal we are
Of that which we should dearly prize!
We scheme and plan and journey far
To pass the time that quickly flies!
We dread the silent end we know
That each of us must find somewhere;
But great and small and high and low,
Through all our [illegible] we hurry there.

KISER.

MARRIED BY THE SPIRIT OF JULIUS CAESAR, SHE SAYS.

Thinks Ghostly Manipulations are Responsible for the Coffee Color of Her Baby, but Physicians Scoff at the Idea as Ridiculous.

New York, June 8.—Mrs. Annie Layman, a white woman, 30 years old, held a coffee-colored baby in her arms when she appeared before Magistrate Whitman in the Yorkville police court. She explained to the court that she had gone through the spiritualistic form of marriage and she believed that departed spirits were responsible for the African tinge that showed in the baby's complexion.

"Julius Caesar performed the marriage through Manna Misteria, the Medium," she went on. "The spirits must work through a material body in this world. That body is named the medium. I was employed by Mme. Payne, of 215 West Thirty-fourth street, and that is how I became a Spiritualist and got to know Manna Misteria.

"I would go to her seances in West Twenty-fifth street. When I was being married the medium informed me that it was the spirit of Julius Caesar that was performing the ceremony." Several other spirits from the other world came to take part in the wedding, and manifested themselves through the medium, she said. These spirit guests told her that they would act the part of guardian over whatever children came to her, and she thought it likely that they had designated the color of the baby for some good purpose known only to themselves.

In Bellevue hospital, where the baby was born, two weeks ago, the physicians and nurses scoffed at the spiritualistic explanation of the baby's appearance, but then they were unbelievers, and could not understand.

They asked her if she had recently undergone a fright, and she recalled that she had been greatly shocked by seeing two negro women fighting with knives. The physicians told her that the incident fully explained the matter, but she did not look at it in that way.

PREMATURE INTERMENT.

Man Buried Alive Gets Help by Waving Hand Above Grave—Remarkable Story of Resurrection After One Week of Suspended Animation Is Reported from Chinese City.

The Chicago Inter Ocean of late date has the following special cable dispatch from Hong Kong:

A "ghost" that eats has thrown the towns of Siang-fu district into a commotion. The facts are remarkable. The 30-year-old son of Tzi Lung, a school teacher, was thought to have died of typhus fever. His family being very poor, the body was placed in a frail wooden coffin and buried only a few inches under the soil outside the western gate of the town of Siangyang.

A week later a man put his horse to graze upon the spot. The beast found good grass near the grave and brought his foot down on the soil above the coffin, the lid of which was broken. In a little while the owner of the horse saw a gaunt white arm thrust up through the hole made by the horse's hoof.

Thinking the dead man's "ghost" was about to rise to avenge the insult offered in the breaking of the coffin, the watcher hurried up and began shoveling earth into the hole to keep the "ghost" down. A muffled voice expostulated and begged to be freed, claiming to be the living son of Tzi Lung. The watcher fled in terror to the town, where he told every one he met of what had happened. The "ghost's" father urged that the "ghost" be left alone and not further disturbed.

A large crowd, however, went out of the city to view the wonder. The "ghost" kept begging most piteously to be let out. One man had courage enough to unearth the cover of the coffin completely, and open it, allowing the "resurrected" man to sit up. Rice soup and wine were brought and ravenously devoured by the "ghost," still sitting upright in his coffin, embedded in the earth.

Finally the unhappy "ghost" was released and confined in a temple until he could prove himself to be a living man.

IN MEMORY

Of Our Beloved Friend, Mr. Jas R. Little.

In life you seldom find a friend,
That understands your every mood,
He comforts you and helps you so,
You cannot stop to sigh or brood.

You never had to tell him why
You came, because "he always knew;"
You sat and rested by his side,
And felt he loved and trusted you.

And when you left his side you felt
God's mercy, grace and tenderness
Lived in his heart to cheer each life,
To comfort those in deep distress.

In leaving us to soar above,
In realms of thought so sweet to cheer
Each heart he helped when here below
Will wish in spirit he was near.

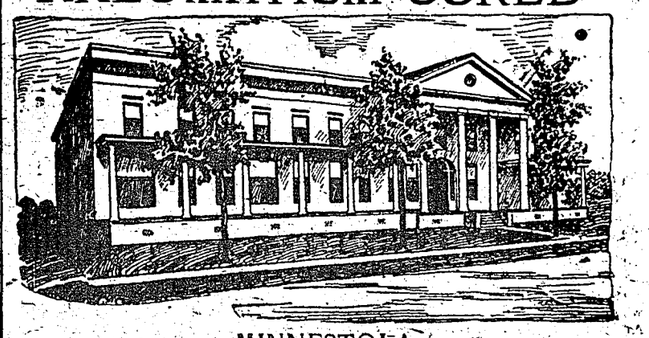
SIX HISTORIC AMERICANS.

A Book That Every American Freethinker Will Delight to Own.

By John E. Remsburg.

The work consists of two parts, "The Fathers of Our Republic," and "The Saviors of Our Republic." In regard to Paine's religious views, Mr. Remsburg establishes the negative of the following (1) Was Paine an Atheist? (2) Was he a Christian? (3) Did he recant? Page after page of the most radical freethought sentiments are culled from the correspondence and other writings of Franklin and Jefferson, which show that these men were as pronounced in the rejection of Christianity as Paine and Ingersoll. That Washington was not a Christian nor a believer in Christianity. In support of Lincoln's infidelity he has collected the testimony of more than one hundred witnesses.



The book is handsomely bound in cloth, giving fine portraits of George Washington, Benjamin Franklin, Thomas Paine, Thomas Jefferson, Abraham Lincoln and U. S. Grant; also portrait of the author.

This book contains 365 pages, printed on heavy paper, well bound in cloth. Price, $1.25. For sale at this office.

Jonah is Ruled Out of Court.

Jonah and the whale have been thrown out of the Circuit Court of St. Louis County. Judge McElhinney ni a decision to-day declared himself unwilling to listen to arguments along the line of biblical questions. He does not wish to go on record, either, as having determined whether the Garden of Eden was a myth or a reality. He says all this has nothing to do with the points of law at issue in the case of the Bible College of Missouri against Rev. George W. Hoffman.

Mr. Hoffman subscribed $5,000 to the college some time ago, and then refused to pay it because he said the institution was not orthodox. He says the college teaches its students that the miracles related in the Bible are myths.

The college sued for payment of the subscription.

By the decision to-day the case will be tried merely on the points of law, the attempt to bring in Jonah, Lazarus and other biblical characters being ruled out of order.

The Products of the Holy Book.

Churchmen want us to omit the past and write of the now and the future. "It is unpleasant," they say, "to have the crimes of our Christian ancestors constantly ringing in our ears." Here is a single paragraph from that learned author, Ernest Lecky. Read it, dear good Christian friend:

"Of the sufferings of those who were condemned for witchcraft—800 being sentenced to death by one judge, Remy, of Nancy; 400 perishing at a single execution at Douay, and 7,000 being burned at Treves—Lecky says: "Not for them the wild fanaticism that nerves the soul against danger and steels the body against torments; not for them the assurance of a glorious eternity that has made the martyr look with exultation on the rising flame; not for them the solace of lamenting friends or the consciousness that their memories would be cherished and honored by posterity. They died alone, hated and unpitied. They were deemed by all mankind the worst of criminals. Their very kinsmen shrank from them as tainted and accursed."

And why the worst of criminals? Because the Lord said:

"Thou shalt not suffer a witch to live."

So through all the Middle Ages their slaughter went on, and there is that infernal old Jew book, with that damnable command from a pretended god, still staring us in the face, and Christians idolizing that product of barbarism wish the world to forget the crimes it has caused.

If those same Christians were governed by that book the slaughter woud still go on. It is no wonder they are ashamed of its bloody teaching.

If all the Bibles in the wide world were gathered in one huge mass and burned, and their contents were forgotten, the world would be the gainer because of their destruction.

The Right Was Victor.

No more disturbance of general tranquility by the ringing of church bells at Clear Lake, Iowa, is the outcome of a bitter contest which has there been waged against the nuisance for a long time, during which much bad blood has been engendered. The people have finally triumphed, and bigots mourn.

A New Location Found.

Rev. Zed H. Copp, of the Presbyterian Church of Bethany, Va., has made one of the most important discoveries of the age, which has just gained publicity. He says: "Hell is in the sun." He discovered the fact eight years ago. The Bible, that inspired volume, the source of all truth, was the telescope through which he gained this important information. The tortures of the damned, he says, just fits the hell theory in the sun. Perhaps he will find in due time that our excessive hot days in summer come from renewing the infernal fires when some arch sinner arrives from earth who has had the audacity to look upon hell as a priestly invention to gain control over their victims.

Modern scientific thought inclines to the belief that the temperature of the sun is no greater than that of our earth; that for all we know to the contrary, it may be the abode of animal life; that the light and heat imparted by the sun to planets probably comes from the friction of electricity in its rapid flight through the atmosphere, being cold at its entrance.

But science is never consulted in the location of the infernal regions. The volcanic fires of Aetna, of Stromboli, or of Vesuvius, were evidently the parent of the priestly idea, and its location has shifted from time to time to accommodate churchly needs.

Out of Date and Worthless.

That was a bold statement of Rev. Dr. Johnston Myers, pastor of the Immanuel Baptist Church, of Chicago, when he declared "sermons are out of date."

The church Dr. Myers represents was founded by the late Dr. Lorimer, said to be one of the strongest churches in the city.

Half a century ago two sermons a Sunday, with one in the evening, was the common practice with all the orthodox churches. The sermons were generally rehashes which came down from a former generation. The horrors of a burning hell, the terrible scenes of a general judgment, the separation of loved ones when the final doom was pronounced, were themes most generally dwelt upon in such sermons, a distorted text from the Bible was employed.

A vacation for the preacher was never dreamed of, for the Devil was still abroad, and there was danger in case of relaxation that "old split-foot" would steal away members if the preaching did not go on.

Good morals would not suffer if all sermons, which the masses scarcely comprehend, were eliminated from church service. And may not the same be said in truth of prayers, addressed to the people over God's shoulders?

Modern Science Bible's Aid.

Modern science has disproved the miraculous element of biblical narration and furnished a more rational viewpoint for theology, according to Professor Herbert A. Youtz, of the Congregational College of Canada, Montreal. Flaws in orthodox religious views are pointed out in an article on "Three Conceptions of God" in the American Journal of Theology, issued from the University of Chicago press.

"This is a transition period in thought," Professor Youtz declares. "We are outgrowing our old conceptions of God's relationship to His world. Supernaturalism as a philosophy no longer satisfies thinking men, and we are all engaged in achieving a better philosophy, and in adjusting ourselves to a new view of the facts. Scientific thinkers have discovered a new world, and we are trying to find an explanation to fit the facts.

"Modern science, in the name of astronomy, geology, physics, chemistry and other accredited branches, has been discovering and verifying the laws of reality."

Paganism Versus Christianity.

There is nothing better in life than justice, truth, temperance, fortitude. Never value anything as profitable to thyself which shall compel thee to break thy promise, to lose thy self-respect, to HATE ANY MAN, to suspect, to curse, to act the hypocrite, to desire anything which needs walls and curtains. While thou livest be good and do good.—Marcus Aurelius.

If any man come to me and hate not his father, and mother, and wife, and children, and brethren, and sisters, yea, his own life also, he cannot be my disciple.—Jesus Christ. Luke 14:26.

And such, in many respects, is Christianity in practical life. The contrast between Paganism, as promulgated by the old philosophers, and Christianity, as we meet it in daily experience, is very marked.

Dear, Dear! Very Sad.

The announcement is made by the railroads which observe recent legal enactments reducing fares to 2 cents a mile that "all half-fare concessions will be discontinued forthwith." This means preachers will no longer travel over the country at children rates. And, O, dear, what will become of our spiritual Reverends, who embraced the title that they could travel cheaply?

Sees His Father Die.

Preacher's Vision Tells Him of Death Across the Ocean.

The Rev. Henry Rollings, who is now taking a special course as a medical missionary in the New York Homeopathic Medical college, has had an experience which may result in the postponement of his actual labors after graduation until he can be induced by several psychical societies in the larger cities to describe the remarkable mental condition into which he fell when he saw, as in a vision, his father at the point of death when his father was 3,000 miles away. The death bed scene was corroborated two weeks later in every detail in a letter from England.

Dr. Rollings received his theological education in England and was ordained in the established church. He came to America with Bishop Sullivan, colonial bishop of the Church of England. He had no superstitions and did not believe in hallucinations except those that came from impaired digestion.

Dr. Rollings said:

"My father was Geoffrey Rollings, of Bedfordshire, England, and between us the tie of consanguinity was strong. After a particularly arduous day I threw myself on my bed, exhausted, and fell into a slumber from which I was awakened by a vivid picture. I sat up and saw my father as distinctly as I ever saw him in my life, and heard him call out: 'My boy, my boy, I am dying.'

"The picture that was presented to me was that my father was lying on a bed in a room I did not recognize. I could tell by the general furnishings that it was English. I saw my father sink back on the pillows and knew that he was dead.

"Then my second self, or whatever you see fit to call it, seemed to resolve itself back into my material body, and I cried out that my father was dead. I was told that I was suffering from nervous prostration and should return to bed. I obeyed and slept for about eight hours.

LETTERS PROVE VISION WAS TRUE.

"Two weeks later a letter from England told me of the death of my father at the exact hour when I had seen him, and added that just before he died he had seen me at his bedside.

"The letter told me that the family had removed from the old homestead to another house in Bedfordshire, which I never had seen."

The Gods of the Bible.

Prof. W. M. Lockwood, the erudite scientist and delver into the secrets of Nature, as well as student of history and what pretends to be history, has published a list of "The Forty-seven Gods of the Bible," several of whom were worshiped by the patriarchs.

It is a helpful adjunct to one who wishes to acquaint himself with the Bible gods, their character and tribal relationships, by a study of those portions of the Bible in which they are severally mentioned.

Taking the Bible for it, certainly some of them were hard old cases, and not such as an enlightened, thoroughly civilized and humanitarian people would ever worship, except under the dominant stress of fear—a worship having its source in fear, and not in love.

For instance, there was Moloch, the god of the Ammonites, to whom human sacrifices were offered in the valley of Tophet. Was there any lovable quality in such a god?

And viewed from the standpoint of modern humanitarian ethics, how much superior to the Ammonite Moloch was the Hebrew Jehovah who required wholesale sacrifices of innocent domestic animals, the best of their kind selected from their herds, the aroma from the burning flesh being a sweet smelling savor in the nostrils of this Hebrew deity? How abhorrent—and yet he was worshiped—in fear of his wrath.

How many of these "Gods of the Bible" were regarded by their worshipers as Infinite? Were they not in general regarded in that limited, class aspect, as "OUR GOD"—the god of OUR family, OUR tribe, OUR people, OUR nation, and reverenced as such only? If they gained a victory over another tribe or nation—to God—their God—they ascribed their success. If they were defeated in war, their God was angry, and had inflicted punishment on them for some dereliction or disobedience. Whatever befell them, be it good or ill, was their God's work—and he was always right. If he sent refreshing showers he was good—if famine came for want of rain, God did it—and their suffering was just.

However, we have read of an African tribe that was more sensible. If their god failed to answer their prayers for rain, after due time, they attached a rope to his neck and dragged him in disgrace through their village—and finally as much as said: Now will you be good? Now will you give us rain?

If we could only have a catalogue of all the gods that have been manufactured by the fertile imaginations of men during all the ages past, and up to and including the present—but it would require volumes upon volumes to contain the list. But what a study it would afford, of the vagaries, the vain imaginations, the wild, weird and fantastic capers of the mentality of man under the influence of the "God Idea."

And, by the way, as an aid to the comprehensive study of the God Idea as it shows in the history of the race from the earliest known ages, there is no better, more instructive and satisfactory work than Hudson Tuttle's book "The God and Christ Ideas."

That old philosopher known as St. Paul wrote (I Cor. viii:5, 6,) "For though there be that are called gods, whether in heaven or in earth, (as there be gods many and lords many), but to US there is but one God."

It seems a trait of human nature for each individual to think, as one in the Old Testament expresses it, "THEIR god is not as OUR God," etc.

The God question has been discussed and literally fought over for ages and seems likely to continue an endless subject for man's mental exploitation. It would be a good mental exercise, to sit down "in the Silence," and just take an inward mental view of infinity of being—and think; God is just as much HERE as he is ANYWHERE; if we can't find God HERE, we can't find him ANYWHERE!

This is not saying there is no God.

ANOTHER VICTORY.

Another legal victory has been won for Spiritualism. The long-awaited decision of the Michigan Supreme Court in the John Goff will case has been rendered, as evidenced by the following telegram from the leading attorney in the case:

"George B. Warne,
Lily Dale, N. Y.:
"Goff case reversed! Victory is ours! Will write. A. LYNN FREE."

Had the opinion been of a different nature the Goff bequest of $20,000 would have been irretrievably lost to Spiritualism; but now another chance is given to fight for it in the lower courts. Wake up, Michigan Spiritualists!

PROF. LEWIS AND SPIRITUALISM.

Communication from President Barrett in Explanation.

It is with real pleasure that I read Prof. H. Spencer Lewis' disclaimer in the last issue of The Progressive Thinker, as to the authorship of the article published over his name in the Washington Post of January 11, 1907. I was in Seattle, Wash., at the time and did not see the article till some time after it had appeared in the Post. Through the Clipping Bureau, to which I am a subscriber, I received exact duplicates of that article from not less than three different papers. One of them was published in Toronto, Canada, the second in Leavenworth, Kansas, and the third in St. Louis, Mo. As they were identical with the article that appeared in the Post, I concluded that the essay bearing Prof. Lewis' name had been syndicated and was being published at will in all sections of the land. No two of the papers in question published the article at the same time.

I wrote my reply to the alleged Lewis article, in Seattle, and sent a copy of it to the Leavenworth, Kan., Times, and later to the Canadian journal in which the other had appeared. The Post was fair, and published my article in full. I have nothing to retract from what I said in the Post, yet I am more than pleased to know that Prof. Lewis is not the man at whom my words were directed. I was after the one who said that there had never been an authentic message received from the world of souls. Prof. Lewis never said any such thing, therefore my sharp criticism did not apply to him. I could not make that syndicated article agree with what I knew of Prof. Lewis as a scientist, nor yet with what he had written in favor of Spiritualism in The Progressive Thinker and other journals.

His outspoken acknowledgment of the genuineness of the spirit message appeared in the Spiritual papers the very same month the denunciation of it saw the light in the Washington Post. My work as editor-at-large is only a small portion of the duties now devolving upon me. I only wrote thirty-one articles in defense of Spiritualism in the month of May. The duties of the president of the N. S. A. are manifold, and one of them now happens to be the work of the editor-at-large. The president of the N. S. A. were situated so that he could do it, I happen to know that he would not not accept one dollar of salary from the N. S. A. Unfortunately we are not all able to live upon air, nor can we all forego an income. Lucky is he who can do so, when he uses his time and splendid mental forces so wisely as does Prof. Lewis.

"THE THEORY OF SPIRITUALISM"

A New Book by Charles M. Lane.

This is a volume of nearly 400 pages, abounding in matter worthy of being written and published. It treats comprehensively of Spiritualism and its teachings, in plain language, easy to be understood by all readers. The chapters are usually short, not fatiguing the mind, yet clear and concise. There are also a number of brief essays by noted spirit thinkers, that add to the value of the book as an exposition of Spiritualism.

It is published and for sale by the Evergreen Publishing Co., St. Louis, Mo. Price $1.50.

One solitary philosopher may be great, virtuous and happy in the midst of poverty, but not a whole nation.—Isaac Iselin.

Success is full of promise till men get it, and then it is last year's nest from which the bird has flown.—H. W. Beecher.

A MURDER ATTEMPTED.

The Fakes Trying to Kill Robert T. Hale.

We learn from a late number of the Los Angeles (Cal.) Herald that on the night of July 2, what the victim calls a premeditated and deliberate attempt was made to murder Robert T. Hale, senior member of the real estate firm of Hale & Co., of 505½ South Main street, and president of the Anti-Fakers society of Southern California, as he was walking from the Spiritualist camp near Edendale, at the city limits, to the car line which was to bring him into town.

Mr. Hale declares three shots, evidently from an automatic pistol or other rapid-fire gun, were fired at him, and only the bad marksmanship of the man who held the weapon is responsible for the fact that he is alive and was able to report the outrage last night.

Mr. Hale tells the following story: "At an early hour yesterday afternoon I received a telephone mesage from my friend, Prof. John McLane, who is a member of the recognized Spiritualist colony of this community, to call on him at the summer camp of the Spiritualists, which is being conducted near Edendale. Prof. McLane is building on the grounds a bungalo, and when I arrived we engaged ourselves most of the afternoon in work about the new house. All afternoon we cheerily worked, doing such jobs as we found about the place, and at the close of the day left the camp to catch the 8:30 o'clock car into town.

"The road from the camp to the car line runs through a small stretch of woods which lines both sides of the walk. As I reached the far end of the woods a report rang out and a bullet sang uncomfortably near my ear. That I was startled goes without saying, but for the moment I had no idea that I was the object of the shot. The next instant undeceived me in this respect, as a second shot rang out and the bullet came much closer than the first.

"In an instant I remembered several warnings that I had received that my life was to be attempted and also many threats that had been sent through the mails.

"As the second shot sounded on the air I ducked for cover, and as I did so a third report sounded. The bullet winged its way close to my dodging figure and left no doubt but what I was the objective point of the missile.

"I ran for the car line to get away from what to me was plainly an attempt at assassination. The shots were heard in the Spiritualist camp which I had just left, and a number of people ran from there down the road and soon joined me. Under the escort of these friends I continued on my way until I arrived at the street car line, and then came on into the city, where the matter was reported to the police and sheriff's departments.

"There is no doubt but what a deliberate attempt was made to kill me, and that the people who made the attempt chose the time with knowledge of my movements.

"While never before has an attempt been made upon my life, I have received numerous and threatening letters that I would be killed unless I let up in my campaign against the fraudulent mediums, spookologists and other fakers of like ilk in this city and vicinity, and I have been warned time and again to look out for myself or I would be done away with.

"In the battle which has been conducted against the faking and buncoing class of mediums in Los Angeles and vicinity no one has been more energetic than myself. I have exposed and driven out of the business scores of fakers and earned the undying enmity of the leaders of this gold brick band by my actions. That they would have the temerity to attempt my life I had not believed up to this time.

"Consequently I have paid no attention to the numerous threats that have been made against me, but have pursued my way without deviation from my fixed purpose to drive every faker in Southern California out of the business of hoodwinking the public by false representations and seances and meetings. That these fakers are serious in their threats to put me where I can do them no more harm is evidenced by the attack made last night."

Chief of Police Flammer and Sheriff Hammel have detailed men to search for the would-be assassins, and should they be caught they will be shown as little mercy as they intended for Mr. Hale in that lonely wood road yesterday evening.

Prophetic Dreams Fulfilled.

In 1867 my brother Lewis and I lived with our widowed mother in Columbus, Ohio. One night I dreamt that mother and I were walking together towards the Scioto River, which flows through the city, with the intention of crossing it on a long, narrow foot-bridge, but we found the river overflowing its banks so that we had to wade through a stream of water to reach the bridge. Mother was taken away by this stream. I reached the bridge and there I stood looking at her being carried away in the middle of the boisterous river till I lost sight of her. In the morning I related to her my dream.

At lunch the same day, brother Lewis said, "Mother, I had a very impressive dream last night. I dreamt that our house was surrounded by deep, turbulent water. William and I were safe in the house, but we could not find you despite all our efforts."

Mother said, "It is most likely that you have both been forewarned of my death."

A few days after that, one night I was taken sick in bed with excruciating pains in my sides and breast. Mother, while applying plasters of mustard said to me, "I feel I would like to take a part of your pain on myself if that would relieve you." By the morning I was greatly relieved, and about noon mother began to experience the same kind of suffering. It was pleurisy and inflammation of the lungs. After four days she died.

Now, observe the difference between my dream and that of brother Lewis. He dreamt that in the midst of the flood, he and I were safe in the house, but mother could not be found. I dreamt that I waded through a stream of water, reached the bridge where I saw mother taken away in the mighty flood, and so it was fulfilled. I had to undergo part of the sickness of which my mother died. I have always regarded our dreams as truly prophetic. KYMRO.

Zion as It Was and Now Is—Dowie at First a Great Healing Medium, Performing Cures Almost Miraculous—The "Gift of Tongues" Manifested May Be the Result of Spirit Control.

With the recent closing of Dr. Dowie's eventful career, history will have to record an epoch of divine healing through the prayer of faith, the like of which the world has never seen before and may never see again. Hundreds of thousands of people were restored by its subtle power, and marvelous were the healings of many, and equal to any as recorded of Jesus in the Bible, about which only the ignorant delight to scoff and ridicule.

After suffering for many days intense pain from a complication of sciatic and lumbago, and instantly healed at the appointed time for prayer, the writer sought and found many a chance to witness the often wonderful effect of faith upon others, in cases of cancer, epilepsy, palsy, blindness, deafness, tuberculosis, gangrene of the bones, and also of the bowels.

This last case was that of a young man, the son of a New York lawyer, whose emaciated condition prevented the knife wounds of the surgeon to close again, so that the perforated bowels disclosed their moving contents within, and yet, when dying on a stretcher he was prayed for. The young man obeying the command to arise, did so, and walked arm in arm with Dr. Dowie to the dining room, and there partook of a heavy meal, including sour pickles, and has been hale and hardy ever since.

But the mysterious handwriting has appeared on Zion's wall; its glory has departed, and the outward "Peace to thee" is often but a cloak to conceal the inner war-cry.

Though there are many healing mediums, yet none of them, nor all combined, can equal the record made by Dr. Dowie. What a pity that his usefulness was cut short in such an inglorious way, and what a commentary on a great but lop-sided intellect to conceive of an omnipotent and omniscient Being as a Loving Father, to be so absent-minded as to create a monster of a Devil, and endow him with power greater than his own, and being now too impotent to subdue the wily fellow, on a compromise engages him as the hired man, to torment and tempt the children of earth, so that most of them may land in hell. What a consistency!

Little children believe in Santa Claus until knowledge dispels their fond illusion; not so with adults though. When preconceived ideas and notions are stronger than their capacity to reason, they will tenaciously cling to the most nonsensical absurdities. They cannot learn by observation, logic and reason; but they will and must learn eventually in the dear school of bitter experiences.

When Dr. Dowie once said that if Zion is not of God, it should be smashed, and the sooner the better, little did he realize that the time was so close at hand that even himself, as a mental and physical wreck, should be buried so soon amid the ruins of his once proud, famous and powerful organization, and its founder, once the most hated, loved and feared by different factions, lies now, what is left of his mortal coil, in an obscure grave in Zion City, with nothing to mark its resting place save a psychologic mountain of broken hopes, of tears, of suffering, and grim despair, as contributed by his numerous disappointed followers, many of whom had lost their all—even faith in God and men. But his great army of toadying officers, who had vied with each other for the grace of their deluded master, and were forever scheming for favors and promotions, if not to down a dangerous rival, by any and all—but seldom by fair—means, have split in many factions and scattered broadcast, except a small group who, having lost their former jobs and prestige, are scheming again for another chance of an income without labor.

It is wonderful to what means these holy men will resort in order to gain their point and the people's confidence and money, and looking at the effects of their flexible conscience, one is involuntarily reminded of the lamenting Kozebu when he exclaimed: "O men, O men, ye false and hypocritical broods of crocodiles, with eyes as soft as water, with hearts as hard as steel, with kisses on your lips and daggers in your bosom."

At a recent visit to Zion City the writer had the pleasure to converse a few minutes with both of the gentlemen who contend for the leadership as General Overseer. While Mr. Voliva claims the title as God's chosen leader, Mr. Lewis, his opponent, claims the same on the lawful bequest from Dr. Dowie. There are other factions with would-be leaders, and all of them claim to work for the glory of God and the love of Jesus, but none of them refuses compensation except Mr. Lewis alone: he pays his expenses out of his own pocket. He has done so for over two years, and intends to continue to do so in future; and while not questioning their claim, fitness nor sincerity, it seems that providence itself had assigned Mr. Voliva to rid the people of a horde of insatiate and greedy monsters, the office-holders "for revenue only," who unblushingly drew unearned salaries—one of them over $333 per month, living, as it were, not on the fat of the land, because starvation was blighting the town for many months, but on the sweat of the brow from the poor, the widow, and the fatherless, who were contented with a dry crust that their leader might have plenty and to waste.

Whatever fate may have in store for Voliva, he acted a little Napoleon in routing the grand-stand clique of ecclesiastical leeches, and is deserving of credit, even though doomed for his Waterloo in the end.

It is but natural that under the prevailing conditions some discouraged people wish to dispose of their holdings to move elsewhere; and no sooner were such intentions circulated when some super-smooth one among the holy brethren was ready to "do them," as a land agent from Chicago, by offering to exchange their property for town lots in the fever swamps of New Mexico, which are said to be more valuable than those at the north pole.

Mr. Brasefeld, their former professor of theology, once made the emphatic assertion that one can prove and disprove anything and everything by the Bible, and it is really astounding with what readiness some of those sanctimonious sharks, full of impious piety, can quote scripture to suit the occasion.

Mr. Parham, who had started the New Tongue fad in Zion, has proved himself altogether too tame for his cult and followers, and was lately displaced by one Brother Tom, with the additional gift of Free Love, with signs following, which may earn for him and a few other sanctified brethren a coat of tar and feathers and a free ride on a fence rail.

This gift of tongues may be very fascinating to those who cannot grasp its cause and consequence, but for young girls under its hypnotic spell to mope about on dark nights in the prairie, in the company of old reprobates, is not conducive to highten the standard of morals, nor is it any credit to their blindfolded parents.

The writer made a few visits to their public shows in the large and spacious tabernacle, the outhouses of which cry to heaven for vengeance over their pestilential condition. But in the temple itself the enthusiasm of the spirit worshipers runs high, many striving hard for what they term the baptism of the Holy Ghost and his seal of sanctification by the gift of tongues.

They are hilarious with joy over any manifestations of spirits when they shout praises to God, to Jesus and the Holy Ghost, in a peculiar gibberish which is readily translated by a few who claim that gift. But the stereotypic nature of both tongues and interpretation is very apparent, and indicates a lack of intellect and a surplus of fanaticism, by the spirits as well as their attending mortals.

Here is a sample and extract of a sermon delivered by one of the holy brethren:

"I tell you, friends, we have been getting hot air long enough. We must discard Lutherism and Wesleyism, or any other ism, for we have the real thing now, the Holy Ghost itself. (Loud amens and "praise the Lord.") We must realize that we are nothing [more amens]; yes, we are nothing but empty bottles with the bottom knocked out" [very loud amens and hallelujahs].

There are men too lazy to work who delight to live off the gospel, and preach what others should practice, and anybody can come into this Holy Ghost camp, no matter how dirty, for the blood of Jesus had washed them clean long before they were born, and the Holy Ghost here is very accommodating, and not too exacting with new recruits.

And so it happened the other day that the most notorious man in the town was duly accepted, sanctified, and received the seal of their Holy Ghost in the gift of tongues. He is shouting now louder, and more amens and praise the Lords than any other member, and is singing a song that Jesus pays it all, and to judge by the failure of his creditors to collect their overdue bills, the now holy brother seems to believe in that song literally. Verily such faith is great indeed.

In justification of Zion and most of its people be it said, that a more honest, faithful and orderly people can't be found anywhere. They live up to the law and obey those who assume to rule over them. They have suffered in silence and hope now for relief from the tyrannical regime of hypocrites whose cloven foot is stamped on all private and business and social relations, as well as on the freedom of conscience, and woe is him who dares to look about for the light of understanding outside of prescribed limits. Judge Landis and Mr. Hately may dissipate the incubus and infuse new life into the beautiful city, "in the future to be."

Mr. T. W. Stanford's Seances at Melbourne, Australia.

Many letters come from friends both far and near which, while expressing great interest in the proceedings of the circle, suggest "tests" that, if successful, would compel the attention of thousands who now scoff at every manifestation of occult power and convert straight away, so our friends maintain, half the world to Spiritualism. As it is malifestly impossible to answer these letters in detail it is well to state that such suggestions are carefully considered and the wide-spread interest displayed in the sittings is cordially welcomed. It must be remembered, however, that the development of the manifestations obtained through the mediumship of Charles Bailey has to proceed on lines indicated by scientific investigators all the world over and that any thing like dictation of what should be brought would inevitably result in the disturbance of "conditions," while the vibrations, through whose perfection all true Spiritualistic manifestations proceed, would become "like sweet bells jangled out of tune." Men like Dr. Hodgson and Professor Hyslop, with strong positive temperaments and a desire to obtain scientific proof of the truth of spirit intercourse, acknowledge that they could not obtain the best results until their minds had become passive. Very little is known of what actually goes on behind the scenes. It stands to reason and common sense, however, that in such highly attuned vibrations of the ether as are needed to produce phenomena of a reliable kind that another set of vibrations emanating from the sitters would be as disastrous as the crossing of the telephone lines when we desire to give a message to a friend. Everything, both in the material and spiritual world, is subject to a natural law. These wonderful "apports," that are a constant marvel to the most experienced sitters, are brought by some law not yet understood, but which is indeed no more miraculous than that by which we can send a message all over the world by wireless telegraphy—a feat which a century ago would have been scouted as impossible. But it is the constant aim of Mr. Stanford to do as friends desire so strongly, namely, to have something brought that would confound the critics. This can only be accomplished by patience and the co-operation of the spiritual entities who control the medium. It is quite possible for certain things to be obtained if all work for the same object, and even now Dr. Whitcomb, who in earth life was a Melbourne doctor, and now conducts a circle, is endeavoring to obtain Abdul and Selim's co-operation in bringing an "apport" that would "speak for itself" as it were, and be simply unanswerable.

It is not, however, merely to astonish people that the circle is conducted, and although the "apports" are valuable evidence of occult power, the spiritual teaching contained in the addresses is of the highest order, thus making the circle a unique one in the history of psychical research. One of the most remarkable occurrences during the month was the bringing of a bird in the light. Abdul walked to the other end of the circle, close to Mr. Stanford, raised his hand and brought down a bird from Malay, a native also of China, India and other warm climates. A most noticeable thing occurred in the bringing of this apport. When the arm of the medium was uplifted, the hand for a moment disappeared entirely—coming into view a moment afterward with a flash of light and the bird in hand. A similar incident occurred in Sydney. A brief record of the sittings held since April 12th gives further details of what we would fain let all the world know about. The large piece of seaweed in Supplement was brought on April 12th.

The following is a brief record of sittings held since April 6th:—

36th Seance. April 12th. Address by J. B. Gough on "The Evils of Intemperance." Phenomena. Chaldean Tablet. Nest with two eggs; the latter were taken back to the sitting bird at request of Dr. Whitcomb. Large heap of seaweed dripping with sea water photographed in supplement.

37th Seance. April 19th. Address by Dr. W. Ellery Channing on "The Beulah Land." Two Babylonish Tablets to be explained by Dr. Robinson in promised lecture on Chaldean Magic. Flying fish entangled in piece of net and seaweed, not to be obtained in these seas. Manuscript from Thibet.

38th Seance. April 26th. Address by Dr. Channing. Continuation of "The Beulah Land" given previous sitting. Phenomena. Lump of clay with spear heads embedded from Central America. Bird's nest. While light was up Abdul moved around the table to Mr. Stanford and caught bird in the air as described above. Two prayer manuscripts from Thibet written on bark of tree.

39th Seance. May 3d. Address by Dr. Withrow on "The Catacombs at Rome," given in this issue. Phenomena. Lump of clay from Central America with fragments of mosaic pavement. Set of carved ivory beads, of exquisite workmanship, interspersed with shells and carved seeds from Indian Temple threaded on a piece of skin; said to be of Chinese or Japanese workmanship. Devil Dancer's sticks made of ebony. Clusters of berry seeds for planting.

Address by Dr. Withrow, on "Catacombs at Rome."

[Specially reported by Miss M. Wilson, shorthand writer and typist, Premier Buildings, Collins street, Melbourne.]

I must first give a brief description of the Catacombs, the burial places of the early Christians. There cannot be any doubt that they had their origin in sand pits—places where they dug the sand to make the famous Roman cement with. After a time these pits were enlarged and the ashes of deceased persons were placed in the caverns that had been dug. When persecution came they were still further enlarged, and so we find that there are galleries innumerable. De Rossi estimates that they cover fully 600 acres of ground underneath the surface, and these galleries run in all directions. There are over forty acres of these catacombs. The early Christians called their burial place a Cimetarium, but the heathen, the Roman pagans, always burned their dead and placed the ashes in urns (Cineraria) and these were placed in niches in the tombs—like pigeon holes, whence comes the word Columbarium. There are three tiers of these galleries—the first is about 25 of 30 feet under the ground and the lowest 60 feet. The graves were cut in the sides of the walls of the passage and the mouth of them was closed by a slab of marble or stone rudely engraven with the name of the deceased persons, and sometimes another inscription. It is about those names and inscriptions and some of the pictures on the walls of the catacombs that I am going to speak to-night. We know that the earliest inscriptions are mostly in Greek, while the more recent are Latin, showing the change that Christianity worked in the great Roman empire. In the days of persecution under the Roman emperors, Christians hid in these dark galleries, lighted at intervals with a small terra cotta lamp, and in time they got to know every passage so well that they were able to make their escape when pursued by the Roman soldiery. In some places they have enlarged the galleries and made a basilica, a place to worship in, and you may to-day see the remains of the frescoes in the ceiling.

There are a few pagan inscriptions in the catacombs as well as Christian. In the early days of Christianity, when the Church had peace, before the persecutions commenced, the openings to the catacombs were wide. There was no secrecy, but when the sword of persecution was unsheathed they covered up these openings and made others which were hidden by a bush or stone, and inside the opening was a flight of stairs. In the eighth century after Christ the catacombs fell into disuse and oblivion, and it was not until the sixteenth century that they were re-discovered, and the Popes were very assiduous and entered into the spirit of the work of excavating and renovating the passages as they were opened.

Primitive Christianity and Spiritualism Identical.

I wish to say to those of you who believe that primitive Christianity and modern Spiritualism are identical, that we cannot find in the catacombs any inscriptions that support that Dantean horror—hell or purgatory. These galleries have been excavated for a considerable distance—there are miles of passages yet unexplored—but up to the present no inscriptions have been found supporting these abominable doctrines. The testimony of the catacombs, taken as a whole, breathe forth a religion pure and undefiled, allied with the certain hope that after life's fitful fever there remains a rest for the people of God. Ascending the steps leading to the passage one needs to be accompanied by a guide bearing tapers, for there is stygian darkness. As you walk through the narrow passages and view the graves on either side you will see in some crumbling bones and the broken slabs that covered the mouth of the grave. A keen observer in the catacombs will gather from the inscriptions that what Paul said concerning the members of the early Church was true, namely, "not many mighty, not many noble," or learned were among the first adherents. It is very evident that many of them could not read. On some of the slabs you find a rudely drawn representation of a ship, a pig, a dove. We will take the Latin one with the ship—"Here rests Navira, in peace." A ship is engraved underneath the inscription and when the relatives and friends of that girl came to visit her tomb, being unable to read, they just had to look and find the slab with the ship Navis engraved to know that Navira rested there. Human nature is the same in all ages, and in some of these graves have been found the toys that the Roman children played with. The little child died and its sorrowing mother placed in the grave its little toys, which are very much like the toys that your children play with—little wooden dolls with jointed legs and arms, sometimes children's rattles made of bronze. When I view these mementoes of that grand time when Christianity took possession of this world, I fancy that I can hear the sobs of the broken-hearted Roman matron as she lays to rest her only child and places in the tomb its little toys. There comes to me upon the night breeze the sobs of the mother, broken but distinctly intelligible—"The Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away, blessed be the name of the Lord."

Officers in the Primitive Church.

What do the inscriptions teach as regard the officers connected with the primitive Church? Most of the inscriptions that have been found are now in the Museum of St. John's Lateran, or in the Lapidarian Gallery of the Vatican. Hundreds of these inscriptions have been removed to protect them from relic hunters, and they are ranged in order. "Here lies Daneus, a bishop. He gave his life for the truth." Quite a number of inscriptions of bishops have been found, with inscriptions:—"Here lies Pastulus, a bishop. He dwells with God." The next office we find in the inscriptions is that of presbyter. "Here lies buried before the Ides of March John the presbyter—in peace and in Christ." In the fourth century we come across inscriptions or slabs bearing the inscriptions with the monogram of Constantine—a cross and a P. After the bishops and presbyters we come to the deacons. "Here lies Damasus, a deacon, a holy man in Christ." Again, "Here lies buried Cyrinthus, a deacon. He lived 55 years and two months." In some cases you find the number of days also. "Here lies Menia, a little child who lived one year, two months, and five days. At peace and in God." Hundreds of them finish "in God." Then there are Readers—men that used to read the Epistles or letters written by the bishops to the various congregations—Exorcists—"Here lies Gorontus, an exorcist." "Here lies Johannas, an exorcist." In the early Christian Church connected with every congregation there was an exorcist, and when a pagan became converted to God and to truth, before the baptismal waters were sprinkled on his head, he laid aside very often the name he bore as pagan, or perhaps had another name added to it. The exorcists then laid their hands on him and in the name of God and His Christ they abjured all evil influences—they believed that the pagan gods were no other than demons—they abjured these demons to depart and leave this man who was now a Christian. Then there were others who became obsessed, and the exorcists proceeded in the name of God and the Christ to cast out the evil influences. Where are the exorcists to-day in the Church? Are there no demons? Have they suffered a second death? When Christianity in the fifth and sixth centuries and upward became worldly powerful and weak in faith they added to this ritual a pagan mummery, and gradually, with the decay of faith, the exorcist was not needed and his office fell into disuse. Do you know why the Churches to-day do not cast out evil influences? Because they are worldly and have no power. It is necessary to have faith to cast out demons. Another order in the primitive Church was that of Elders. We read:—"Maximinius, an elder lies buried here. He was a faithful soul, a good husband." "He lived 67 years and two months." We do not find any inscriptions to Popes—Vicars of Christ upon earth. We do not find anything giving them authority to lord it over God's heritage; but we do find that the teachers, the bishops, the deacons, the elders, the readers, the presbyters, and the exorcists, were one with the brethren, in spirit and in truth. They followed in the footsteps of the Lowly One.

Martyrs and the Love Feast.

After the re-discovery of the catacombs in the sixteenth century, great zeal was shown by Popes and the other ecclesiastics, and they brought out of the catacombs cartloads of bones of the martyrs and placed them in the Churches. A great many cartloads of human bones were placed under the floor of the Pantheon, which was built by Marcus Agrippa, the son-in-law of Augustus. They did not stop to inquire whose bones they were and pagan and Christian went down together. There are, however, a few genuine martyr inscriptions. It was thought at one time that the peculiar signs on many of the slabs were placed there to indicate that the dead person had suffered martyrdom, but when Northcote and others investigated they found that these were emblems of the man's occupation and not representations of the instruments with which he was killed. One inscription has been found which reads thus:—"Favius, in the days of Marcus Aurelius, who gave up his life for the faith." And then follows the lament, "Oh sad times in which one cannot worship openly, but must hide in fear and trembling." In examining the whole of the inscriptions we cannot find any that support the impossible doctrine of the Romish Church—transubstantiation. We do not find the nimbus—the aureole of glory round the head of the mother of Christ—in the first two centuries, but in the third and fourth we find someone has added the nimbus. The nimbus may be seen around the heads of some of the Hindoo gods. One scene depicted shows the Christian Love Feast. There is a table and on it are the little round loaves and the cups for the wine, and the inscription over the sitters reads something like this:—"Take, mix and drink wine and water." It was over this Love Feast that the early Christians comforted each other. They told their sorrows and trials; they sympathized with each other, and there was a concentration of their thoughts upon the Unseen, which was beautiful in its simplicity and mighty in its influence. At this Love Feast a man who had come into the fold from paganism was taken by the hand and welcomed. We find a few inscriptions that tell us that even in Caesar's household the wonderful life and the teaching of the Nazarene had taken hold. Inscriptions "Master of the horse," "Keeper of the robes in the Imperial house," are found. Every trade and occupation is represented—"Marius, keeper of the clothes at the baths," "a worker in wood," "an inn-keeper," "a dyer," "a seller of wine," even a fruit seller who "used to sell fruit and flowers in the New Street." The long winding passages of the catacombs are the whispering galleries of the by-gone ages, and right down to the present time these whispers still breathe hope and comfort to the soul. One inscription, that you would think belonged to a modern Spiritualist, reads thus:—"Narcissus weeps for her son, Marcellus. Oh that his spirit and the spirits of the good will come to her in the evening hours!" Another one:—"Berchice lies buried here." This was erected by her mother—"A sweet soul, a soul as sweet as honey. I listen and wait for her sweet spirit," showing that these early Christians believed that the spirit could return unto them again. How different from the pagan inscriptions, of which I shall quote a few. Just listen to the followings—"Alexander Decimus lies buried here. While I lived I lived well. Hail and farewell." Another one:—"Negidus lies buried here. This was set up by his freed man Gallus." Underneath is found this peculiar inscription:—"Wine, women and baths destroy our constitution, but it makes life what it is. Farewell eternem."

In conclusion we gather from the inscriptions and paintings that the primitive Christians lived simply. They did not take part in any of the profane ceremonies of the heathen. They were separated from the world. They were inoffensive and when chased by the Roman soldiers they did not turn around to defend themselves. It is true they hid in the dens and caves of the earth, but they tried to overcome evil with good. "Resist not evil." There are a few inscriptions relating to officers in the army of Caesar, and I believe that when they became converted they resigned. I cannot understand a true Christian being a soldier. They may be necessary, but to imbrue your hand in your brother's blood is against the teaching of Christ, and if you do not the things he says, then you are not a Christian. The inscriptions show us that they met together in times of peace in their houses as you meet here. They sang hymns, they exhorted each other, and the bishop or the deacon or the presbyter read the letters from the other assemblies. Sometimes they had the Love Feast, in which all joined, and then they took up a collection, not to pay the deacon or the presbyter or the bishop $20 or $30 a week, but for the poor members of the community. Each one contributed according to his status and his riches. They prophesied at these meetings and they saw visions. Origen, one of the Christian fathers, replying to a heretic says, "Our holy women see visions and our men prophesy and cast out demons." They laid hands on the sick folk. A few of the inscriptions record the fact that a surgeon, a doctor, a mender of bones, "lies buried here." It was not the custom to send for the physician when they were sick; they followed the command in the New Testament:—"Is any sick among you? Let him call for the elders of the Church," and they shall lay hands on him, and if he have committed sin it shall be forgiven him. The record tells us that "the prayer of faith shall save the sick." These elders were just healing mediums. The healing powsr which comes from the spirit world, which is health flowing from the true source, comes through the channel of the man's body, and the disease departs. The elders laid hand on the sick folk and they were healed. The exorcists cast out demons. Where are the elders of the church to-day that lay hands on the sick? If the presbyter or the bishop himself gets sick he sends his servant for the doctor—and he calls himself a Christian! The time is coming when the church will return to her primitive simplicity, and will re-establish the office of elder and exorcist. An elder in the church to-day is usually the man who takes up the collection! An elder in the primitive church was consecrated and set apart to deliver people from disease, and to pray and sympathize with those who were left desolate. When death stepped in and a loved one was removed, the elder went to the house and exhorted the mourner to be of good comfort—"Your son, your daughter is with God. His spirit will draw nigh unto you; he is not lost; there is nothing lost." Oh, for a revival of Primitive Christianity!

The World Must Return to Primitive Christianity.

Modern Spiritualism and Primitive Christianity are at one in their teaching. I do not say that primitive Christianity is faithfully lived or carried out in the lives of modern Spiritualists. With Paul I say it to your shame that it is not so; "there are divisions among you." But primitive Christianity and modern Spiritualism are identical in their teaching. The early Christians regarded Christ as the divine man. There is a difference between Deity and Divinity—very few people seem to know that—but it is true. Christ was Divine because He came forth from the Father, but He was not Deity. He was "a man approved of God."

Primitive Christianity taught there is no death. It also taught the Brotherhood of Humanity. No matter if it were Caesar on the Imperial throne or one of the vile gladiators—in the Christian assembly they were equal if they followed in the Master's footsteps. Did He not wash the feet of one of His disciples? I think I see a bishop at the present day washing one of his parishioners' feet! Primitive Christianity taught that we should exercise spiritual gifts. It also taught that men should live pure lives, not for the sake of reward or in fear. There were no pictures of the damned in torments; no frescoes showing a man in purgatory being liberated by his friends on earth through paying for Masses. There were no inscriptions to support such terrible teaching. But they did teach that man should live a good and pure life because it is right to do so, and that perfect happiness is only compatible with right living. Any number of inscriptions speak of the holy soul abounding in works of charity,—"while she lived she ministered unto the poor." If there is one good that you perform that is blessed above another, it is the ministering unto those who are poor and needy. "I was in prison and ye visited me; I was hungry and ye fed me; naked and ye clothed me." It doesn't matter so much about doctrines such as the five points of Calvinism—let them go. Never mind about predestination and election—let them go. Don't worry about baptisms, about ordinances, forms and ceremonies—let them all go. Attend to the poor and the needy; become a Christian in truth and in deed, and you will be at last blessed in the knowledge and in the company of those whom you have helped. "They that be wise shall shine as the stars forever, and to him that overcometh will I make a pillar in the temple of my God, saith the Holy One."

RIGHT THOUGHTS.

Rev. Dr. Frank Oliver Hall, Pastor of the Church of Divine Paternity, New York City, Says They are Vital to the Welfare of Man.—A Divine Who Has Been Thinking Right.

(Think on these things—Philippians iv. 8.)

What things? Things that are true, honest, just, pure, lovely, attractive, virtuous, honorable. Upon these things, says Paul, "Let your thoughts dwell."

Thoughts are things as much as brick walls and paved streets are. There is such a thing as insanitary thinking as surely as there is such a thing as insanitary plumbing. There is a mental atmosphere conducive to health as much as sunshine and fresh air, and there is a miasma of the soul which is as deadly as the malaria of Dismal Swamp.

To select a spiritual dwelling place where the atmosphere is heavy with hate and poisonous with passion; to pull up the shutters of despair and exclude the sunshine of hope; to close the windows of the heart and exclude the light of faith, and the warmth of love, is as deadly as it would be to build one's house in a stagnant marsh or to live in a dark, unventilated cellar.

Notice that Paul writes as if men had the power to select their own intellectual dwelling places. So they have. Physically most men must dwell where circumstances ordain. But the poorest man may have a dwelling place for his mind more desirable than the region in which many a millionaire is content to reside, in an atmosphere of the soul filled with unclean odors.

Every man has within himself the power to change his mental dwelling place. The normal man has power to direct his thoughts as he has power to direct his hand. By the exercise of such power he may win success, character, righteousness.

The mind is master of the body. Experiment demonstrates that thought pumps the blood into the head or hands or feet, according as one directs the mind, and that emotions, controllable by the will, may refresh or poison the physical system as they are good or bad.

Paul has given us not only the secret of health, but the secret of happiness. Not the dwelling place of the body, but the dwelling place of the thoughts, determines whether one's life shall be filled with joy or with misery. Some of the most miserable people live in mansions, dine sumptuously and dress luxuriously. Some of the happiest people live in very lowly circumstances. The difference is entirely mental.

One man is miserable in spite of his fine physical circumstances; another is happy in poverty because of his mental dwelling place. Moreover, Paul indicates here the road to success. More people fail to achieve their worthy ambitions because they cultivate wrong mental habits than for any other cause whatever.

Life is full of splendid opportunities for the man who will seize them, and all the forces of the universe help on the man whose mind dwells in faith and courage and confidence and indomitable hope; and all the forces of the universe set against the man who dwells in a mental atmosphere of doubt and despondency, suspicion of himself and his fellowmen.

Finally, thought means conduct. What you do depends on what you think, Conduct is first in the mind, afterwards in the body. Beware of wrong thinking. Beware of holding evil pictures before the imagination. Do not play with evil even in your thoughts, for what you think will register itself ultimately and inevitably in what you do.

On the other hand, one can overcome all evils with which his inner life is beset by exercising the will in the direction of right thinking. If you would do the things you ought to do and leave undone the things you ought not to do, then look to your thoughts and in whatsoever things are true, honest, just, pure, lovely, attractive, virtuous, honorable, there let your thoughts dwell.

FRANK OLIVER HALL.

The above from the Sunday Record-Herald illustrates the fact that truth is making great strides, even among the ministers. Only a few years ago we were not allowed to think. We need only have faith in the Lord Jesus Christ, and let the preacher do our thinking.

How many men in olden times were put to death because they dared to think. Verily, "the world do move."

It is indeed a pleasure to live in these times, when the customary flirtations with the Almighty, the flim-flam flatteries of the Jehovah, have come down to living in the thought-world, to depending on oneself and right thinking for his salvation or success. The poor old fellows, with bended knees and upturned faces are succeeded by the scholar who stands before the throne of Nature and declares "I am a part of the great Universe! I am responsible for my own thoughts and deeds! I am as full of life and power as any man on earth or on any other planet."

Those dear old fellows, some of them were sincere, perhaps most of them thought it right to fear some imaginary tartar, tyrant, or devil, and perhaps humanity had to pass through all that to reach a plane of progress in thought. It is truly a pleasure to have lived to see this day of progress and right thinking in the churches where thought was once a monopoly in the hands of a chosen (?) few—self-chosen.

DR. T. WILKINS.

HOME.

(Dedicated to Mrs. Althea C. Briggs.)

Oh, Glory! It is not my fancy;
The gates are swinging wide
And I see through thin glinting portals
My home on the other side.
Its dome is crowned with beauty
That can never, never end;
It is where no Saviors are,
And no one mourns for friend.

What do I see? A shadow hides it!
I thought it was Jaguido's hand,
For it beckoned me so tenderly
To the shining, glittering strand;
O, beloved, whom I miss so,
Are you waiting at the gate?
I am coming down the pathway.
Dearest, am I late, too late?

Last night a vision of splendor
Kindled along life's crest,
And its placid, peaceful glory,
Settled sweetly on my breast;
The gates of memory opened,
Through them a glimpse I caught,
Of celestial land of loved ones,
Whose homes with bliss are fraught.

And they called my name "Celestial!"
Then the light of longing eyes
Opened to behold the city
On the mount of glad surprise.
Oh, I know that love is deathless,
And evening shades draw nigh,
When I'll pass the gates of Paradise,
Where my possessions lie.

ACTINA" A BLESSING

To Those Afflicted With Eye Troubles.

Every person with impaired eyesight or suffering from weak or diseased eyes should write for our latest free booklet, entitled "Positive Evidence."

The records of phenomenal cures by the "Actina" treatment, as described therein by grateful patients themselves—names and addresses given—will satisfy the most skeptical that "Actina" is not only a remarkable, simple and harmless invention, but restores eyesight even after specialists have pronounced cases incurable.

Following are a few of the successes produced by "Actina," but more fully described in our free booklet.

A Chicago gentleman, after suffering 12 months with inflammation of the iris, used "Actina" a few weeks. He says he can now see as well and as far as anybody.

An Iowa lady writes that after being under treatment of specialists for 15 years, "Actina" completely restored her eyesight and she no longer uses glasses.

Astigmatism and granulated lids impaired the eyesight of a Hartford (Conn.) lady. Specialists failed to cure. As a last resort, against advice of friends, she tried "Actina." She writes:—"For many months I have written almost daily without glasses. No more pain in my eyes and drooping eyelid is restored."

"Actina" removed a cataract from the eye of an Oklahoma lady; relieved the closure of a tear duct for a well known Chicago lady, and in scores of instances people have been able to discard eyeglasses through the faithful use of "Actina." To get an idea of the enthusiasm of our patients the entire letters as printed in our book should be read.

"Actina is made on common sense principles. Its simplicity, effectiveness add lasting qualities will appeal to any one that will investigate. Let us send you one on two weeks' trial. Use it as often as you please and if you are not benefited, or for any other reason are dissatisfied, send it back and no charge will be made. Write today. Address Actina Appliance Company, Dept. 342 M., 811 Walnut St., Kansas City, Mo.

Address as above.

Mrs. J. G. Puddock writes from Harbor Beach, Mich.: I find that my subscription expires with No. 921 of The Progressive Thinker. Inclosed you will find P. O. Order for one dollar ($1.00) wherewith to renew my subscription to the best Spiritualist weekly paper in the world. No true Spiritualist can afford to do without it.

Correspondent writes: "Wonewoc Camp Meeting commenced July 14, many being present from the surrounding cities. Mrs. Georgia Gladys Cooley and Mr. Ripley lectured and gave messages. George T. Letford, known as the Drummer Medium, was initiated into the order of The Guardian Angel. He took the first degree finely. Mrs. Cooley, who is an officer in the order, led in the Japanese prayer, after which she initiated ten new members, all of whom were deeply impressed with the work of the order."

Mrs. E. H. Thompson writes: "The Fraternal Daughters held their semi-weekly social at the home of Sister Gilmore, 217 North Central Park avenue. The afternoon was given over to readings, after which a supper was served. I am sure it was a credit to those who had it in charge; a better supper could not be served for 15 cents than that which the daughters give at their semi-weekly meetings. Then the evening was given over to the purchase of packages at 10 cents each, which contained prizes and readings. It took the following mediums, Sisters Dr. Caird, Adams, Lichtig, Bloom, Hilbert, Switzer and Ingram, and Bro. Thompson, from 8 p. m. to 11 p. m. to read for all the hungry souls that were waiting to hear from the loved ones. The writer has a Gipsy guide, who gave a very good account of her ability as a comforter from the spirit side, and the the conditions in the home of the sister who entertained us were everything that could be desired. Sisters Lichtig and Blount entertained us with a realistic jig, two-step, and a waltz, which was pleasing to all. Our next meeting will be held at the home of Sister Mrs. Rickert, 117 Rice street, August 7 at 2:30 p. m. Take Chicago Avenue or Robey street cars and get off at Chicago Avenue and Robey streets. All are cordially invited. Don't forget to tell your friend to come and hear that talented lady, Sister Lizzie Harlow, lecture, August 28 at 8 p. m., 406 Ogden Avenue, top floor. Watch The Progressive Thinker for our future notices."

N. H. Briggs, attorney-at-law, Battle Creek, Mich., writes: "I assure you I should certainly feel as if something very substantial had gone out of my life were I deprived of the profitable pleasure of perusing each week that fearless advocate of the truth; that able defender of right and justice; that undaunted denouncer of wrong and fraud; that peerless champion of humanity, "The Progressive Thinker."

Mrs. A. A. Averill writes from Lynn, Mass.: "The Lynn Spiritualists' Association will hold its annual bazar at Unity Camp, Saugus, July 25, 26 and 27, afternoons and evenings. The usual useful and fancy articles will be on sale. The event of the affair will be a test seance on Saturday afternoon by the wonderful medium, Mrs. Vanderbilt, formerly Mrs. May S. Pepper. There will be dancing on Friday evening."

Will M. Kellogg, a prominent Spiritualist of New Boston, Ill., is now at the Clinton camp, and will act as agent for The Progressive Thinker.

Rev. Mrs. Vanderbilt, formerly May S. Pepper, will be at Unity Camp, Saugus, Mass., on Sunday, July 28, and will lecture and give messages at 2 and 4:30. Conference is held at 11, with a large number of mediums. Refreshments can be procured in the grove.

Georgia Gladys Cooley having received a call from Brodhead, Wisconsin, held three meetings there. The audiences increased each evening, the large opera house being fairly packed the last evening. Another large and attentive audience greeted her at Albany. She is now serving the people at Wonewoc camp, which opened Sunday, July 14, with a good attendance, and the camp is assured of a fine attendance all through the season."

H. L. Tobien writes from Cleveland, Ohio: "This society, started by a few earnest women, bought out a defunct Baptist church in the far south end of our city, incurring a debt of over two thousand dollars. This was about three years ago, and at the present time this little society has reduced this debt to a few hundred dollars. It has a good building capable of seating about three hundred, well lighted and equipped with a large work and dining room and kitchen, which the society will soon be able to call its own. There have been, and are now, quite a number of men-managed Spiritual societies in this city, which have failed to do what these women have done to promote the cause of Spiritualism. I wish to emphasize this to their credit. Here, at this Temple, have been engaged some of the best speakers in the field, such as Del Herrick, I. Pope, W. J. Colwell, Oscar Edgerly, Mr. and Mrs. Kates, and others, and lastly Mrs. Annette J. Pettingill. She is from Malden, Mass., comparatively new in the cause as a speaker, but is well equipped as an itinerant speaker and worker. She is not only a tip-top speaker, test medium and psychometrist, but a splendid musician and singer, and good in arranging entertainments."

H. E. Baker writes from Malden, Mass.: "We hope you and The Progressive Thinker will live many years. The paper is a Bible. H. D. Barrett is an able writer, and I am with the movement to tax church property. It should have been taxed years ago. I listened to Miss Harlow at Unity Camp to-day. Her lecture was grand. Voltaire was the commencement, and so along the line of free thought up to Sir R. Wallace, Paine, and Robert Ingersoll, that grand man. The lecture was simply immense."

Mrs. Sarah Jane Grubb writes from Carbondale, Col.: "What would I do without your blessed paper? I look forward every Thursday for its arrival with the greatest pleasure, and wonder what I would do without it. I earnestly hope you may live many long years to publish it for the good of humanity."

Mrs. S. E. Mackley writes from Ferndale, Cal.: Mrs. Tuttle's lecture in The Progressive Thinker is more than fine; it is noble, fearless, and straight to the point. If only our law-makers dared to tell the truth like that, and work for it, how much happiness it would create."

C. A. Sollinger writes from Cleveland, Ohio: "The season of 1906 and 7, just closed at the First Spiritualists' Temple, Cleveland, Ohio, has been very successful financially as well as spiritually. All our small debts have been paid, leaving only a $1,200 mortage, which we hope to reduce next year. Mrs. Annette J. Pettengill, of Malden, Mass., our speaker for the month of June, so endeared herself to our people that she was prevailed upon to stay one Sunday longer than her agreement; also engaged two months for next year. Her lectures and messages are excellent. In arranging successful entertainments she is hard to beat. The entertainment held at the Temple the last week in June was financially and otherwise a complete success. The Ladies' Spiritual Temple Fund Society decided not to close during July and August. We are not antagonistic to the summer camps, but there are many people here who cannot go away, and who made request to hold service here. There will be conference meeting every Sunday afternoon during the months of July and August. Regular service at 7:30 o'clock p. m. The following speakers will serve the society: John A. Wagoner, C. A. Sollinger, George McNelley, Fred Hays, H. Bloomfield, F. W. Martin and John Jacobs. Sunday, July 21, we will have Rev. B. F. Austin, of Rochester, N. Y., with us. He will hold two services, afternoon and evening, at the Temple. Thursday, July 25, at 8 o'clock p. m., Mr. John Jacobs will give a full explanation of Dr. Newcomer's picture, The Evolution of Man."

The Illinois Sunflower Club holds its next tea-party on Tuesday, July 23, at Lincoln Hall, Fraternity Building, 70 East Adams street, from two to five o'clock. The mediums will read the cups.

The Spiritualists of Clark County, Washington, will hold their annual Camp Meeting at Etna, Wash., commencing, Saturday, August 24. For particulars address H. B. Allen, Etna, Clark County, Wash.

John W. Clay writes: "I desire to call the attention, through The Progressive Thinker, of all those intending to visit Sunapee Lake Camp Meeting, to the fact that tickets can be procured at different stations at reduced rates during camp meeting time. We have a good array of able, talented speakers on our list, and assure all who come of a happy, profitable time and a cordial welcome."

Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond and husband started homeward on the Norderland, July 17. They have made an excellent impression among the noted men and women at the Hague. We will publish Mrs. Richmond's address, delivered there, next week.

Georgia Gladys Cooley will be at home this week for a short rest from her labors at Brodhead and Wonewoc, Wis.

Dr. W. O. Knowles, Chairman at Lake Brady Camp, will receive subscriptions for The Progressive Thinker.

"Life and Moral Axioms of Confucius," is the title of a 62 page pamphlet, which contains many of the moral aphorisms and terseological teachings of the sapient Chinese philosopher, who lived 551 years before the Christian Era, and whose wise precepts have left a lasting impression upon all subsequent nations. By Marcenus R. K. Wright. Price 25cts.

"Longley's Beautiful Songs." A new edition comprising in one volume the four parts heretofore published, to which is added part five, also a number of the author's most popular songs, including "Only a Thin Veil Between Us," and its "Companion Piece." Cloth, 75 cents. Boards, 50 cents.

TAKE NOTICE.—Correspondents are requested when writing for this paper to use either a typewriter or a pen, with black ink. Write on only one side of the paper, and in a plain, legible hand, and thus avoid the necessity of preparing your copy for the printer. Please bear this in mind.

Lake Brady Camp, O.

An ideal summer's day brought many to the Mecca of Spiritualists to hear Oscar A. Edgerly of Lynn, Mass., one of the foremost in the ranks as an expounder of Spiritualistic truths. He prefaced his remarks of the morning by reading one of Ella Wheeler Wilcox's beautiful poems, "Worn Out Creeds." His subject, "The Spirit World the Instigators of Human Progress," was handled in a masterful manner; beginning with ancient times he traced the world's history through the various ages to the present time, telling how sensitives have been inspired by spirit powers to be saviors and leaders of humanity.

The afternoon topic, "Heredity, and Environment, Their Effect on Humanity," was one of the best lectures ever given at this camp. Many regrets were expressed that his stay here could not be prolonged. The camp is doing as well as circumstances will allow.

Predictions have been made that this will in a few years be the banner camp of Ohio, at least.

THE CHILDREN.

When pale, gray shadows fall across the sky,
And gather in my partly darkened room;
When quietude of evening draws more nigh,
And peace of night shuts out the long day's gloom,

Then steal I softly where the children sleep,
With snowy eyelids drawn in calm repose;
Within each tiny cot I take a peep—
What are they dreaming now? Ah! no one knows.

There's little Allie, with his chubby hands
Folded so closely 'neath a pure white brow;
What mischief-play that childish brain has planned,
All through the day, but strangely silent now.

My precious Richard, quickly doth he start,
As on his lips warm kisses fall like rain;
I press him fondly to my tired heart,
As if to still its bitter ache and pain.

And darling Mabel, with the large black eyes,
Our little girl, so innocent and fair;
While in the cradle, gently sleeping, lies
The youngest of them all, sweet baby Claire.

And as I bend above each dimpled head,
Where silken curls upon the pillow lie,
I think me of another, deeper bed,
Beneath the grasses and the clear, blue sky.

They do not miss the pretty infant face,
They do not need her in their daily play;
I, only, know the empty, vacant place,
None ever filled, since she was called away.

I close the door and leave them to their rest,
Dear little sleepers, they are happy now;
They fill my life with gladness. Angels bless
And guide their footsteps, who alone know how.

A SPIRIT MESSAGE

From Harry Green to His Mother.

Well, Mommie, I want to tell you about our trip from the sixth sphere to the earth plane. When we came within a million miles of earth we began coming slowly. Have spent about twenty-five hours coming.

When we came within fifteen or twenty thousand miles of Earth it began to look pretty. At first it seemed like a big burnished ball, we being right between the earth and the Sun, Then it took on a sort of rosy gold, then a soft purplish hue with a golden line upon it, then a glorious pink.

When we drew nearer we began to see forms on the Earth. Quite a way off we could see brilliant hazy spots which, as we came nearer, proved to be sections of the sea that was phosphorescent. By this time we were on the side opposite to the sun. Then a tiny spot of flame appeared, a volcano. Then one edge of the earth began to glow with light of a pale golden color, the background of the earth was black as jet.

The stars looked like gleaming jewels. A soft purplish haze surrounded the earth, being its own atmosphere made luminous by starlight.

Oh! could you but see this mighty ball rolling through space, over a thousand miles per hour. Of course, rushing along at such a rate made a soft hazy sound, which mingled with sounds from other planets made a musical melody perfect in harmony. You know now what is meant by the "music of the spheres."

Soon we came too close to see it; all at once, then it became a pretty color scheme. Mountains, rivers and plains came in view. Then we came at once to our earth home, where all my hopes were born.

It will always be home to me as long as you live here. I have traveled untold billions of miles, seen untold millions of places and things, but no memory is as sweet, no place so dear as my old home. And no one so doubly dear as my very own old precious mother. I am waiting patiently the time when we will be united, when the joys of Heaven will be perfect forever. Your boy,

HARRY.

Oklahoma Convention.

I wish to say to the Spiritualists of Oklahoma the annual convention of the State Association will convene September 3, 1907, in Oklahoma City, and all chartered societies are requested to have delegates present. Oklahoma City has a strong and flourishing society which assures us of its hearty co-operation in making the convention entertaining, and beneficial to the cause.

All interested in the movement are heartily requested if possible to be present and help to make a grand success of this our first annual convention. The State Association at present stands in need of funds, and any one feeling able to help will send their contribution to Robert G. Lee, State Secretary, Hedrick, Okla.

John W. Ring, at Hedrick, Okla., commencing August 20, 1907, will engage in a six-days debate with Rev. Chism, Christian Evangelist of Texas, assisted at close by Max Hoffman.

This promises to be a very interesting affair and we hope to see it well attended. Camping grounds will be free. Bring your own equipment and come.

Circulars will be sent to all sending us their names. Please note carefully the dates for the above events, and let your friends profit by your information.

So, hoping that each one who sees this notice will in some way help to make a success of our cause, we beg to remain very truly yours,

ROBERT G. LEE,
Hedrick, Okla. State Sec'y.

Lake Brady Camp.

Lake Brady camp opened June 30 with a rainy morning, but at 8 or 9 o'clock the clouds broke away and streams of sunlight came down and gave us a beautiful day, with a smile on the faces of officers of Lake Brady. Streams of carriages came, and at 10:30 a. m. a fine audience was on hand to hear Mrs. D. A. Morrill, of Grand Rapids, Mich. She was at her best, and delivered two beautiful lectures during the day. After each lecture she was followed by Dr. W. O. Knowles, of Grand Rapids, the veteran worker of forty years, with messages. He is chairman at Brady this year.

Mrs. Morrill was at Brady again July 7, lecturing at 10:30 a. m. and 2 p. m.

She went from here to Freeville, N. Y., for one Sunday.

July 14th opened fine, and crowds came early to hear the veteran worker O. A. Edgerly, at 10:30 a. m. and at 2 p. m. Two beautiful lectures through the organism of Brother Edgerly were greeted by crowds of friends in Spiritualism. He goes from here to Grand Ledge as chairman of the camp there.

We have had fine meetings at Lake Brady up to date.

DR. W. O. KNOWLES, Chairman.

PASSED TO SPIRIT LIFE.

[Obituaries to the extent of ten lines only will be inserted free. All in excess of ten lines will be charged at the rate of fifteen cents per line. About 7 words constitute a line.]

Mrs. Minnie Brown passed to spirit life at Philadelphia, Pa., on July 9th, after several months of suffering. Funeral services were held at the Temple of the First Association of Spiritualists on Sunday afternoon, July 14. Rev. G. Tabor Thompson officiated, and paid a high tribute to her honesty and integrity as a woman and medium for the higher spirit forces. Two daughters and two sons, besdes a host of friends, mourn her loss, and she will be missed by many investigators of spiritual phenomena.

F. H. MORRILL, Sec'y.

Mrs. Louisa M. Brown passed to the higher life June 14, aged 71 years, at the home of her niece, Mrs. May Merrill, of Lake Brady, Ohio. She had been a good medium and worker for Spiritualism for years, and a large stockholder in the Maple Dell camp, at Mantua, Ohio. At her request the body was taken to Cleveland for cremation. Her guides and spirit friends were with her to the last. She saw them and spoke to them, and of them, to the friends who were with her. A short time before the spirit left the body she raised her arms up, and with a beautiful expression on her face, said: "Take me, Take me!" We know she is with them now, and free from the sufferings of earth. The funeral was conducted by Mr. Dunakin, of Cecil, Ohio. MRS. C. L. DYKEMAN, Stow, N. Y.

After five months of patient suffering, Annie R. Faulkes, wife of Solon J. Smith, early on Monday Morning, July 15th, entered into the life beyond, in which she so firmly believed. Born of English parents at Belleville, Wis., May 9, 1851; married at the early age of 17 to S. J. Smith, for nearly forty years they have trod life's pathway together. For the past ten years they have made their home in Chicago. The funeral services were conducted by Rev. Dr. C. W. Tomlinson, at the family home on 18th St., at 11 a. m., Wednesday.

Mrs. Kate Mattison, aged 67 years, wife of Mr. Fred R. Mattison, passed to the spiritual world, Saturday evening, July 6, from her home in Watertown, N. Y., after a brief illness. Her family, including husband, children and grandchildren, and many life-long friends, look forward to a glad reunion by and by. Funeral services were conducted by Rev. Helen Stuart Richings.

Many old friends and acquaintances of Mrs. Fannie Ralston, gathered at her home, 49 Fortieth Ct., on Sunday, July 14, to pay their respects to the one called higher. Mrs. Mary B. Hill officiated and told of the long association with the Church of the Soul, and different societies affiliated with Spiritualism. Mrs. Ralston was a good woman and true friend. Her deeds of charity, without parade, were many. Her remains were laid by the side of her husband and son in Graceland. EMMA A. ELLIS.

PROF. W. M. LOCKWOOD.

will send you for 5 cents a list of FORTY-SEVEN GODS mentioned in the bible. Every Spiritualist should have the list. Address him at Hotel Victoria, 570 Main St., Buffalo, N. Y. Address him after July 18, at Lily Dale, N. Y.

THE N. S. A.

Day sessions, at 10 a. m. and 2 p. m., will be devoted to business only. A cordial invitation is extended to the public to attend these business meetings, to which no admission fee is charged. Evening exercises will consist of grand programs of varied and entertaining numbers, including vocal and instrumental selections by talented artists; Lectures and Spirit messages at each meeting by many of the most noted and gifted platform workers of the country.

Among those who have been invited and who expect to be present and participate in the evening services are W. J. Colville, Mrs. H. P. Russegue, Mesdames Clara Watson, R. S. Lillie, Zadia B. Kates, Elizabeth Lowe Watson, Messrs. Dr. Geo. A. Fuller, J. Clegg Wright, Oscar A. Edgerly, Albert P. Blinn, speakers.

Mediums, Mrs. C. D. Pruden, Katie Ham, Georgia Gladys Cooley, E. W. Sprague, Alice Sexsmith, M. T. Longley, and others.

Come One and All to This Great Convention of 5 Days.

Certificate tickets will not be arranged for this year, but special excursion rates at lower value can be secured from all points by visitors and delegates purchasing tickets for Jamestown Exposition with stop-over privileges of ten days at Washington. Call for these at your railroad offices and stations.

The Ebbitt House of Washington, 14th and F Streets N. W., will be the hotel for our people. The Ebbitt is well located within walking distance of Masonic Temple, and a handsome hotel; its usual rates, American plan, are from $4.00 a day up; our special rates there are $2.50 per day, two persons in a room. Write to the Manager and secure your rooms.

THE ANNUAL RECEPTION will be omitted this year, owing to five days' Convention. The sessions will begin Monday, October 14, at 10 a. m. All are invited.

HARRISON D. BARRETT,
President.
MARY T. LONGLEY, Secretary.

Lake Pleasant, Mass.

On the 25th of April the fire king reigned supreme at Lake Pleasant, and the next day ruins alone met the sight of the visitor.

The first question, of course, was, "Will the camp-meeting be held as usual this year?" and prompt and decisive came the answer of the management "Of course;" and not only was the original list of speakers for this year retained, but the addition of Mrs. Alice M. Whall as test medium and Dr. Wm. A. Hale as speaker and medium was made.

Another change, and a most advantageous one for the camp, was the engagement of Mrs. May Pepper-Vanderbilt for Sunday afternoon, August 4, in addition to the last two Sundays of camp.

Mrs. Pepper-Vanderbilt's engagement at Lake Pleasant is for Sunday afternoon, August 4, 18, and 25, and Wednesday afternoon, August 21. The other mediums on our program are Alice M. Whall, Edgar W. Emerson, Nettie Holt-Harding, Wm. A. Hale, Zadia B. Kates, and Tillie U. Reynolds.

Speakers are R. F. Churchill, Albert P. Blinn, J. Clegg Wright, Carrie E. S. Twing and George W. Kates.

One of the greatest problems that confronted the directors was the accommodation of visitors during August. This has been successfully solved. The new hotel, "The Roosevelt," had its opening on the 20th of July. The speakers at the dedication were Hon: A. H. Dailey, Mrs. A. S. Waterhouse, R. F. Churchill, and the proprietors Mulvey and Corliss.

Mulvey & Corliss also opened the depot restaurant as a first-class dining-room, on the same date.

One hundred and ten cottages remained after the fire, and seventeen new ones have been built. With cottagers who will let rooms, "The Roosevelt" and the "Home Comfort" House, as hotels, the depot restaurant, Streeter's and Wood's boarding houses, all who attend camp meeting will find ample accommodation at reasonable rates.

Camp opens Sunday, July 28, and The Progressive Thinker will be on sale at all the services, and subscriptions will be taken by the writer.

In addition to the regular lectures, J. Clegg Wright and Miss Chrissie Bartle will give class lectures in the forenoons.

ANGELL PRIZE-CONTEST RECITATIONS.

To Advance Humane Education.—For use in entertainments managed by Societies, Lyceums, Bands of Mercy, or individuals aiming to establish right over wrong, kindness over cruelty, knowledge over ignorance, and justice over all. The plan is this: Some large church or public hall is secured; several societies are invited to send their best speaker or reciter to compete for the prize medal; some prominent citizen presides; other prominent citizens act as the committee of award, and a small admission fee, ten or twenty cents, pays all the costs, and leaves a handsome balance. Price, 25 cents, postpaid.

By William E. Towne. Learn how to cast away unnecessary care. This book points the way. Price, 25 cents.

THE WIDOW'S MITE, AND OTHER PSYCHIC PHENOMENA.

BY ISAAC K. FUNK.

A remarkable book, of intense interest to all, whether Spiritualists or Materialists, investigators or believers.

The author has embodied in this book an account of his wonderful personal experience, and has culled from other sources the experiences of others, including scientists of world-wide repute, making a volume of great value. 538 octavo pages. Price, cloth, $2.

STARTLING FACTS, OR Deeds of Darkness Disclosed

This work devotes special attention to Auricular Confession and its relations to sacerdotal celibacy, convents, monasteries, morality and civil and religious liberty. It is intended to be an embodiment of facts and documentary evidence of the pernicious influence of the confessional; a trenchant showing up of Romanism, based upon standard Catholic authorities; an eye-opener concerning the methods and spirit, the moral turpitude and evil works of Romanism. Cloth, 75 cents.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

This department is under the management of

HUDSON TUTTLE.

Address him at Berlin Heights, Ohio.

NOTE—The Questions and Answers have called forth such a host of respondents, that to give all equal hearing compels the answers to be made in the most condensed form, and often clearness is perhaps sacrificed to this forced brevity. Proofs have to be omitted, and the style becomes thereby assertive, which of all things is to be deprecated. Correspondents often weary with waiting for the appearance of their questions and write letters of inquiry. The supply of matter is always several weeks ahead of space given, and hence there is unavoidable delay. Every one has to wait his time and place, and all are treated with equal favor.

NOTICE.—No attention will be given anonymous letters. Full name and address must be given, or the letters will not be read. If the request be made the name will not be published. The correspondence of this department has become excessively large, especially letters of inquiry requesting private answers, and while I freely give whatever information I am able, the ordinary courtesy of correspondents is expected.

W. A. Fulmer.—Q. A native East Indian working as missionary in the Christian cause, gave a lecture in this town (Jamestown, Kansas), in which he stated that in India and the southern countries, there is a phenomenon known as "moon stroke," by which a sort of paralysis is caused of any part of a person's body which has been exposed to the direct rays of the moon for a length of time, from which requires years to recover. Is it a fact?

A.—It is a fact that such is the belief, but it is not a fact that the moon has any such influence. It is like the superstition that the moon causes lunacy, which is even woven into the name, Luna, showing how deep rooted was the belief. However, the belief, of itself, by suggestion may produce the effect referred to the moon's ill-omened light. The childish fancy of such superstition is plainly shown by the fact that whether the moon is "new" or "old," in full or last "quarter," showing brightly or obscured, it is constantly present in its orbit, and when "full," and reflecting all the light of the sun possible, when compared with full sunlight the amount is only a small fraction. Then again, this reflected light is identical with the sun's rays, and can have no quality not in the primary light, and whatever these qualities are, they must be reduced in intensity in the ratio of their feebleness.

Geo. W. Kelly.—Q. I would like, through the question department of The Progresive Thinker, to have your views on socialism, and when the brotherhood of man will be established in the United States. Dearly would I like to work for Spiritualism, but it seems to me that it's my duty to work for socialism till the co-operative commonwealth is established. Then, and then only, do I think that man may be able to develop his spiritual powers, which have been dwarfed so long under this system of slavery, strife and competition.

A.—A great many correspondents have urged the discussion of socialism in this department, and the expression of views. It has not been from a desire to avoid the issue, or shrinking from the conflict, that the subject has been passed in silence. It seems impossible to treat it justly until the demands of the great army passing under its name are more clearly stated. Socialism may mean government ownership of all great utilities; the ownership of everything; the perfect equality and leveled estate of every citizen; and it may mean the terrible doctrines of nihilism. It may mean the peaceful ways of evolution, the sure and certain growth in the direction of the best and most desirable; it may mean revolution, with the wrecking of present institutions, with no defined purpose more than to escape from the grasp of the laws which ages of experience have proven practically essential to the social fabric.

If the leaders of socialism will free their cause of the brutal element, and sharply define their principles which they claim are altruistic, and for righteousness, they will have the way clear and their progress a triumph. No one claims that our government, although the best under which a nation ever lived, is perfect. It is best because it can improve and change to the needs of the people. These changes cannot come in a day or a generation. Experiments in government are among the most costly, for if failures, there cannot be a return to the starting point. The education, training, methods of thought, customs, habits of the people, are embodied in the government. It is the outgrowth of ages of experience. It follows that any and every change for improvement must follow on the lines of this growth. It is like a strongly growing tree. It may be trained in symmetry and perfection of form, but the cyclone of revolution which uproots it leaves nothing but ruin.

The best government is one that allows free growth according to the laws of its perfect growth—that is, continuous and unimpeded evolution. We believe the government of these United States has this possibility, depending on the rising tide of general and universal intelligence. It cannot be better than the masses who support it. To make it better, the people must be educated up to the required standard. Hence the direct work of socialism is a "campaign of education," and there is no fear of objection from any source to this effort. But when social leaders denounce the government and the laws, and seek to array hostile factions in the attitude of armed resistance, they must expect to meet the spirit they evoke.

In the future surely is the millennium dreamed of by sage and prophet—dreamed of in the far-away ages when the earth reeked with blood of slaughtered armies, and war was the pastime of nations. The poets in immortal verse sang of peace, and prophets outwrought utopias, where perfect equality between ruler and ruled should be the order of the State. But for such utopias there must be perfect men. The selfish greed and tiger propensities must be obliterated from the minds of the people at large by the attributes of the angel.

The brute in man demands restraint, and restraint through law cannot be dispensed with until the angelic mental qualities dominate the savage propensities.

If socialism means the effort to develop all that is good for the people, by the people; to lift up the masses into unity of effort for honor, truth, justice and integrity which knows no path but doing the right, then the truest and best in the nation will join in acceptance. It is the system they have ever and always adhered to. There is no station more worthy of ambition than teacher of this system of State philosophy.

Spiritualism fully endorses this system, and in fact it is its fundamental idea. Will the socialists accept this definition? Will they free themselves from the doctrines imported from the revolutionary leaders of the old world?

A GOLDEN SHEAF.

To Our Friends: — October next will bring the 50th anniversary of our marriage, and nearly the 55th of our labor in the field of Spiritualism. In the first years we published a volume, "Blossoms of Our Spring," thinking that should the time come in the autumn of life, we would have a volume fitting the occasion of the closing years, of fruitage. A half century has almost gone by, and this 50th anniversary gives the occasion for the issuance of this volume, which we have entitled A GOLDEN SHEAF. It will be made up of selections from matter not before published, in prose and verse; selections of the best sentences and paragraphs scattered through our various books; a new spiritual song with music; illustrations of fac simile automatically written manuscripts; photogravures of our home, birthplace, and brief autobiographical sketches

We propose to make the book in paper and binding as superior as the price, $1.00, will permit. Every copy will be numbered and contain our autographs.

The number of copies will be strictly limited to the number of subscribers, and the book will not be placed on sale after publication. As we have reached the conclusion to publish at a somewhat late date, if you favor the undertaking you will confer a favor by sending your name, by card or letter, at once (the price is not now wanted).

A list of names of subscribers will be published in the volume.

We thank you beforehand for your favor in inviting our book to your homes.

THE DEVIL AT WORK.

The theologians express themselves as greatly worried because of the deplorable ignorance of the Bible exhibited by the present wicked and perverse generation. They say that the devil is getting in some mighty fine work in getting people to neglect Bible reading.

Of course it is the work of the devil. The devil has instigated a lot of graceless but talented authors to write a lot of interesting novels. Then he has enticed many fickle-minded church members to read them instead of turning their attention to more serious things. Yes, the fine Italian hand of the devil is seen running through the whole scheme. The devil is kept constantly busy by editors and theologians. The poor devil has a devil of a time. Some of us think that the devil is being overworked.

How many know that we got our devil second-handed from the Jews? The Jews procured him in Babylon. The old Persian Magi believed that there existed an eternal conflict between two equal and co-eternal principles of light and darkness, good and evil, Ormazd and Ahriman. The latter of which the Jews imported into their Scriptures after the captivity, under the name of the serpent, a symbolism which was later turned into "The Devil." In the Scriptures are nine devils: Beelzebub, the prince of the false gods of other nations; the Pythian Apollo, the prince of liars; Belial, the prince of mischief makers; Asmodeus, the prince of revengeful devils; Satan, the prince of witches, wizards and sorcerers; Meresin, the prince of flying devils, who caused thunderstorms and plagues; Abaddon, prince of those who caused tumults, wars and combustions; Diabolos, the prince of those who drove to despair, and Mammon, the prince of all the tempters. Far in advance of all modern combinations, the theologians turned all the nine devils into a devil trust, now known in religion and commerce as "The Devil."

Such is the origin of the frightful creature which now disturbs our peace of mind.

"HOW SHALL I BECOME A MEDIUM?"

It is fully answered in "Mediumship, and Its Laws, Its Conditions and Cultivation," by Hudson Tuttle. Price 35 cents. Address him at Berlin Heights, Ohio

LILY DALE ASSEMBLY.

Notes of Interest Pertaining to the Work and Workers.

In a shady nook in the northeast corner of the Lily Dale Assembly grounds a single pine table and chair stands on a 6-inch high platform, surrounded by benches. A small sign tacked up on a tree behind the table bears the legend, "Forest Temple," and here gather the most spiritual visitors, with others longing for knowledge or a message, at 9 a. m. and 4 p. m., under the leadership of a plain woman with a simple heart, gentle manner, and the face of a saint. This is Mrs. A. J. Devereaux, one of the real mothers of the Assembly.

Forest Temple is one of the best attended meetings at Lily Dale. What the baby is to the household—bright, dainty, full of tears and sunshine, and beloved by all—Forest Temple is to Lily Dale.

At the morning meetings the philosophy is mainly discussed, all expressing their views, and the embryotic speaker, who to-morrow will expound to the multitudes, here gets accustomed to face audiences and express thoughts in words. Forest Temple is the place where each may bring a new, helpful thought; new to the one who conceives or hears it for the first time, yet old as time, for who of us has new thoughts, after all?

The afternoon meeting is the mediums' hour. Mediumship is here developed and demonstrated, and a large number of visitors who fail to get a message at the meetings in the Auditorium have received the longed-for greetings and messages from their loved ones gone before.

Mrs. Carrie E. S. Twing delivered an exceptionally fine address on Sunday morning on "Vicarious Atonement"—suffering for another.

She spoke of the suffering of every mother when the mysterious veil lifts and a child steps through the portals into the world, as a vicarious atonement, while every conscientious, earnest man and woman is constantly bearing the burdens and sufferings of others. Mrs. Twing touched most tenderly on the deepest emotions which play on human heartstrings, and spoke as only one who has fought and conquered can speak from personal experience.

In the afternoon J. Clegg Wright spoke in his happiest vein. "Man," he said, "is no better than his organization, temperament and environment will permit. Nature does not produce honey alone; there is acid, and some men and women are acid in their makeup. Man is an animal before he is an angel. Let error fight error that truth may prevail. In 1662 the prisons of England were full of parsons who refused to give their consent to the Book of Common Prayer. We have a Peace Congress but no peace. Labor and capital also are fighting in the breastworks of the world. Nature does not grow by the law of heaven or hell, and when your liver is out of order you want the Democrats to come into power, but when your liver is in order everything is lovely."

Mrs. Annette J. Pettengill delivered one of her helpful, instructive lectures.

Elsie Stumpf is a new speaker on our platform, but an old friend and faithful worker. She spoke on the 18th. Was she an eloquent speaker, we never asked. When you listen to one who in her daily life carries out and lives what she teaches, is not that eloquence? Yes, and of the best kind.

Wednesday was National Spiritualists' Association day, and Dr. Geo. B. Warne, the National vice-president, represented that association. He invited his audience to become better acquainted with the constantly growing scope of work of that body, with its 600 local societies affiliated through the State associations, and stated that the census bureau counted about 295,000 Spiritualists in the United States and Canada. He paid eloquent tribute to the conscientious efforts of his associates on the National Board, stating that he had never worked with any more honest and earnest. He spoke with deep feeling of the loss sustained through the promotion of the late national treasurer, Theodore J. Mayer.

"Spiritualism," he said, "is more than a philosophy and greater than science. It is a religion, and touches the deepest in a human soul. Being a religion, we have fought and won our cases in the courtrooms and before legislatures. Had we pleaded our cause as a philosophy, they would have paid no attention; but we pleaded for Spiritualism as a religion and gained a hearing and victory."

The Doctor referred to some of the work done by the N. S. A., pointing to the financial and moral support given by it in the Goff bequest in Michigan, by which $20,000 was added to sustain our work. Over $2,000 has been paid out of the national treasury in the past to help sustain the wills of arisen Spiritualists in various States. The recognition thus obtained will make future victories easier, and more frequent.

The monthly pension roll for needy mediums aggregates $1,400 for the year, while $1,700 per annum has been spent for the past five years for this purpose, without which many a medium would have suffered for the necessities of life or been in the poorhouse. Over $400 have been paid from the national treasury to help mediums on the Pacific coast in legal contests, and over $6,000 more spent in general missionary work than was received for that specific purpose—broadening the work and laying the foundations for State associations in unorganized States.

The Doctor affirmed that the N. S. A. is the staunch friend of all true mediums and the persistent opponent of frauds, and warned his hearers to look out for any mediums who denounce the National, as they probably have personal grievances for having been exposed. He admonished all to join and sustain their local society, adopting the motto of Golden Rule Jones, "Raise your city one inch instead of exalting yourself at the expense of everybody else."

Mrs. Fixen followed the Doctor, showing that organization was exemplified in nature, and that all great movements need organized efforts to be successful.

Mrs. R. S. Lillie pleaded for $1.00 from each Spiritualist, per year, to sustain the work of the N. S. A.

About $110 was paid into the Mediums' Fund of the National at the close, and people went away with much more favorable opinions of its work than they had ever had.

The daily attendance is growing, the Maplewood Hotel is well filled with guests and every one of the 192 cottages occupied.

One of the most welcome attractions at the assembly is the Lily Dale Orchestra. Everybody expected something above the average, for the musicians were selected with greatest care by Mr. G. L. Humphrey, assistant to the President—(and her husband,) who made his record as bandmaster of the famous 7th Regiment Band of New York City; yet the music is finer than we expected. Each is an artist and does his utmost best, and a greater orchestra never tooted among the trees. The selections are from old standard, classics to the latest and up-to-date favorites. This adds attraction to our dances, a pegleg could toe dance to such tunes; so what cannot ten itching toes with a fluttering heart above them, and an anxiously waiting partner do?

Anyway, everybody dances and the rest keep step with their feet while looking on. Last year, gentlemen paid 50 cents to dance, and ladies were admitted free, this year every dancer pays 25 cents, regardless of sex. A badge is furnished with each admittance, and the gallant swain with quarters to spare has plenty chances to spend them, inviting partners to dance, and securing the coveted badge first, while he who carefully scans his choice to see if she has a badge before he asks her to dance, need not expect so large a smile as he who generously pays his money and takes his choice—to dance with.

I wish that you, gentle reader, was here to enjoy yourself with us.

LAURA G. FIXEN.

THE PLANETARY WORLDS.

Neptune Not the Most Distant Planet —Sky Travelers, Etc.—A Selection From the Writings of Dr. E. D. Babbitt.

Neptune is supposed to be the most distant planet in the solar system, but I perceive that there is one more planet vastly beyond it. A world somewhat larger than our earth, and having no moon. Being so far away in the cold realms of space, it cooled off and became ripened a great series of ages ago. Its people are greatly in advance, even, of the people of Mars, for evolution is an upward progress, so that compared with us, the people must be like gods and goddesses. Their sky-travelers and motor methods are amazing. Their atmosphere, by chemical affinity with the cold elements of space around them, is highly thermal in its nature, so that the sun, although so small, awakens a fine luminosity, and kindles their earth itself into warmth. The people are angelic, and I have named this planet Celestia. Astronomers have already perceived that Neptune has been influenced in its course by some power beyond it, and will undoubtedly discover it in a few years.

The people of Mars have evoluted more extensively than ourselves, are quite beyond us in science, art, inventions, clairvoyance, and psychometric skill, and know a great deal more about us than we do about them.

The usual labor day of Mars is about one-quarter of our time, or not far from six hours, their complete day being about 24½ hours; in most cases the people engage in the kind of business which they have a talent for and most enjoy, but if they engage in that which is less pleasant, they receive greater pay.

Let those pessimists that seem discouraged about our human race, considering that they are hopelessly in the line of selfishness and greed and ignorance, remember that both Mars and Celestia have had to pass through virtually the same grades of brutality, plutocracy, priestcraft and despotism that have afflicted our earth, and let them remember that those planets, learning in part by mistakes, have ascended to a divine religion and science and social development which has made human life happy and beautiful. Even on earth we are rapidly outgrowing many of our imperfections, and in our advanced portions have risen considerably beyond the lower realms of Mars, in which idolatry is still practiced.

Telegraphy, I understand, is not practiced in Mars. Systems of thought transfer take its place. For this purpose regular offices are established in which psychically developed persons officiate. In Celestia this thought transfer has been used for untold ages, and offices are maintained for the purpose, though most persons there have such a psychic development as to be able to communicate with their friends at a distance without any outside help.

Sky traveling is almost the universal method of locomotion in Celestia for any considerable distance. The Celestians superseded the use of steam an immense period of time ago, but are now using a still safer and grander force than that which superseded steam. They get into their sky-traveler, turn on their force and mount upward, and when they wish, can leave the birds out of sight in a moment. Every family has its private sky-traveler. A man sometimes takes his family into his vehicle, and as he sweeps over valley, mountain, river and ocean, will teach his children the geography of the world from actual observation.

At night, coming to a city, perhaps on the other side of the world, he will find it brilliantly lighted by wonderful and almost costless methods which nearly equal daylight. On landing he will be received with open arms by the people and pressed to accept their loving hospitalities, for man and woman having evoluted for so many ages, have attained to what we would call angelic love, as well as wisdom.

Neither Celestia nor Mars navigate the sky in airships constructed on the principle of a balloon. They use wonderful concentrated forces which lift their ship into the air with exquisite wheelwork. Mars has done away with steam, and as near as I can learn, they use solidified gases, which, on being released gradually from the solid form, are immensely more elastic and potent than steam, and yet more safe. Would not solidified carbon dioxide be a good material to use in our earthly ships, cars, and other machinery? But a very little bulk of each material, when its safe use has been acquired, would be needed to drive an ocean steamer across the ocean, and would thus save the use of hundreds of tons of coal a day, which fill a quarter or third of a whole ship.

By the Wayside.

Following a few days' visit with my old friends Mr. and Mrs. F. R. Mattison, of Watertown, N. Y., came a trip up the St. Lawrence river, and a two-weeks stay among the Thousand Islands, whence I was suddenly recalled to Watertown by the news of Mrs. Mattison's transition to the spirit world.

She was stricken by paralysis on June 21 and left the body on July 6. The funeral on July 9 was largely attended. The body lay on the white satin couch of a beautiful silver-gray velvet casket, with flowers disposed by loving hands all about her. Her snow-white hair, the look of peace, the folded hands, and that indefinable dignity with which death invests the deserted house, were most impressive. But neither in the quietly restrained grief of her friends, nor in the service, was there the note of despairing sorrow, so often heard at funerals.

The subject of "Immortal Life" was dwelt upon by the speaker, who closed the remarks by reading J. L. McCreary's poem, "There Is No Death."

The local chapter of the Eastern Star, of which Mrs. Mattison had long been a member, attended in a body and rendered their symbolic service at the grave.

In this service the idea of a sleep in the earth, and of a final physical resurrection, is emphasized. But this was counteracted by the closing words of Spiritualism's mouthpiece. The speaker, taking some earth in her hands and stepping to the edge of the open grave, sprinkled it upon the coffin lid, with the words "Dust to dust, and ashes to ashes. We consign the physical to the elements from which it came, believing that THE SPIRIT HAS ALREADY RISEN, and is consciously present with us while we tenderly dispose of the garment, of which she shall nevermore have need."

Few have been better prepared for the change than this true, good woman, this devoted wife and mother and trustworthy friend.

She and her husband were Spiritualists, and many a lecturer and many a medium has been hospitably entertained under their roof—indeed, almost every worker who has served the Watertown society has been their guest.

Among those who will most miss her visible presence are her husband, son and grandson. But they all know the truth of spirit communion, and so are comforted, as is her friend

HELEN STUART-RICHINGS.

EXPOSING FAKES.

England is Awakening to the Great Injury the Fakes are Doing, and Exposures Follow.

Word comes from London, Eng., setting forth that the expose of a fraudulent "spiritualistic medium" has been the sensation of Leeds recently, the "medium" having been caught in the act by a camera which was brought into a meeting.

This man is an engine minder, who has found it lucrative to desert his engine at frequent intervals in order to humbug devout Spiritualists at fees varying from a guinea to 35 shillings per night.

Recently, by means of a substantial fee, the medium was persuaded to give in a private house a materializing seance, at which the photographer contrived to be present. A thorough search showed nothing upon the medium in the shape of drapery, but, as the photograph showed, his chest protector, cleverly manipulated, played an important part in the farce, while the "spirit's" garments were evidently ironed flat and concealed in the lining of one of the medium's garments, as in the photographs creases are plainly to be seen.

The medium having entered an improvised curtained cabinet, in a corner of the room, lights were lowered until it was impossible to distinguish more than just the outline of one's neighbors. The only light permitted was that of a small red lamp. While the "assistants" sang a hymn the medium proclaimed by his deep breathing that he was going into a trance. Then a faint rustling as of a folded piece of linen being shaken out inside the cabinet was heard. This was explained away by a devout believer as the building up of the form.

Another hymn. Then someone asked, "Is there too much light?" Three sharp notes on the bell gave an emphatic "Yes," according to the Spiritualistic jargon. The tiny light was still further lowered, and at an invitation from one of the circle the "spirit" appeared.

In beseeching tones several of the good people present asked him to touch those he loved, bidding him not be afraid. A willowy arm was extended through the darkness, and a horny hand, like that of a workman, touched three or four. A boot creaked and the "spirit" disappeared behind the curtain. After more hymn singing and a further invitation, the "signor" or "master spirit"—this time apparently a very much taller man—came forth. It was then that the flashlight photographs were taken, and the light, as well as the subsequent prints, showed a man resembling the medium. The discovery proved too much for the latter, and he disappeared from Leeds, in all probability for good.

TAKE NOTICE!

Spiritualists Everywhere Be On the Alert.

Spiritualists of the United States, do you want Spiritualism properly represented in the report of the Director of the Census? If so, urge the officers of your local and State association to fill and return the card sent them long ago, by the Department. Every opportunity has been given us to prove by figures how many we are, and it will be our own fault if we are incorrectly reported. Spiritualists, have you the courage to stand up and be counted? If so, send in the reports of your local societies.

Important Question.

Is Christian Dogma Infallible or Essential to Salvation?

Man is endowed at birth with physical, intellectual and moral qualities capable of great development, and this world is peculiarly adapted, with its manifold pictorial diagrams, to teach the infant mind its first lessons in observation and reasoning.

But the child is not left to the influences of Mother Earth to mould the character of the young soul, as the babe had no choice in the nature of its birth, neither had it the fashioning of those environments destined to play an all-important part in its destiny.

As a Christian people, we are inclined to give praise and thanksgiving that we were not born in India, China, or any other nation than our own. We consider ourselves a favored people, and are prone to look upon God as being fond of conferring such favors. In our own estimation, at least, our religion is the only true one, and we send missionaries to preach it to all the world. But let us take a glance for a few moments at history, and see what it has to say.

In the Assyrian Cuneiform writings we find an account of the creation, the flood, and also psalms identical with those recorded later in the Christian Bible.

About 2,300 years before Christianity, we find contained in a code of the Babylonian King, Hammurabi, laws identical with those credited to Moses.

In the Persian religion we also find teachings concerning God's kingdom, of good spirits around his throne, of the evil spirit, the judgment of the soul after death, of a heaven and a hell, the divine savior, and of the resurrection of the dead, all of which correspond with the more recent Jewish theology and Christian Bible.

More remarkable still is the striking similarity between the Christian scriptural writings and those of the Indian, especially the Buddhistic, dating some 500 years before the dawn of Christianity.

In these writings we find an account of Buddha descending into the world, was born of a virgin mother, overcame the temptations of the devil, healed the sick, fed hundreds from the contents of a small basket, was transfigured into heavenly light, revealed himself to his disciples just before death, and finally passed to the eternal heavenly spirit, Lord of the world.

In the face of such historical facts, is it not apparent that our manner of thinking, like our manner of acting, is largely the result of environment, and not essentially infallible, as we are disposed to think?

As a so-called Christian people, in what respect are we the moral superiors of other nations? Does our modern civilization prove it? Are we less vain? Is there greater simplicity of living and less graft and the many other forms of vice here, than among other people?

What a horrid condition of slavery is this Pharisaism of ours, preventing us from looking at facts square in the face.

Man the world over is but a child born as though yesterday, while eternity lies before him. He finds interest in childish things, for it requires time to bring him to the years of discretion.

The mineral, vegetable and animal kingdoms were not evolved in a day, and man, the fruit of all preceding kingdoms, has but started on his journey of eternal progression.

To the observer, unbiased by sectarian training, all is perfect system in the cycle of progressive stages, from the simplest to the most complex form. There is not a break in the order and harmony of these successive developments. Man alone has created the idea of miracles. They never existed in fact, and certainly were never needed.

Ignorance and selfish interests will cause men to oppose the truth, but "truth is mighty and shall ultimately prevail."

It is not in the power of any man or combination of men to arrest the tide of steady progression.

The human race has been pushed along from the dark ages of the past, and there is no sign of abatement in the life of progressive thought having as its motto perfection.

The man who dares to think cannot remain in darkness. "The truth shall set you free."

There certainly could not be a worse form of slavery than that which shackles the intellect, which confines a man to fixed and unprogressive ideas, and forbids the expansion of that beacon light—reason, which illuminates the soul.

Growth, development, and ultimate perfect unfoldment is just as sure and quite as natural to the soul as is the germination of seeds in other productions.

The creative plan could never be successfully worked out after the formula of man's arbitrary and impulsive notions. It will continue to proceed in that orderly manner which has characterized all preceding acts of a wise Creator.

It is no easy task to rid one's self of the false impressions of a lifetime, but it must be done, and time alone can do it.

Some will be ahead of others in the race of progress, but the same goal of complete ripeness is the heritage of all.

There are bound to appear clouds, for all cannot be sunshine in the ripening of the human harvest, and just now there is a very strong tendency to arrive at atheistic conclusions, but the remedy shall be a very natural one, and is already provided in the very soil from which the trouble emanated.

This remedy is at present engaging the attention of the most scientific minds of the age, and when the veracity of these manifestations of spirit power can be vouched for by such men as Lombroso, Flammarion, Marconi, Sir William Crookes, Sir Oliver Lodge, Archdeacon Colley, Prof. Richet, Barrett, and many others of world-wide reputation, surely the fact cannot be ignored by those who have not given the subject careful investigation.

It is no longer a question as to the continuity of life beyond the grave, as St. Paul has told us many centuries ago, "There is a natural body and there is a spiritual body." 1 Corinthians, 15:44.

The question of to-day is as to the nature of that existence.

Much light will be thrown upon this question by approaching it in an honest, manly spirit, not biased by selfish interest or false training.

Could we do better, in trying to get a glance at the future, than to earnestly study the manner in which the kingdoms of the past and present have been evolved?

Man has found it convenient to classify these kingdoms under the heading of mineral, vegetable and animal, respectively, but to draw the line of demarcation, where one kingdom ceases and the other commences, is an impossible feat for the most gigantic mind, the close order of progressive gradations, from one stage to and through the other, being so thoroughly imperceptible.

In this connection of orderly progressive stages it ought not to be difficult to perceive how not only a new kingdom or spiritualized condition of matter is evolved, but also the superior character of each successive kingdom, with the manifold stages of ripening, over that of the preceding kingdom from which it has been evolved.

There is no idle speculation about the fact that we, as the most advanced members of the animal kingdom, find ourselves in possession of endowments capable of possibilities which could never be realized during the short space of life on this earth plane. The necessity, therefore, for a prolongation of the animal kingdom into a new or spiritualized condition of matter affording opportunities equal to the complete unfoldment of these endowments, becomes imperative.

Under existing circumstances it takes the most advanced minds their life's work to discover the fact that they know nothing compared with the ocean of knowledge unexplored.

We do know, however, that thought is not the servant of visible things, and also that all visible forms are but the expressions of creative thoughts, as a city is of man's thoughts. Furthermore, that from the simplest to the most complex forms, all are integral links in the great chain of universal usefulness. Nothing exists without a specific purpose, and that purpose aims at growth leading to complete unfoldment of natural endowments and the harmonious balancement of all functions, which alone insures unison of action and perfect accord with the Creative will.

In this plan of universal salvation, little room is left for jumps and bounds entirely incompatible with reason, and not warranted by the evidence of precedents, or that order and harmony characteristic of Creative methods in the past.

The mineral kingdom feeds the vegetable, the vegetable feeds the animal, and, in its turn, the animal cannot fail to continue the work already begun toward the developing of latent properties common to all men, and of which, at present, they have but faint idea, but must become conscious as they ascend in the scale of human advancement from animal conditions into the spiritual light of infinite thought.

Possibly some of my dogmatic friends, for whose benefit this article has been written, may take exception to my free use of the word matter.

They want to be something which even infinite intelligence fails to comprehend. They are not satisfied with this slow and tedious method of evolving out of crude material, through progressive gradations, the kingdoms of the future. They want to be instantaneously transformed from present stages of self-indulgence, ignorance and vice, into angels of light, wisdom and virtue. It would be so much nicer than to have to go through the narrow path of tedious progressive stages. It is a pity, but "God moves in a mysterious way his wonders to perform."

Indeed it is a wonder that the Christian churches fail to arrest the tide of atheistic currents, or to reconcile their fixed, unprogressive, primitive ideas with the demands of starving souls.

They may continue to investigate the causation of the ever-increasing empty pews, but as "man cannot live on bread alone," it is quite natural that the hungry soul should seek food outside of the church if impossible to find it in their midst.

The physical man is classified as an omnivorous animal, and the spiritual man cannot be restricted to a diet not calculated to nourish and stimulate into health normal action the many functions of his spiritual organism.

You cannot grow and not eat. Neither can you with impunity feed one part at the expense of the other, for not only does the character of food influence the character of growth, but it must be so proportioned as to meet all the demands of the system.

It is incredible that preachers can be ignorant of these facts. Indeed, it is much easier to believe that they lack the self-sacrificing courage essential to their acknowledgment of truth.

However, the sun will continue to move, unmindful of man's frailties.

Finally, I would love to leave one thought with my readers—that as we are so constituted as to be reciprocally dependent one upon the other, is not one of creed or dogma, but is indelibly written in the very constitution of Universal laws.

FREDERICK DUGGAN.

The Hull Pilgrim at Home.

It is now over a month since my return to Whitewater, and letters are reaching me from various points on the Pacific Coast, from friends solicitous on my behalf, inquiring as to my condition since I entered the home.

Above all things in this world I do not wish to be considered disloyal to friendship, or forgetful in any way of obligations to friends. If anyone of these dear people had followed me from day to day and felt my heartpangs and heard my soul cry at times, while re-arranging the home, assorting his belongings, and putting away cherished articles, never to be touched by his dear hands again, that one would not wonder.

I felt I could not rush into print at once and write of my taking up life again in the home.

Great waves of emotion cannot continuously sweep over the soul, and pangs cannot uninterruptedly pierce a human heart for long seasons, and my friend, whoever you are, I desire to impress you that while intense nature may feel nearly crushed under the heavy hand of a great sorrow, yet the joy that comes at intervals when the soul sees and hears, and knows that soul-life is, or may be a continuous union, I desire you to know this joy—becomes as intense as the suffering has been. So, when the tempest is upon me, and I feel as a lone tree, exposed to the wind and the storm, but I know such conditions cannot always last, and as the tree takes firmer hold in mother earth when swayed by storm, so the varied, almost wonderful experiences that have been mine since the transition of my companion, have, if possible, driven me more deeply, more solidly into the fundamental truths of Spiritualism.

I have letters containing this question: "Believing as you do, how can you ever give up to sorrow and to tears?"

I will not attempt to answer the query here, only to say, I am still partly human; my feet are walking the earthly paths, and I live as a physical being amid material things. If such persons as those who wonder over grief and tears, after having learned man does not die, and under proper conditions can hail his friends on this side of the "Great Divide," were to become a student of psychology, he would understand the seeming inconsistency of the writer on this point.

HAS MOSES MADE HIMSELF KNOWN IN THE HOME? Yes, many many times. In a strict sense, the two pilgrims entered the home on my return. Long before I left the Pacific Coast, he urged me, through mediums who knew nothing of my plans, to change my date of leaving. His words on two occasions were there: "Your journey homeward will be much easier than you imagine. Cross no bridge until you reach it. (A favorite expression of his.) I cannot explain now, but leave it to me." Strange as it may seem, I did not travel one mile of the homeward way apart from the tender care of loving companionship. My good friend, Mrs Kelso, went with me from San Jose to Colorado, and arranged for Mrs. Niver to meet me at Longmont and to accompany me home.

In many other instances I have had what to me has been positive evidence of Mr. Hull's intervention in my affairs. And is it so? Do dear ones, as "Invisible Helpers," pervade our atmosphere, impress dear ones in the form to voice their love and express their watchfulness in so many ways?

Are there moments when they press so near us we can tell by our own heart throbbings when the great love-tide of their soul being surges into ours, and secretly, silently the unspoken message comes, the holiest, the dearest of all communion between souls? Yes, I know it, and dear reader, if you do not know it now I trust you will sometime.

A Remarkable Occurrence.

Early in May, my brother-in-law, Eden B. Sawyer of Fort Worth, Texas, passed to spirit life. This brother had been a Spiritualist for a half century; he paid me, as Treasurer of a New England Spiritualist society, the first salary I received as a "girl preacher." We had, since his marriage with my sister, been as fond of each other as though we had been born of the same parents. He loved Mr. Hull and during our visit in Fort Worth one year ago last November, he remarked that he wanted one or both of us to say the last words over his body, if he passed beyond first; he was in feeble health at the time.

After Mr. Hull left the mortal this brother wrote me a loving letter of condolence, and intimated that he would soon follow. I should have said that Mr. Hull had promised to officiate at brother's transition service, whenever it might occur, if possible.

A few days before he left the mortal he remarked to my sister, "Moses is here."

My niece, who informed me of the incident I am about to write, said in her letter, "Mother and I felt Uncle Moses' presence."

On the occasion of the service, about one hour before Mrs. Wilson, who had been summoned from Houston to deliver the address, gave her message to the friends, Mrs. Hulbert, an intimate friend of the family, well known to the writer, was with the family in the room where the casket had been placed; she remarked: "What a peaceful, beautiful influence there is in this room; let us keep quiet a few moments."

My niece stated that gradually her face changed in expression, her voice also changed, and she spoke of the lovely experience the newly arisen spirit experienced in passing to spirit life. To use my niece's words: "Her words were the most comforting I had ever heard; in a few moments we recognized the intonations, the sentiments, and the mannerisms of my dear Uncle Moses. I write you this, because it must be a comfort to you, and we want you to know Uncle Moses fulfilled his promise; he spoke at papa's funeral."

To me this incident is beautiful, and needs no further comment.

The Dear Letters and Love Offerings Received of Late by the Hull Pilgrim.

Many soulful letters, some however almost as brief as telegrams, have found their way to my hand since my return home. In every instance, when the full name and address has been sent, I have acknowledged the same personally. For some reason, a few of the letters bear the signature "An Unknown Friend," or simply one or two initials are given.

"Words are cheap," one can find them anywhere; I can simply say; I THANK YOU ONE AND ALL. I am sure they will each read these lines, because in every instance, The Progressive Thinker has been mentioned in the communication. I am also sure that My Moses knows of all consideration bestowed upon the lone little pilgrim who is doing the best she can to meet all conditions incident to a journey bereft of the strong, Magnetic presence of her beloved companion.

I feel grateful to my friends in the fresh. I trust my friends in the spirit, and as Moses was my strong helper in all ways, I am assured he guards and directs many of my movements now.

In a few days I leave my home, in which Prof. and Mrs. Weaver do all they can to make it truly the home, for my brief stay at Lily Dale. While there I shall rest under the roof of Mrs. S. S. Lutes' sylvan home. Thus, wherever I go, I seem almost fated to abide with old and dear friends.

I send my soulful appreciation with this to the grand, loyal Progressive Thinker, for all favors and considerations shown me.

Michigan State Spiritualist Association—Annual Meeting at Lansing, Michigan.

The Annual meeting of the Michigan State Spiritual Association will be held, August 13, 1907, at Lansing, Mich., at the Mediums' Home. Cedar St., South. There is much business of importance to come before this convention; amendments to our Constitution and By-Laws, on the following articles and sections will be acted upon:

Article I., Section 4, Annual Meeting-place and date.

Article II., Section 1, Annual dues.

Article VI., Section, Licentiate, or Lay minister; Section 2, Ordination; Section 3, Mediumship; Section 7, Time of payment of annual dues.

Possibly there may be others and new sections added in order to make it to be of the most benefit to our Cause.

It is necessary that every local society be represented at this meeting for it is of value to all.

We have an abundance of work and need your assistance, so please be on hand. New officers are to be elected, and if in the past changes have not met with your approval be at this meeting and do your part.

See that your credentials are properly made out, and with per Capita tax, are in the hand of the State Secretary not later than August 2. That will give her ample time to get her report ready for the convention.

Do not forget the Date: August 13, at 10:30 o'clock sharp.

UNIVERSAL SPIRITUALISM

Spirit Communion in All Ages, Among All People—by W. J. Colville.

This work has two distinctive features; (1st) A resume of the Spiritual faith and practice of Egypt, India, Persia, Greece, Rome, China, Japan, and other ancient nations, not excepting Europe during Christian centuries. (2) A summary of recent experiences in America, Great Britain, Australia, France, Germany, Italy, and other modern lands, all tending to show the persistent continuity of spiritual revelation. Clairvoyance, Telepathy, and Psychic Phenomena in general is dealt with in separate chapters at the end of the volume, making it a highly useful textbook for all who are interested in the great question of human immortality. The Author says: "The libraries contain a large number of extremely valuable works dealing with every imaginable phase of Spiritualism and occultism, but I have searched in vain for a single portable volume, issued at a popular price, which gives a brief and lucid statement of the claims made in all ages and in all countries on behalf of the mighty truth of communion between inhabitants of earth and dwellers disrobed of flesh in the one vast spiritual universe. The enormous and ever increasing interest in "Psychic" problems and the eager, constant demand for historic information coupled with a rational setting forth of intelligible spiritual philosophy, has led me to appear once again before the public with a book." Price $1.00.

OUR CHILDREN.

Hints From Practical Experience for Parents and Teachers.—By Paul Carus.

In this little book "Our Children," Paul Carus offers a unique contribution to pedagogical literature. Without any theoretical pretensions it is a strong defense for the rights of the child, dealing with the responsibilities of parenthood, and with the first inculcation of fundamental ethics in the child mind and the true principles of correction and guidance. Each detail is forcefully illustrated by informal incidents from the author's experience with his own children, and his suggestions will prove of the greatest possible value to young mothers and kindergartners. Hints as to the first acquaintance with all branches of knowledge are touched upon—mathematics, natural sciences, foreign languages, etc.—and practical wisdom in regard to the treatment of money, hygiene and similar problems. 207 Pages. Price, cloth, $1.00.

Journeys to the Planet Mars

Or, Our Mission to Ento (Mars)

A Narrative by Sara Weiss, Illustrated With Thirteen Original Drawings by the Authoress.

This strangely attractive narrative does not assume to be either scientific, philosophic, or as advancing any special religious creed. It is a plain statement of facts based upon the experience of a woman whose highest aim is to acquire a knowledge of truth, to earnestly strive to live it, and to offer to others a stepping-stone which may aid them, in their progress towards the light.

From the standpoint of Spiritualists this is a most interesting book, as Mrs. Weiss actually took these journeys in spirit and has given them in all sincerity, to the world. The book is uplifting and full of beautiful thoughts. 548 pages. Price $1.50.

THE BIBLE New and Revised Edition.

Authenticity, Credibility, Morality.

JOHN E. REMSBURG'S GREAT WORK

Ingersoll's desire that somebody should at last tell the whole truth about the Bible has been brilliantly fulfilled. No Freethinker worthy of the name can afford to pass over Remsburg's book in silence. Like Thomas Paine's "Age of Reason," may it, let us hope, find admirers and translators in other languages. And again, like Paine's book, may this brilliant work bring to its author the praise of posterity.—Der Freidenker (Milwaukee).

This great work on the Bible by Mr. Remsburg is most valuable—it is an encyclopedia of information in regard to the Bible, and surpasses in importance all other works of the kind now published. It is up-to-date in every particular. Price, $1.25.

The Progressive Thinker.

SPIRITUALISM—Progress, the Universal Law of Nature; Thought, the Solvent of Her Problems.—SPIRITUALISM

VOL. 36 CHICAGO, ILL., AUGUST 3, 1907 NO. 923

A CONCEPT OF HEAVEN.

Heaven is Located, also Other Place—Home of the Blest in Alcyone, the Wicked in the Sun, says Dr. Copp—Star Center of Universe—A Washington, D. C., Divine Says Here God Has His Throne, Surrounded by Angels—His Views of Heaven and Hell are Childish in the Extreme—Spiritualists, Alone, Have the True Concept of Heaven and Hell.

Our abiding place in the future has been located. Those of us who are bad in this world will be furnished free transportation to the sun, and those of us who are good may select a place in heaven to suit ourselves. If we want to rest in the heaven of heavens, where God has his throne, we will select Alcyone, but all the universe except the sun, which is hades, is heaven for those who follow God's commandments.

So says Rev. Zed Hertzel Copp, president of the Highway Sunshine Gospel Union, who has followed the announcement of his startling discovery that the sun is the home of the imp of darkness by the declaration that Alcyone, which he describes as the central planet of all known space, around which all other planets revolve, is the footstool of the Creator, where his throne has been erected. He makes the statement, he says, after a research covering fourteen years.

Heaven Is All Around.

But heaven is not confined to one particular planet, according to Mr. Copp. "Washington, this country, the whole world, is heaven," he says, "and we live in it. But it is not the heaven that God wishes it to be. Everything—the animals, the birds, the fishes—are in unison with God; only we, the human beings, are in revolt. As soon as we comply with God's will this earth will be a complete heaven."

From Alcyone, says the reverend doctor, the Almighty rules the universe and directs the destinies of man and womankind.

The multitude of planets which revolve around Alcyone he describes as magnificent gardens, wherein dwell angels and those over whom they preside. A state of lethargy exists among the inhabitants, and everywhere peace and quiet reign supreme.

Houses are Transparent.

"In heaven," said the minister, "there are palaces of brick and stone. But the solidity implied by the ingredients counts for naught, since they are transparent. The inhabitants may look through the houses of their neighbors. They can observe every action of their neighbor, and the thoughts of one are the thoughts of the other. But in heaven everybody is good. There is no such thing as rebellion, insubordination and reticence.

"Paul says he was taken up to the third heaven and heard things not lawful for him to utter. He could not utter them because he could not find human expressions strong enough to convey his ideas.

"There are three heavens. First, the natural heaven, the canopy above the earth; second, paradise; third, the heaven of heavens, or abiding place of Jehovah.

"Scientists know that there is a planet or star around which all the other stars and planets, including our own solar system, revolve. That is the star Alcyone, of the first magnitude as to size, and said to be thousands of times larger than any other known body.

"In this place the inhabitants are beings of the highest rank, but little lower than divinity itself, clothed with majesty, power and learning. Earthly kings surrounded themselves with the best and noblest of their subjects. Is it a violent supposition that the divine king does likewise in the composition of his court?"

For the second heaven, commonly called paradise, Mr. Copp said he had no precise location.

Astronomers Not Agreed.

Alcyone is the most brilliant star of the group known as the pleiades, which is in the constellation Taurus, and is quite conspicuous on winter evenings about 24 degrees north of the equator. Alcyone is of a greenish hue and has a magnitude of 3.0. This is the star which was supposed by Madler, the German astronomer, to be the central sun, in reference to which our sun, with its planets, and all other known systems, are moving, perhaps revolving, within some almost incomprehensible period of time; but, as a general proposition, the hypothesis of any central sun is considered too daring by astronomers.

The distance of Alcyone from the earth is immeasurable, and its size may only be conjectured, but that it is a vast, flaming mass is conceded. And it also is probable that a ray of light from Alcyone will take at least 100 years to reach this earth.

For some unknown reason there were anciently said to have been seven pleiades, although only six were conspicuous then, as now. To the Greeks the constellation was important, since with its heliacal rising in May navigation began, and with its setting in November it was supposed to close. The pleiades also served as guides for seed time and harvest.

This eminent divine is badly off in his estimate of "heaven" and "Hell." The Spirit realist's concept of the place is correct, as proved by actual observation by many seers and mediums.

Lake Brady Camp.

The Lake Brady Camp was favored on July 21, in several ways, the weather being perfect. In the morning Mr. B. F. Austin addressed the people. He stopped on his way from Virginia to Cleveland, Ohio, where he had an engagement Sunday afternoon. The subject of his remarks being, "The Possible Good in Spiritualism."

Dr. Knowles followed with messages. In the afternoon Dr. Knowles talked for a time on the following questions given by the audience:

"Where is the Spirit World?"

"Where is Heaven and Hell?"

"Is Spiritualism Growing? Is the Number of Spiritualists increasing?"

"Why Sit in the Dark in the Seance Room?"

"What Do You Consider the Best to Do for the Saloon Element?"

His talk was full of practical truths, concise and to the point.

Mr. Conant, a speaker and healer followed with a few remarks on Life and Spiritualism. He and his wife stopped for the day, being on their way to an eastern camp. He is a very interesting and magnetic speaker, holding his audience from start to finish with no seeming effort.

The usual conferences, lectures and Ladies' Aid meeting will be held during the week.

The Garden of Eden.

Have you heard of that wonderful garden of old,
Where Innocence dwelt amid beauties untold?
Where man in his glory of strength and of grace,
Tilled the garden of Eden, the home of his race?
O, where is the garden of Eden to-day?
In that Orient land far away, far away?
May we seek for it only in Orient clime,
And in ages long dimmed by the shadow of time?

Sweet garden of beauty, pure, lovely to view,
And bending o'er all, Heaven's beautiful blue,
Thy bowers and ranges, and clear flowing streams,
Excelling in beauty man's loveliest dreams.
With love and with longing, in fancy we gaze
On the scenes where man dwelt in his innocent days,
And our hearts feel the sadness of joys that are gone,
As we think of that garden in Time's early dawn.

But why should we linger in fondness of woe,
O'er the beauty that's faded, the glories laid low?
O'er the form of the loved one returned to its clay?
O'er the darkness of evening that follows the day?
To the pure and the loving there's light in the soul,
And its beauty, eternal, shall ever unroll;
Then seek not that garden far yonder apart,
For the garden of Eden—'tis here, in the heart.

Sweet garden of Eden—dear home of delight,
Where the soul's glowing day ever banishes night,
Thou art not afar in yon Orient clime,
Nor alone in the Past, veiled in mists of old Time,
Never, then, will I wander in sadness afar,
In quest of that garden. Its gates are ajar,
And the angels of glory and goodness impart
Their light and their joy in my Eden—my heart.

O, seek not that garden in Orient clime,
Whose glories have withered and vanished with time—
Whose beauties abounding made glad our fair race,
And fairer than Eden was man's shining face.
That garden whose glories were mentioned of old,
Where Innocence dwelt amid beauties untold,
Where man lived in glory of strength and of grace,
In the garden of Eden, the home of the race.

In the Present and Future, and not in the old,
That garden of beauty and grace will unfold,
With its bowers of joy and its crystalline streams,
A heaven of glory exceeding our dreams,
O, that garden of Eden seek not far away;
It is near, not afar, in its shining array;
And forever and aye, while the ages unroll,
That garden will bloom in the beautiful soul.

Letter From the Drummer Medium.

After leaving my cottage in Minnesota, where I had a splendid time, fishing, boating, etc., with a number of my Southern friends, I stopped at Wonewoc camp, Wis. They have a beautiful camp there, and splendid talent on the rostrum.

While there I was invited to help at two message services, with Mrs. Cooley and Frank Ripley, and splendid messages were given by the speakers.

I then went to Grand Ledge Camp for the opening. This camp is one of the finest in the United States. The Auditorium is a fine one to speak in, large and yet easy to be heard in.

Mr. Oscar Edgerly opened camp with one of his fine inspirational talks, that caught the audience and made them feel as if they had found a home at Grand Ledge Camp. His lectures are always fine.

In the afternoon Mrs. A. E. Sheets of Grand Ledge, gave the lecture. She also is a grand inspirational lecturer, and one whose lectures always touch the soul and make one feel as if in perfect harmony with the higher life.

I was invited to follow with messages at both services, and all were recognized.

Oscar Edgerly will give the lecture Sunday, July 28, and each day except Monday for one week. Am sure there will be large audiences to hear him. Wish all The Progressive Thinker readers could attend Grand Ledge Camp to hear him. They would go away afterwards and tell what a grand treat they had.

I am to have the pleasure of following his lectures with messages.

The Death Change and After

As Vividly Portrayed in "Light," by E. W. Wallis, at the Rooms of the London Spiritualist Alliance.

For some weeks past very interesting trance addresses, dealing with the death change and spirit experiences in the life beyond, have been given through the mediumship of Mr. E. W. Wallis on Wednesday evenings, at the rooms of the London Spiritualist Alliance. The following summary of one of these addresses is made from shorthand notes kindly supplied by one of the audience who made them for his own use.

After some preliminary observations on the absence of knowledge of what spirit is, per se, and on the nature of consciousness, the spirit claimed that the spirit is the body builder; that it needs a mortal form for the attainment of individual existence and personal self-consciousness, and for the intelligent expression of its inherent attributes—or, in other words, for the education and manifestation of the Divine powers which belong to Man the spirit.

Having dealt with the intimate relationship existing between the spiritual and physical bodies, he said that the spirit acts immediately upon and through the spiritual organism and, by its agency, vitalizes and preserves the outer form, of which it is the prototype. The spirit he regarded as a center of energy, possessing formative and controlling power, and by concentrating thought, directed purposely toward a diseased organ, the thinker might bring his psychical forces to bear to restore it to health and strength; for, said the speaker, the mind can, and often does, affect the body for good or ill. Each individual lives his own life, his consciousness is discrete, no other person can know him as he knows himself. Change is the law of life mentally as it is bodily—men die daily and are renewed daily in their thought and motive lives as much as in their body lives, and though in old age physical powers may fail, the mind is often active and clear right up to the end. Earth-life experiences train the mental and moral powers; help to awaken and evolve the spiritual consciousness and enable man to know himself, and to will that he shall live rightly and wisely. The sense of personal identity is intensified and deepened by the failures and successes, the sorrows and pleasures of life, and when the processes of the death change (which were fully described) have been completed the spirit stands forth a living personality—unchanged in character and and ability, in consciousness and disposition.

The spirit body is as actual and real to the spirit as the old earth body appeared to be, and its environments are as palpable to its perceptions—it has simply passed from one plane of conscious existence to another.

While this is true, in a general way, the newly-born spirit soon realizes that there is a great difference; for he is shut off from the five-sense plane—he no longer sees, hears, tastes, or touches, or understands what is going on on earth as he used to do. The invisible has become visible and the formerly visible things invisible—he may be in the dark as far as his earth friends are concerned, quite as much as they are regarding his new conditions.

The newly-awakened one on the spirit side soon discovers that he has lost his place in the world; it goes on without him almost as if he had never been. Should he try to reach his friends, to speak to them, to touch them, to make them aware of his presence, he too often finds that they are deaf and blind and unresponsive. He cannot interfere in earth affairs—he may haunt his old home, or place of business, but no one pays any heed to him. He may even sit in his old arm chair, but no one notices him, or answers should he call. So far as the outer life is concerned he has lost all. Position, power, wealth, lands, houses—everything has gone from him, and if these things were the soul and all-absorbing interests and pursuits of his life, he is a spiritual pauper—a prisoner—held captive by the limitations of past habits, loves, and ambitions which he can no longer indulge or satisfy. By the consequence of his past modes of life and thought he is self-deprived of higher experiences—not held in thrall by Satan, not shut out of heaven by the arbitrary intervention and decree of an angry God—but as he was fully absorbed with, and his interests centered upon, the things of the five-sense plane, he is earth-bound.

Death does not necessarily awaken the spirit to a realization of his true spiritual state. He cannot cut himself away from his past—for he has become what he is because of that past—and the life after death is the natural, the inevitable sequel to the life lived on earth. He may not be unhappy—indeed, he may enjoy his life, as he did here, so long as he is contented with his state. Consider the immense army of spirits who are constantly being translated from the outer life to the spirit world, ranging from the barbarian to the civilized, from the ignorant and criminal to the cultured and spiritually unfolded, from the babe to the centenarian, and as these each go to their own place you will realize how infinitely varied are the states and conditions of the spirit world.

The change to the child means that it is shut off from the experiences of the outer physical life, but there are compensations. The divine spirit within becomes active, the psychic organism of the child develops as it would have done had it remained in the physical body, but the child's intuitive and perceptive powers are more sensitive, and its spiritual development is more readily attained.

Life cannot be reckoned by years, but by spiritual results. The Realities of life are the motives—thoughts, loves, desires and spiritual attainments, and until these are understood true spiritual life is unknown.

You wonder sometimes that certain spirits say that they have been on the spirit plane hundreds of years and do not even know where they are—but the fact is they are not spiritually awake. They are in the spirit-world, it is true—you, too, are spirits now—but they have not been born to the consciousness of spiritual things—they have not realized spiritual realities and relationships, nor learned to respond to the great spiritual principles which govern the lives of all, and, when intelligently and lovingly observed, outwork in beauty and harmony. They are still in the world of illusions of their own creation; they yield to what they consider the inevitable, and wait—wait they know not for what—getting what enjoyment they can out of their surroundings.

We are sometimes asked why the good spirits do not arouse the earth-bound ones and help them to rise to higher spheres. But, we may ask, why do not you awake the ignorant and vicious on your side? We strive to help them, but we cannot compel any soul to forsake its conditions. Each forward step must be taken voluntarily, and wiser spirits are shut off from those who are content with their surroundings and the conditions which they themselves have fashioned. They are impervious to the influence of love until they realize their true state; then the sense of isolation, the shame, remorse, and self-condemnation, which stir the depths of their consciousness, react upon them and, while painful to bear, they are in reality evidences of spiritual awakening and sensibility. This consciousness of imperfection and unhappiness leads to repentance and aspiration, and the upward path opens before the spirit which truly desires to walk the better way. Then it is that the loving friends who have been waiting, watching, and striving to bring about this change of attitude are able to minister to the mind diseased and the spirit oppressed; then it is that help and pity, comfort and guidance, encouragement and love, are extended to assist the pilgrim to arise and go to the Father.

Remember there is one great governing law in the spiritual world—the law of fitness; each one goes to his own place. No power in the universe can shut a spirit down into hell who is not fit to go there, or exclude him from heaven (or the happier states of spirit life) who has the right of citizenship by spiritual fitness. No one enters the great Summerland—the realms of light, joy, and peace—until he has spiritually unfolded and attained the consciousness of his at-one-ment with those conditions.

The law of spirit is growth and development, of strengthening will and unfoldment in wisdom, purity and beauty. The outcome of the wise use of knowledge is a state of conscious harmony with eternal spiritual principles. Death is only an incident in the evolutionary career of the spirit and its experiences, a stage in the preparation for the fuller life—the entrance to another class in the great college of immortal existence.

From the spiritual point of view the death change, to those who are prepared for it, is a deliverance—it sets them free and gives them scope and opportunity to learn, to develop, and to realize the dreams, hopes, ideals, and impulses which inspired them here, and to express all that is best and sweetest and noblest in their natures which could not be manifested on the earth. Rest assured no spirit will forever remain in darkness, slavery and solitude. Sooner or later each one must answer to the pleading of the spirit within, and respond to the call of the Divine Spirit to "come up higher." The experiences of life, both in and out of the body, are educational and preparatory, and it is the happy privilege of each one in the progressive life through the spheres, or planes of spiritual evolution, to awaken to the consciousness of this responsibility and learn to develop his spiritual powers in harmony with the will of God.

POINTED FACTS.

Regarding the Census and the Diminution in the Numbers in the Ranks of Spiritualism.

It is natural to believe that Spiritualists are made of sterner stuff than to allow themselves to lapse into an apathy akin to death. Upon some of the vital issues they are not in such a condition, but upon others they evidently are.

In the first place, we have discarded death from our vocabulary, but indeed it looks like the word would have to be resurrected to express the inanimate condition into which many so-called Spiritualists have fallen.

I do not mean to intimate that the Cause is dying, for it never was more alive than at present, even as an organized body, but since the strenuous efforts of Brother Barrett and other active workers have so signally failed to reach a showing upon the Census books, anything near the showing of the general estimate of 17 years ago, it would seem futile to estimate the numerical standing of Spiritualism.

If we are to include all who believe in the power of disembodied spirits to return and commune with friends upon the mortal plane, we can safely count upon many Unitarians, Universalists, New Thoughtists, Mental Scientists, Presbyterians, and even Catholics, but this would be unfair to those churches which are organized and their numbers counted and known. This would be stealing from the ranks of organizations to enlarge the numbers of unorganized Spiritualism. Presumably, there is where our past estimate of millions of Spiritualists came from.

There are enough believers in the principles of Spiritualism to run our numbers up among the hundreds of thousands, and perhaps the millions, if we could find them. We cannot reach them through the channel of The Progressive Thinker, which has, at a fair esitmate of six to ten readers to each subscriber, though that would run it over 100,000. Our responses show the lack of thorough organization, which cannot be forced beyond the desire of believers in the philosophy. You cannot force anyone to become a member of a society, for it isn't necessary to "repent and be baptized to be saved." We lack the compulsory methods that organized all the orthodox churches in the land. We have nothing to frighten them with. We are out of brimstone. It is in the hands of a trust, and the presence of his Satanic Majesty is not in our midst, even in imagination.

We must depend upon reason, love and moral suasion to organize Spiritualism, and they have proven sufficient functions to bring great results.

We have done well against a defiant opposition, but we are not discouraged, for truth is our foundation. We are only a little tired, because of the indisposition of Spiritualists to cooperate to push the Cause of truth along, but not so tired as to give up the struggle so long as one individual remains unconvinced.

Some of the most prominent workers in the Cause are not enrolled upon the books of any society, and we cannot accuse those of disloyalty, for they are doing more to enlighten the worldly minds and lead them towards their arisen loved ones than anyone else in the ranks; they are really making more Spiritualists by travelling over the land on personal engagements than if they were settled into the narrow confines of any association on the globe, but we can count them with and in Spiritualism every time, and can call them leaders.

These old leaders do not depend upon organized Spiritualism to keep them on the move from week to week or year to year, but the numerical standing of organized Spiritualism depends upon these grand workers for its increase in numbers.

Spiritualism doesn't own or hold a mortgage on anyone, nor can it claim a patent on the phenomena, that are occurring everywhere; but we can see a great necessity for organization to strengthen ourselves for good solid work if we would perpetuate the Cause as an institution.

Organized Spiritualism is growing, but we cannot come anywhere near the inflated estimate with our Census report at present. We will doubtless hear from Brother Barrett upon this point later.

THE PHILOSOPHY OF DREAMS.

"A Law There Must Be, and One That Marches Down the Aisles of Time With No Uncertain Tread."

Since the earliest dawn of civilization dreams have been recognized as mysterious phenomena of nature, but not confined to any time, locality or people, yet often containing warnings, messages and prophecies of deep import to the children of earth.

That the law that must control these activities is but dimly understood, will be readily conceded by all, and comparatively few who may read these lines would be able to give a lucid or satisfactory answer if called upon to define the word or explain the phenomena of this most common occurrence.

Yet a law there must be, and one that marches down the aisles of time with no uncertain tread.

We often hear or read of dreams that come to those who do not even believe in this philosophy, yet many times they are folowed by events that are most appalling in their accuracy, and carry convincing proofs.

Yet we go along on our headlong rush through life, never pausing to ask the why or wherefore of this recognized but sadly misused, or misunderstood, law of our inner selves, thereby losing the help these messages might be to us.

In centuries past drems were considered messages from God, and those who received them were deemed worthy of reverence and respect; their words were heeded, their counsel asked.

And the people of those ancient times were led to do many strange things, through their absolute belief in dreams, as anyone can prove by a perusal of the Bible.

Who of us to-day would believe as implicitly in a message given us as did Joseph of old, who took his wife and the child and fled to Egypt by night, through his faith in a dream?

If the day of judgment were near at hand, and God saw fit to warn the faithful ones of earth through some good old soul, by means of a dream, how many of us would even accept the honesty of the dreamer's intentions?

Let the earnest thinker take time to hunt up Bible facts on this subject, beginning with Job 33:15, 16; Joel 2:28; Genesis 28:12; Genesis 31:24; Genesis 37:5, and all of Genesis 41, especially verses 1, 5, 8, 11, 12, 15, 17, 22, 25, 32 and 39, all of which have a bearing upon this communication through dreams and the fact that they can be interpreted.

Why should we not be given manifestations of God's interest and presence—the proof of his love and care?

Have the messages ceased to come, or are we so blinded by materialism that we cannot see or take the time to read?

Few of us but will acknowledge there is a something more than pure mental activity in these fragments that are, as it were, lifted out from the constant ebb and flow of those panoramic pictures, that seem to be forever sifting in and out of the objective mind, while it lies dormant or below the horizon of consciousness.

All dreams are not the result of soul activity, any more than all men are honest, truthful or moral.

Dreams are the result of three working factors in men's lives. The Upanishad philosophy gives the first cause of dreams as physical derangement, when the natural currents of Prana are disturbed, so that disease is the result.

When the sympathetic chords of the mind are excited we dream of all the disagreeable accompaniments of whatever disease may be in store for us, or within our physical atmosphere. Such dreams are like in their nature to the ravings of delirium.

The second kind of dreams is caused by ordinary tatvic changes, when our past, present and future tatvic surroundings are uniform in their nature, when there is no change in store for us, the current or stream of dreams is more calm and easy flowing, as the tatvas glide smoothly one into the other; so do the impressions of our minds in this class of dreams. And these are the dreams we find so hard to recall when we wake from slumber.

The third kind of dream is somewhat similar to the first, the difference being in the nature of the effect. That is, the process of mental excitement is the same in both.

When the currents of life, pregnant with all sorts of good and evil, are sufficient in strength, they set the sympathetic chords of the mind in vibration at a more rapid rate, and we become conscious of coming events through the dreams that are strongly enough impressed upon subconscious mind to be re-collected later.

The purer the mind, and the freer from the sordid and false conceptions of the world, and its scorching tendencies, the more sensitive is it to the remotest or slightest tendency of Prana toward any change, and this explains the nature of prophetic dreams, for coming events, like a current of wind, stir or stir, the great ocean of Prana into a more rapid rate of vibration, and the dormant conscious mind registers these Pranic currents, or panoramic pictures, the same as you register your finger print when pressed upon a cake of soft putty. And the mind, by a psychic attribute called re-collection or remembrance is enabled to produce the pictures imprinted thereon (by Prana) when the dreamer returns to a conscious state.

This dreaming state is maintained as long as the cardiac temperature is not strong enough to affect the larger mental coil, but with increasing positive strength that, too, must be affected.

All the coils of both mental and pranic, are tuned together like the octaves of music, and changes in one must affect the other.

The vibrations per second, of the first one, is greater than the other, and this causes its subtility.

Now, when Prana, having acquired sufficient strength, passes out of tune with the soul, the mental vibrations are at rest, for the mind can only work at a certain temperature, BEYOND WHICH it MUST GO TO REST; and, in this state we have no more dreams.

This is the dreamless sleep. Those dreams which come while we are in deep slumber (see Job 4:12 to 17, and Job 33:15, 16.

These are the dreams that leave a thrill and sense of hidden meaning in their depths long after they have been dreamed, worried over and laid aside as something too deep for the average mind to grasp or explain.

These dreams are the result of SOUL ACTIVITY while the conscious (mental) man is negative, and the duality, or real man holds sway in the realm of soul.

And soul (never sleeping), in the home within, draws to itself the facts of past events or coming ones, and imprints them upon the conscious mind of the dreamer, while yet the objective senses lie dormant, or below the horizon of consciousness, and they are then brought to remembrance or are re-collected when the objective mind returns to its allotted work after its season of negation.

These are the messages of God to man. These are the dreams we should treasure in our hearts as direct messages from a loving parent to us his little children.

But, we ask, who will interpret these messages for us? Who can explain the hidden truths, who?

Let us stop a moment and consider; was it to the riotous man, the debauchee, the worldly-wise man, that God gave the power of interpretation? Not so; but to the man in all the kingdom who BELIEVED in God's power, TRUSTED to his guidance and was strengthened and made wise by the daily, hourly recognition of His presence and His love.

God makes no promises that he does not keep. SPIRIT knows ALL THINGS, and when the soul holds sway, spirit whispers secrets within the physical temple (which is the earthly home of the soul), and we wonder at its wisdom and source.

As we grow and unfold in the knowledge here and hereafter, we are being more convinced that THE WORD, THE WILL, THE WISDOM of God, vibrating throughout all space, all realms and planes, both seen and unseen, is WISDOM, POWER, SPIRIT, and THIS is the principle that sways and vibrates across the sensitive chords of men's souls, and makes itself recognized to the conscious man as dreams.

And this is only one of many ways in which the spirit calls to us from out of the silence.

Yet, oh! how many of us ever learn to read and heed these sweet messages?

Time is now, as it was ten thousand years ago, in the sight of God, and why should He speak through the medium of dreams to one generation and not to another?

Let us THINK.

REINCARNATION.

There May Be Repentance and Progression in the Spirit World.

Mrs. Ella Wheeler Wilcox, in the Hearst Journals of June 30, 1907, thus lectures an erring woman:

"The mistake you have made in this incarnation, once regretted, you will not have to make in the next. And you will come back next time with larger sympathies, more pity for those who are sinning, and you will be better able to help them to higher grounds."

Now here Mrs. Wilcox as a believer in reincarnation, makes the grand mistake that all Theosophists make, of assuming that there is no chance for this erring woman to profit by her post mortem regrets. When she passes out she may see the folly of her conduct and bitterly regret it, and she may spend much time and labor in making journeys back to the earth and assisting to guide and enlighten other women against making the same mistake. In fact, all spirit communications show that hundreds of thousands of spirits are continually engaged on errands of mercy whereby they raise themselves; and it is a well known law that on the principle of "setting a thief to catch a thief" the one who has committed a particular form of sin is best adapted to save another (in the body) from the same sin; thus fallen women will help to save young girls from a like sin, and so on.

So, here we find Mrs. Wilcox telling her unhappy friend that if she will only repent of her folly she won't in the next incarnation have to make the same blunder, and may even advance herself by helping others up higher.

This does seem to me to be very absurd and false doctrine, inasmuch as (if the spirit can repent of her ways whilst she is still in the body) she can equally repent of her ways after leaving the body.

In short, the more I read of spirit life and progress after death, the less I believe in reincarnation, save and except for two classes of spirits: Firstly, the very highest who come back with a message like Christ, Buddha, Confucius, Luther, etc., and dozens of other lofty spirits; and secondly, the large mass of mankind who have passed through life without developing any spirituality, and who persistently ignore soul-progress in the next life.

Of course I admit that the last named cover a very large field, for whom reincarnation is a necesssity, but Mrs. Wilcox calmly assumes (quite as a matter of course) that her unhappy penitent correspondent will have to be reincarnated.

I think all the descriptions of active, progressive life on the spirit side negative Mrs. Wilcox's conclusion, and that of Theosophy.

IMPORTANT QUESTION.

Shall the Spiritualists Have a Temple Fund?

The Spiritualists are obtaining their own edifices in many cities and towns of the United States. And in many others there is a slow saving of funds for that purpose. And in many places where an edifice is now possessed, there is yet a debt to meet. These are often hard pressed to meet the payments; and if they borrow, must do so from capitalists who would give no favor in case of not being able to pay when the obligation becomes due. A foreclosure and sale of the property is apt to occur.

The Temple Fund Society of the N. S. A. was organized to be of help and protection in such cases. The intent is not to erect Temples by the fund to be under control of the society, or the N. S. A., but to make small loans or donations where absolutely needed by the local society possessing or erecting an edifice.

There is no insistance upon their being called Temples; but may be halls, meeting-places, combination buildings, or any kind of an edifice wherein the local society may have a room or rooms for their society purposes. Some people want a church, and some a society, others a club, etc., but the Temple Fund Society has no jurisdiction, except to decide their help shall be given where it will do the most good. All the Spiritualists expect of the fund is that it shall be safely and judiciously handled. No one place to be favored; but all possible helped. Money to be placed on loan with a society for Temple purposes, when so requested, provided the funds are in hand. Thus, from one hundred to one thousand dollars loaned a society would enable it to secure a building-lot, or make the first or last payment on the edifice. All can readily see how this fund will be of great benefit, and the accruing interest continue to swell the same, instead of going into hands of people who have no regard for our cause.

Such fund is self-protection for the Spiritualists!

Large sums may accrue in course of time, and then a Temple might be erected in Washington, D. C., where now a local society is accumulating only about one hundred dollars per annum for a building.

A memorial building in Washington would become a permanent endowment for Spiritualism. The same would attract world-wide attention, and be a splendid place for our conventions, and possibly a great library of Spiritualist books, and a publishing house, etc.

The possibilities are untold now by our dreams, for the cause of Spiritualism will expand into wondrous proportions in the coming years. Let us build it!

You have not taken my appeals for a Temple fund very seriously, but I assure you that such a fund is started, and will go on to usefulness. Who will assist it? Small assistance by each will aggregate a mighty sum! Do not withhold your dollar, nor your dime.

One dollar per annum will pay membership dues in the Temple Fund Society, and such dollars will in time assist many struggling societies to have a home wherein to welcome the spirits, and their itinerant messengers.

I appeal earnestly for some generosity on your part, and at least for one dollar for membership for the next fiscal year to commence October 15.

This society will soon be able to assist, if a few more good and true Spiritualists will become members agreeing to pay one dollar per annum; for I feel very sure that most of the members for 1907 will continue as such. In such an event, the fund is sure to grow! The usefulness cannot be stopped by once helping a society, but will be a perpetual possibility.

Donors of larger sums, and legacies for this purpose will follow in good time, and these be protected against misuse, or against being lost by legal processes. But, it is well to give while you can do so without legal complications, and be able to see your gifts well administered. While on earth, let us try to do all we can for truth; and later, as spirits, we will find more glorious opportunities for good works to usher in the periods of peace and good will on earth.

It is of importance that each society shall send a statement of its present property, or prospects to obtain such, with information of value, debt or need. Such report will aid our work very greatly.

Any requests for information will meet with free response.

THOUGHTS.

Let us not forget, when contemplating or criticising the incapacity of others less versed than we, that there are degrees of learning and accomplishment beyond our present attainment; which places us conditionally, as subjects for estimation by those who are our superiors mentally. Herein is an opportunity to test our human qualities, or virtues, such as patience, prudence, fortitude and justice in all conquests between right and wrong, and in all dealings with our fellowmen.

The service of Nature is not prompted by compensation or remuneration; looks not to a superior for reward; has no equivalent in return save that of good, and the products resulting from the process of its laws, in accord with the specific character and purpose of the act.

Man deviates from Nature's plan by demanding compensation, and expecting reward for doing, or forbearing to do. His ensign reads, "He whom you would retain in your service, you must obligate with reward." This has given rise to diverse conditions, viz.: Exchanging evil for evil; good for good; or good for evil, and vice versa, in accord with the character of the individual, and his understanding of spirituality.

Speak encouragingly to those who are striving to attain higher degrees of perfection in any pursuit of life. Appreciative words, expressed from one's superior, are incentives to renewed effort, which latter, is the price of success.

What have I gained for self intellectually, morally and spiritually; that has made life worth living? Experience; character; unfoldment; development; soul culture, and the force of spirit-illumination, in accord with the law of progression.

What effect has this product upon others, that has made life worth the effort? Influence; the value of which must be determined by my character, and the degree to which I have practiced the Golden Rule.

Looking out into the gray haze of an Autumn day, through which the distant mountain ranges are scarcely visible, and the near-by tinted leaves gleam through their sombre bevellment; I am reminded that every mystery in the process of life, is accompanied with facts, beauty, and good, if we penetrate the depths of their concealment.

As the clouds of the preceding day vanish during the night, and the sun rises in refulgent splendor on the horizon of a perfect day, to dry and warm the bedrenched earth; so it is with life scenes. The days of sadness and depression pass by, and its spirit light gleams forth to illumine the soul, brighten the intellect, and to bring cheer to the heart of man.

THE NEGLECTED.

The Beautiful Guests We Fail to Honor at Our Rejoicing and Sorrowing Season.

"Spirits ofttimes come as unbidden guests to our feast times, or minister to the soul in its sorrowing seasons."

It was gala day at Leon Deu preparing for the evening's joyful time of a grand Shakspearean comic or operatic performance of some of the great Shakspeare's characters.

The guests were invited—two score or more of the elite of the villages around, and the star actors with their very good manager, Amy K., were fully prepared for this beautiful and important event.

The old mansion, in former times the scene of so many happy and joyful events, for half a century had been the fountain of happiness, peace and love.

Alas! death had come in the latter days and taken not only one, but three or more of its loved ones to the beautiful spirit realms, and while there was still good and blessing in the home, these great and joyful scenes had been omitted.

And thus the time of our story was really to be an important episode, or like a new birth of pleasure and happiness, we write it in sorrow, yet with somewhat of happy feelings of the great neglect, for truly the chief guests had not been invited, and shall we name them, and tell of their right for this honor? First of all, and most lovingly, there was our Dolly, so good, true and noble, and who, for so many years had been the mother, companion and lover of all the family and all the neighborhood; next, Lill, sparkling, joyful, so full of gladness, her soul beaming with happiness, and the light of all who knew her—surely, she should now come again to rejoice all the hearts; and dear child Tillie, who rested so lovingly in her last earth-castle in the grand parlor, seeming to say, "Oh, I am so tired and long for spirit rest, but why could I not have enjoyed a few more years of life's happiness?" She must be invited. Poor father Arthur, who struggled and fought bravely with the fatal ills and his last just preparing to return home, when the spirits called for him to come away. He, too, should be with us, and with him dear little Albert, who was so cruelly taken from youth's happiness and bliss by the fearful pistol-shot wound. Why not he come again and sing sweetly,

"Jesus, meek and gentle,
Son of God Most High,
Pitying, loving Savior, Hear Thy children cry,"

as he did on his last visit. And Hannah—the pure and lovely lily, so frail and beautiful, alas! too spirituelle for earth's cares and ties, and thus for a long time has been one of the happy spirit band. Surely, these guests should have been invited, and with them come father and mother, brothers, sisters, and oh! such a troop of spirits, which memory calls "way back from childhood days."

But, to our story. The Shakspeare Club were all present, the actors brilliant, the visitors delighted and it was a pleasant entertainment, but—these neglected guests—were they present, did they influence, participate and also enjoy and add happiness?

Moral: Kind reader, these lessons are for you, myself, and all, and those neglected guests, ours to receive or to deny, they come to us at all times, and all seasons, and for good, and maybe for ill.

The world is full of suffering and sorrow; we go heavy laden, sighing, "Who will show us any good?" We mourn for our loved ones as dead in the cold silent tomb or await their coming again at the last trump on Resurrection Morn. A higher faith and happier hope should rejoice that the spirit never dies and may return to us (if he will). We too often repeat old Job's wail of sorrow, "Man is born of sorrow as the sparks fly upwards," and sing Watts' doleful melody, "Ye living souls, come view the ground where ye must shortly lie," and why? Because we live in the actual and do not enjoy the ideal, fill the present with horrors, with no hopes of coming good or thanks for past blessings.

We know little and practice less of the really beautiful, blot out the heavenly and glorious with the dull common-place of life, and these heavenly hosts of which great Saint Paul, old John Milton and all the true prophets, priests and kings have written, which are about us, both when awake and asleep. How seldom do we court their beautiful influences: Are not these spirits almost always neglected guests? Worse than this, we fill life with the dregs of bitterness, invite the evils of hate, malice and sin, dig and delve for riches and worldly honors, and thus must be truly miserable.

Oh, teach them, your children, and practice in daily life the glorious lessons of immortality, and believe the glad tidings of great joy that God's loving angels may continue with us to aid, influence, love and bless.

A Peep Into the Dark Past.

Illustrating the Dark Conditions then Prevailing—A Woman Tortured in the Inquisition of the Roman Catholic Church, as Set Forth in the Protestant Observer.

A Woman Tortured in the Inquisition.

A description of the torture of a woman by the Inquisition, written by the Secretary of the Inquisition, is so rare as to be—so far as the public are concerned—probably unique. Such a description is printed for the first time, and from the original archives of the Inquisition, by Dr. H. C. Lea, in Vol. III, pp. 24-26, of his "History of the Inquisition in Spain," published this year in London, by Macmillan & Co. In this case the charge against the victim was that of not eating pork, and of putting on clean linen on Saturdays. No doubt she was suspected by the Inquisitors of being a relapsed Jew. Her name was Elvira del Campo. She was tried at Toledo, on April 6, 1568. The horrible tortures she had to undergo for such a trifling offense were a disgrace to humanity, and it makes one shudder to observe the cold-blooded way in which the Secretary describes her fearful sufferings. Here is what he writes:—

"She was carried to the torture-chamber and told to tell the truth, when she said she had nothing to say. She was ordered to be stripped and again admonished, but was silent.

"When stripped, she said, 'Senores, I have done all that is said of me and I bear false-witness against myself, for I do not want to see myself in such trouble; please God, I have done nothing.'

"She was told not to bring false testimony against herself but to tell the truth. The tying of the arms was commenced; she said, 'I have told the truth; what have I to tell?'

"She was told to tell the truth and replied, 'I have told the truth and have nothing to tell.'

"One cord was applied to the arms and twisted, and she was admonished to tell the truth but said she had nothing to tell. Then she screamed and said, 'I have done all they say.' Told to tell in detail what she had done she replied, 'I have already told the truth.'

"Then she screamed and said, 'Tell me what you want for I don't know what to say.' She was told to tell what she had done, for she was tortured because she had not done so, and another turn of the cord was ordered.

"She cried, 'Loosen me, Senores, and tell me what I have to say; I do not know what I have done. O Lord, have mercy on me a sinner!'

"Another turn was given and she said, 'Loosen me a little that I may remember what I have to tell; I don't know what I have done; I did not eat pork for it made me sick; I have done everything; loosen me and I will tell the truth.'

"Another turn of the cord was ordered; when she said, 'Loosen me and I will tell the truth; I don't know what I have to tell—loosen me for the sake of God—tell me what I have to say—I did it, I did it—they hurt me Senor—loosen me, loosen me and I will tell it.'

"She was told to tell it and said, 'I don't know what I have to tell—Senor, I did it—I have nothing to tell—Oh, my arms! release me and I will tell it.'

"She was asked to tell what she did, and said, 'I don't know, I did not eat because I did not wish to.' She was asked why she did not wish to and replied, 'Aye! loosen me, loosen me—take me from here and I will tell it when I am taken away—I say that I did not eat it.'

"She was told to speak and said, 'I did not eat it, I don't know why.' Another turn was ordered and she said, Senor, I did not eat it because I did not wish to—release me and I will tell it.'

"She was told to tell what she had done contrary to our Holy Catholic faith. She said, 'Take me from here and tell me what I have to say—they hurt me—Oh, my arms, my arms!' which she repeated many times and went on, 'I don't remember—tell me what I have to say—O wretched me!—I will tell all that is wanted, Senores—they are breaking my arms—loosen me a little—I did everything that is said of me.'

"She was told to tell in detail what she did. She said, 'What am I wanted to tell? I did everything—loosen me for I don't remember what I have to tell—don't you see what a weak woman I am?—Oh! oh! my arms are breaking.'

"More turns were ordered, and as they were given she cried, 'Oh! Oh! loosen me for I don't know what I have to say—Oh, my arms!—I do not know what I have to say—if I did I would tell it.'

"The cords were ordered to be tightened, when she said, 'Senores, have you no pity on a sinful woman?' She was told, yes; if she would tell the truth. She said, 'Senor, tell me, tell me it.'

"The cords were tightened again, and she said, 'I have already said that I did it.' She was ordered to tell it in detail, to which she said, 'I don't know how to tell it, Senor, I don't know.'

"Then the cords were separated and counted, and there were sixteen turns, and in giving the last turn the cord broke.

"She was then ordered to be placed on the Potro. She said, 'Senores, why will you not tell me what I have to say? Senor, put me on the ground, have I not said that I did all?' She was told to tell it. She said, 'I don't remember—take me away—I did what the witnesses say.'

"She was told to tell in detail what the witnesses said. She said, 'Senor, as I have told you, I do not know for certain. I have said that I did all that the witnesses say. Senores, release me, for I do not remember it.'

"She was told to tell it. Oh, oh! they are tearing me to pieces. I have said that I did it. Let me go.' She was told to tell it. She said, 'Senores, it does not help me to say that I did it, and I have admitted that what I have done has brought me to this suffering. Senor, you know the truth. Senores, for God's sake have mercy on me. Oh, Senor, take these things from my arms. Senor, release me, they are killing me.'

"She was tied on the Potro with cords, she was admonished to tell the truth, and the garrotes were ordered to be tightened. She said, 'Senor, do you not see how these people are killing me? Senor, I did it; for God's sake let me go.'

"She was told to tell it. She said, 'Senor, remind me of what I did not know. Senores, have mercy on me; let me go, for God's sake. They have no pity on me. I did it, take me from here and I will remember what I cannot here.'

"She was told to tell the truth, or the cords would be tightened. She said, 'Remind me of what I have to say, for I don't know it. I said that I did not want to eat it. I know only that I did not want to eat it.' And this she repeated many times.

"She was told to tell why she did not want to eat it. She said, 'For the reason that the witnesses say. I don't know how to tell it—miserable that I am that I don't know how to tell it. I say I did it, and, my God, how can I tell it?'

"Then she said that as she did not do it, how could she tell it. 'They will not listen to me. These people want to kill me. Release me and I will tell the truth.'

"She was again admonished to tell the truth. She said, 'I did it, I don't know how I did it. I did it for what the witnesses say. Let me go. I have lost my senses and I don't know how to tell it. Loosen me and I will tell the truth.'

"Then she said, 'Senor, I did it; I don't know how I have to tell it, but I tell it as the witnesses say. I wish to tell it. Take me from here. Senor, as the witnesses say, so I say and confess it.'

"She was told to declare it. She said, 'I don't know how to say it. I have no memory. Lord, you are witness that if I knew how to say anything else I would say it. I know nothing more to say than that I did it, and God knows it.'

[Dr. Lea explains what is here meant by "the Potro." He writes: "The Water Torture was more complicated. The patient was placed on an Escalera or Potro—a kind of trestle, with sharp-edged rungs across it like a ladder. It slanted so that the head was lower than the feet, and at the lower end was a depression in which the head sank, while an iron band around the forehead or throat kept it immovable. Sharp cords, called cordeles, which cut into the flesh, attached the arms and legs to the side of the trestle, and others, known as garrotes from sticks thrust in them and twisted around like a torniquet, till the cords cut more or less deeply into the flesh, the thighs and calves; a bastezo, or iron prong, distended the mouth; a toca, or strip of linen, was thrust down the throat to conduct water trickling slowly from a jarra or jar, holding usually a little more than a quart. The patient strangled, and gasped, and suffocated, and at intervals the toca was withdrawn and he was adjured to tell the truth. The severity was measured by the number of jars consumed, sometimes reaching to six or eight."]

"She said many times, 'Senores, Senores, nothing helps me. You, Lord, hear that I tell the truth and can say no more. They are tearing out my soul: order them to loosen me.' Then she said, 'Senor, I did it to observe that Law.' She was asked what Law. She said, 'The Law that the witnesses say. I declare it all, Senor, and don't remember what Law it was. Oh, wretched was the mother that bore me.'

"She was asked what was the Law she meant, and what was the Law that she said that the witnesses say. This was asked repeatedly, but she was silent, and at last said that she did not know.

"She was told to tell the truth or the garrotes would be tightened, but she did not answer. Another turn was ordered on the garrotes, and she was admonished to say what Law it was. She said, 'If I knew what to say I would say it. Oh, Senor, I don't know what I have to say. Oh, oh! they are killing me—if they would tell me what—Oh, Senores! Oh, my heart!'

"Then she asked why they wished her to tell what she could not tell, and cried repeatedly, 'Oh, miserable me!' Then she said, 'Lord, bear witness that they are killing me without my being able to confess.'

"She was told that if she wished to tell the truth before the water was poured, she should do so and discharge her conscience. She said that she could not speak, and that she was a sinner. Then the linen toca was placed (in her throat) and she said, 'Take it away, I am strangled and sick in the stomach.'

"A jar of water was then poured down, after which she was told to tell the truth. She clamored for confession, saying she was dying. She was told that the torture would be continued till she told the truth, and was admonished to tell it, but though she was questioned repeatedly she remained silent. Then the inquisitor, seeing her exhausted by the torture, ordered it to be suspended."

Dr. Lea, after giving the above cited report of the case by the Secretary of the local Inquisition, thus concludes the painful narrative:—

"It is scarce worth while to continue this pitiful detail. Four days were allowed to elapse, for experience showed that an interval, by stiffening the limbs, rendered repetition more painful. She was brought again to the torture-chamber, but she broke down when stripped and piteously begged to have her nakedness covered. The interrogatory went on, when her replies under torture were more rambling and incoherent than before, but her limit of endurance was reached, and the Inquisitors finally had the satisfaction of eliciting a confession of Judaism and a prayer for mercy and penance."

PSYCHOLOGICAL.

Rocks of the desert and clods o'the valley,
Prone in your silence, how long will ye lay?
The Master, true, calleth spirits to rally,—
The battle is on, with the dawn of each day.

To serve as breastworks, be crushed, walked over,
And sat on, to hide your nonentity,
Out on the fighting-line, not under cover,
Wake! we are wanted for our—density.

Polished ye would adorn some mansion fair;
Crushed ye could nurture sweet flowers and fruits,
For us there's no life lying alone and bare,
We're being called now, for needed recruits.

Come rocks and clods, with good resolution
Up! leave old "Babylon," alone in her night,
She hath brought upon us dire desolation;
She is the millenium scourge and blight.

Ye great rugged peaks, that recline o'er the deep;
Mystical your silence over the main,
Your vigils of God's infinite love ye'll keep,
'Til He brings earth's wand'rers home again.

You're to bring sweet spices, and gems and stones,
Sapphiress and beryls,—diamond and grain;
To the All-Father's feet, casting down your thrones,
While He brings earth's wand'rers home again.

"Been fruitful, multiplied, replenish'd the planet,'
With a race that never can Eden restore?
Obey God's Laws—and grow angels upon it,
And heaven is ours on this mortal shore.

THE HOME CIRCLE.

Excellent Results That Flow Therefrom.

For about a year and six months I have had psychic phenomena in my home, where as many as seventy-five spirits have controlled in unconscious and semi-conscious trance two ladies in the circle, and spoken in distinct tone of voice, and some have spoken in independent voice, while some communications were received by telepathy and some by automatic writing.

Some of the spirits have proven their identity by things said, or by appearing on a photograph, as agreed, and some have been recognized by several clairvoyants present. An alleged Frenchman has written in French, and an Egyptian has spoken in an unknown tongue. An alleged priest has spoken in Latin.

They do not claim to be infallible, but they are in a position to know more about heaven than mortals who have never been there.

Magnetism appears to be the connecting link, and neither spirits nor mortals have been able to produce the desired kind or quality necessary to obtain good results at all times.

After each meeting I write from memory what was said, some of which in sentences is as follows:

"It is necessary to have harmony and a desire for spiritual blessings, with an honest purpose to follow truth, independent of what Mother Grundy might think, in order that high spirits may be attracted and form their bands to protect sensitives from evil spirits, those who brought revenge with them, and have not yet outgrown it.

"We rejoice when we can commune with mortals, and when in your ignorance you slam the door and cry 'ghost,' there is sorrow in heaven, though you sing, 'There will be no more sorrow there.'

"Some spirits wander in darkness a long time before they are willing to advance out of false teaching, and you have no idea of the magnitude of our work, and our need of intelligent teachers. Truth, love and brotherhood is gaining slowly. Greed and politics, with so much injustice and dishonor, is hell.

"There is repentance and growth in knowledge and character here. We can see through your bodies and diagnose diseases, and for nervous affections no treatment can equal spiritual magnetism, imparted through a medium."

Several people have been cured by this treatment, and one surgical operation prevented when attending physician said it must be done.

The spirits have informed me what I was thinking about and what doing at a certain time and place, which was correct.

When one spirit could not answer our questions, he called a higher one, who could answer them, and he said: "Yes, I have seen Christ. He was a good man, and taught love and brotherhood."

We were surprised to hear our baby, who was six months old, laugh in her sleep; then a spirit girl controlled and said: "Uncle Billy, I made her laugh playing with her."

A bride who had passed to spirit life four days previous, who knew a lady present, came and said: "Why don't my people speak to me?" Another spirit took charge of the dear one to instruct her.

Some asked our prayers, and later thanked us for help given.

Clairvoyants saw William McKinley and George Washington; the former said: "Never be afraid to face any man with truth, that will finally prevail. This spot of harmony is a light for angels. God bless you, and if you need help, think of me and I will come."

The latter said: "In time of peace prepare for war. When in earth I had a spirit band, but was unconscious of it until I came to this side."

One said: "I was a preacher and regret much what I proclaimed as truth. The truth is coming slowly within the churches. The Crapsey trial was a good thing to awaken thought."

The Egyptian said he was in the third sphere of the seventh realm, and could speak all languages.

Another said: "I was a Methodist minister named Stevens, and passed from earth in 1752. Do what you can to remove the dense ignorance of so many."

Others said: "You will get materializations, and your loved ones will shake hands with you. It takes patience, and we have to condense magnetism and do other work that you would not understand if we told you."

One spirit said he felt my thought, and came in answer to it, and in reply to my question as to where he was at the time, he said: "I might have been in England. Distance has no meaning with us because we can travel with the rapidity of thought. I passed out about one hundred years ago in England at the age of fifty-eight years. I was with you at the Pythian Temple meeting, and the room was filled with spirits. Spiritualism is popular in heaven, and I think truth would be advanced on earth if it was called by some other name, because the fraud element has disgusted many."

Nearly all meetings continued an hour and were dismissed by the guardian spirit, by benediction or by singing "Blest Be the Tie that Binds."

EPITAPH

On a Tired Maid-of-All-Work.

"Here lies a poor woman who always was tired,
For she lived in a house where help was not hired;
Her last words on earth were: "Dear friends, I am going
Where washing ain't done, nor sweeping, nor sewing;
But everything there is exact to my wishes,
For where they don't eat there's no washing of dishes.
I'll be where loud anthems will always be ringing,
But having no voice, I'll be clear of the singing.
Don't mourn for me now, don't mourn for me never;
For I'm going to do nothing forever and ever

From Dream to Vision of Life

By Lilian Whiting, Author of "The World Beautiful," "The Spiritual Significance," "The Outlook Beautiful," etc.

This book finds its keynote in the question asked by the Archbishop of Canterbury—"The Life Beyond,—what it it? What is its bearing on these present working years?" To the discussion of this vital problem Miss Whiting brings the results of modern scientific research and that peculiar spiritual clairvoyance which has been remarked in "The Life Radiant" and some of her other books. It is written with a certain joyous vitality that communicates itself to the reader in a certain radiance and liberation of new energies. Price $1.00 net.

Germs of Mind in Plants

By R. H. France, Translated by A. M. Simons.—Cloth, Illustrated, 50 Cents.

A cardinal point in the philosophical systems favored by the ruling classes is that the mind of man is something unique in the universe, governed by laws of its own that have no particular connection with physical laws. Modern science has proved that not only animals, but also plants receive impressions from the outside world and use data thus obtained to modify their movements for their own advantage, exactly as human beings do. These facts are told in this book in so charming and entertaining a style that the reader is carried along and does not realize until later the revolutionary significance of the facts.

Song Books

New and Enlarged Edition of
C. P. LONGLEY'S
Choice Collection of Beautiful Songs,

Containing ninety charming songs for home, camps, circles and meetings—words and music, including "Only a Thin Vail Between Us," and its companion piece; also beautiful words set to choice music, from the poetical works of Lilian Whiting. Of the latter, Miss Whiting writes Prof. Longley her pleasure at his setting to her poems and declares herself honored at the dainty music he has given her words. President Barrett of the N. S. A. writes that wherever he goes he finds the songs of Mr. Longley sung at meetings and by the friends and he affirms it as his opinion that Longley's musical compositions have ennobled the world. Price per copy, 50 cents bound in boards; 75 cents in cloth. wholesale rates made to societies, and dealers.

The Haunted Bungalow.

The Narrative Comes from India, and is Related by an Eye Witness, and Published Prominently in the Hindu Spiritual Magazine, of Calcutta. It is Thrillingly Interesting, and Illustrates the Prevalence of Occult Forces.

Below is published a ghost story over the signature of "Micro," who is a well known member of our society. In a private letter to us the writer says that the story is "real, the best authenticated and the most thrilling one that has been made public during the century." The teller of the story, who saw everything with his own eyes, is a highly educated Indian, who has had a training in England, and who is a brother of one of the leading pleaders of the United Provinces. The Talukdar mentioned is a Rajah Bahadur. The Bungalow is situated in an Oudh district.

In these days of vigorous psychical research and strenuous effort to place ghostology within the range of practical science,—when, indeed, ghost-seeing has not only ceased to be a proof of disordered fancy but ghosts are being nightly summoned to appear before our eyes to be photographed, I think I need make no apology for narrating the following ghost story which I, as well as everyone else who hears or reads it, must admit to be one of the most thrilling and convincing that have been made public.

A little over three months ago, I was talking over the evening tea, at a friend's house in Lucknow, with some other friends, when there entered, muffled in a heavy ulster and an enormous comforter, a gentleman whom our host at once recognized as an old friend of his. After the usual greetings and exchange of a few kind inquiries, our host introduced him to us as Baboo Dey, B. A., Ph. D. In course of conversation on light social topics which followed, we came to learn that our new friend was not merely a well read, but also a very well-traveled man, and was, besides, possessed of a vast store of information and experience on diverse subjects and a spirit of adventure to be rarely met with in a graduate of our modern Indian Universities. What struck us more and tickled our admiration was that he seemed, besides, to be scrupulously honest and truthful in what he let fall from his lips. Soon enough our conversation assumed a grave aspect and we found ourselves all ranged together, in a tough metaphysical fight, against the new-comer, whose matter-of-fact ways of putting serious things and whose outrageously materialistic ideas of life and its objects, almost roused our indignation. As the fight waxed hotter, we were pushed from antology into the sphere of mental phenomena, and from mental phenomena slipping into metempsychosis, we finally plunged in despair into ghostology to maintain our position. But here again, we met such an unexpected reverse that it almost snuffed out, at a single blow, all our hope of making a stand any longer against our formidable antagonist.

"You all talk of ghosts," he said, "but have you seen one yourself, that is, any of you?"

We, of course, had to admit that none of us had ever had any such experience, but that we held out, there were innumerable well-attested phenomena on record which might serve to support our contentions.

"Pshaw!" was his indignant reply. "You take refuge under hearsay, while I can tell you of ghosts—real, live, concrete ghosts—which I have seen myself with my own widely open eyes, just a few years back."

This almost took away our breath and made us gape in wonder at him for a moment. The next, we threw our arguments to the winds and pressed him, in a wild chorus, to tell us of the ghosts he had himself seen. This unusual eagerness on our part, due to most of us present there not having heard a ghost story at first hand, made the usual look of placid reserve in his matter-of-fact face broaden into a smile as he began his story at once. I give it in his own style and manner only withholding the names of the place of occurrence and its Taluqdar from the public for private reasons.

The Story as Told by Mr. Dey.

Ten years before, it was, in September, 1897, that I was appointed manager to the estate of a well known Taluqdar of Oudh and I hastened to join my appointment from Benares. My route lay by the Oudh and Rohilkhand Railway up to the Akahbarpur station whence I had to travel about thirty miles over pucca roads on an elephant. I reached my destination in the afternoon, and almost immediately had an interview with my employer, Raja, who not merely treated me with courtesy and kindness, but seemed solicitous to make my stay with him as pleasant and comfortable as lay in his power. Finding me rather tired out after my long ride, he sent me, with some of his officers, to choose lodgings for myself from among a few houses he asked them to show me over. I saw all one by one, but they, unfortunately, looked so damp and dirty that I could not among themselves, one of them My look of disappointment was, however, noticed by the Raja's men and after conversing in an under tone tone among themselves, one of them told me that there was a good bungalow about a mile and a half from the village which might suit my liking and requirements. It had belonged formerly, they said, to a European indigo planter who sold it to a relative of the Raja and retired. If I requested the Raja to give it to me for the purpose of my lodgings I might have it.

This proposal picked up my drooping spirit and I straightway went back to the Raja and after informing him of the unsuitability of the houses shown to me for my residence, I asked him if he could let me have the Indigo planter's bungalow. I discovered a quick look of concern in the eyes of the Raja as soon as I made the request, and he glanced at me and said, "Yes, there is such a Bungalow, but it won't suit you. Besides, it is situated at some distance from the village in an open and lonely spot."

"The lonelier the better for me," I said at once. "But as to its suiting me or not, may I see it once?"

"No, you need not trouble yourself about seeing it. It is not a place where you should put up."

"Why? Is it not habitable or is it dilapidated?"

"Not at all. It is all right in that respect." The Raja looked troubled, as I could see, and quite at a loss what to say. He paused for a few seconds and resumed, "But I can't ask anybody to live there for a single night, much less a respectable man like you who is again my manager."

I don't know, but the d—l was in my mood at the time and I persisted in asking "Why?"

"Because," he replied with the faintest disquiet in his voice, "the house is notoriously haunted and none who stop there at night is expected to come out alive in the morning." I raised my brows in an amused surprise, my disbelief in ghosts was very solid. The idea of a house being haunted—I could have laughed to scorn had the Raja been my friend instead of my master. As it was, I checked the temptation and said gravely, "If that is all your objection to my putting up at the bungalow, I would beg you to kindly have it opened and arranged for me. I tell you, Raja Shahib, no ghost will appear before me simply because I do not believe in such a thing."

The Raja, however, could not, for a long while, be persuaded to accede to my request; for, as he put it, he could not consent to be a party to an arrangement which could not but prove the death of me. But I was inexorable and he at last very reluctantly gave in and passed the necessary orders for arranging it for my residence.

In an hour or more I was informed that it was ready for my occupation and I started on foot for the bungalow. On my way, my own servant, an old and trusty man whom I had brought from Benares, asked leave from me for a short time to see a relative of his who resided at a short distance from the village. I said, "All right, but you must come back as soon as you can." He bowed and departed. I walked on and reached the bungalow at dusk.

I entered the compound of the bungalow through an outer gate from which, some thirty straight paces off, stood the bungalow covered with tiled slanting roof. I had to mount some steps which led to the front door which being entered, I found myself in a side room in which the Raja's men greeted me and led me into the hall in the middle of which they had placed a Charpoy for my bed, and a small writing table and a single chair while my baggage and portmanteau had been set down near the wall behind my bed. I was too tired to inspect the house just then, although, on inspecting it the next morning I found it to contain two large side-rooms, two small side-rooms and the hall which had been arranged for me for the night. As I took my seat in the chair beside the table, the Raja's men asked permission of me to go and arrange for my dinner which they would bring later on. I said, "All right," and they left.

The Raja had provided me with one or two kerosine lamps, one burning in the hall and another in the side-room through which I had come into the hall. I thought the light not quite bright and I got up and taking out a candle from my portmanteau, lighted it and placed it in a holder on the table. The candle was a large and thick one and its pretty big flame threw a bright light around the room. This cheered me and led me to think that if I had not persisted in my request for the bungalow I would have been very miserable that night, inside one of the hovels in which the Raja had asked me to lodge, and I laughed within myself at the idea of such a house being called haunted despite all the look of concern and seriousness with which the Raja had assured me it was. In sober truth, I had taken the Raja to be as credulous and superstitious, as most up-country Hindus, and expected no more to see a ghost within those walls than in any other place. It was an utter folly, I concluded, to consign such a decent place of habitation to such neglect, disuse and disrepair because of what a few imaginative cowards had fancied to have seen in it and gossiped about.

I do not remember how long I kept thinking in this strain until I recollected having promised to write to my brother the result of my first interview with the Raja and a description of my duties and responsibilities. I rose from my chair and getting some writing materials from my trunk placed them upon the table, resumed my seat in the chair and began to write the letter. I had not proceeded far when I heard some voices outside the bungalow towards the front door, and presently some of the Raja's men entered the room with my dinner and after placing it in a corner, salaamed me before departing, when I asked them if they had seen my own servant return from his visit to the relative. They answered in the negative. I then told them to send him to me immediately he returned. They nodded and said they would do as I bade them, and departed.

The one thing I noticed in these fellows was their look of gravity, not unmixed with fear, and the hurry in which they seemed to leave the place. This was, of course, as could be expected of the ignorant classes of people to which these servants belonged considering the bad name the bungalow had got, and so their mysterious demeanor did not affect me very much.

I have said that the hall in which I sat had two side-rooms along its length and two along its breadth. The table was placed in the middle of the hall, and as I sat in the chair, beyond the other side of the table, just in front of me was the midde door of the side-room by which I had entered the hall, which door corresponded to the front door. This middle door in front of me stood open, while all the other doors remained shut. The small rooms situated to my left and my right had each one door between them and the hall, while the large rooms at my back and in my front had each three doors between them and the hall. Of these eight doors, all remained shut except the one in front of me leading on to the front door.

I resumed the writing of the letter, and had almost come to the end of it when I perceived and heard the closed door of the room to my right open about a foot and a half and, as I looked at it I distinctly saw it was opened by a dark brown hand clothed from the wrist up to the elbow (up to which point only it was visible) with a black coat-sleeve. As I was looking at it, it vanished. This made me suspicious that somebody must be concealing himself in that room for the purpose of playing pranks upon and frightening me when I slept. I got on my legs at once, and snatching up the candle from the table, proceeded towards the room and entered it.

To my surprise, there was nobody in that room. Man or beast or bird, there was no living thing in it, or even dead for that matter. It was entirely bare and empty, and what was more, it had no other door on any other side except the one by which I entered. Nor had it any window except two sky-lights, small and secured by pretty close iron gratings, high up near the ceiling, in the wall opposite to the door.

This disappointing discovery made me rather uneasy. There, indeed, could be no mistake about my seeing the black-sleeved hand. It was so distinct and I had the opportunity to look at it for full five seconds, before it was withdrawn, with the candle-light full upon it. What could it then be? Whose was it? Was it then only a delusion? If so, who had opened the door? The suggestion struggled to rise within me—it might be the work of the breeze blowing in the rooms just then or before. All the same, no other explanation of the phenomenon could be gotten up, try, however, I might, than that of the deluded eye and the breeze, and so I came out of the room, shutting the door completely and carefully after me, and sat again at the table for finishing my letter.

As I wrote, I kept glancing every now and again at the closed door of the mysterious room as if expecting some fresh phenomenon. My mind was undoubtedly disturbed and it was with difficuty that I could collect my thoughts and form my ideas to transcribe the last few lines of the letter, so that it must have been more than twenty minutes before I found myself about to sign my name. Now I started, and looking in the direction of that door, saw both its panels open their widest and instantly a man, dressed in a pair of paijamas, a black coat, and a white turban, come out through it into the hall and advancing towards me two or three steps, bend the upper part of his body low, raise his right hand to his forehead, and make three salaams to me with all the reverence and submission one could expect from an obedient up-country servant. As he was doing this, I further remarked that he wore also the usual chaprasi's sash with a badge hung from the left shoulder across the chest. But the most remarkable thing about him was his face, which, though copper-colored, as it appeared to be in complexion, seemed to be totally expressionless, that is, looked more like that of a dead man than of one alive. This unusual or unearthly look in his face sent a shudder through my frame; and even as I sat gazing at him, he turned on his heels, walked noiselessly back into the room—and vanished.

I heaved a sigh, and a greater sense of terror than what I had felt when the figure stood before me, took possession of me. Then the Raja's fears and warnings rushed into my mind and for the first time I came to think that my position was full of danger. But what was I to do now? I was alone, aye, not even my servant was with me. I was expecting the fellow to come back from his relative since ever so long. The rascal was perhaps sleeping in his relative's place, quite forgetful of my need and danger. I inwardly swore at the man and resolved to teach him well when he turned up. Unless he had gone to sleep, he must, I thought, be coming back to me.

Meanwhile what was I to do? Should I remain in the house or run away? No, run away I should not. It would look so cowardly after all my vaunt to the Raja about my courage. But even if I were prepared to risk the shame, it was a long way off. To run from the bungalow to the village, quite one-and-a-half miles, and then to rouse the men. But whom to arouse? I did not know any of the Raja's men by name, nor knew where they lived. No, no, it won't do. I must stay where I was and await further developments, whatever their risk of danger.

Thus fortifying my shaken spirits with such poor materials, I tried to wear the best face I could upon the situation. It was then about midnight and my dinner stood yet untasted where it had been left in the corner. I could scarcely think of eating it, much less feel any appetite which was swallowed up by the extremely uneasy sensation from which I suffered. Indeed, all efforts to steady my nerves proved futile and at length all that remained for me now was to keep staring at the open door through which the apparition had come out and vanished, while my mind worked incessantly at conjecturing what the next act in this supernatual drama, of which I was the only witness, would be like. And I had to wait long, about two hours, I believe, sitting and staring at the door all the time, my mind distracted by countless thoughts, my imagination conjuring up strange and horrid scenes.

Once or twice towards the end of this long torturing interval, I thought of once again entering the room and examining it with closer circumspection with a view to find out if there was any possibility of any human human agency being at work, say, through some mysterious trap door in the floor or in any of the walls. But I remembered that the walls were all clean and whitewashed and that there was nothing suspicious in the smooth bare floor. Besides, the deadly look in the face of the apparition was the best proof that he was nothing which lived in the flesh. Presently, all suppositions were knocked out and any suspicions I had, completely disarmed. Even as I kept staring, the figure of a woman dressed in a white saree glided out of the room into the hall until she walked up to my table, just on the opposite side, and turning towards me and bending her head until her chin touched her breast, she joined her hands in an attitude of supplication. I thought she would speak. But she did not utter a word or make the slightest sound. She only stood before me across the table, her open palms joined in earnest appeal, her head drooping on her chest as though in shame. She stood thus for, I believe, full five minutes, and as I stared at her in terror, I saw that she looked every inch an aristocratic Hindoo lady, probably of the Kahatriya caste, her limbs were so finely shaped, the features of her face so delicately handsome in spite of the death-palor which also seemed to shroud her fair complexion. This palor was, however, not so prominently noticeable in her face owing to the fact that it appeared to be smeared with tumeric, as high-class Chhatri women are usually seen to smear their faces, while her hair, made up and parted in the middle, was smoothed down with wax after the fashion of high-caste Hindoo women in these parts of the country. I could not, however, get any clear view of her face or its expression, as she kept hanging it down. It seemed to me that she was thus mutely begging of me something she was ashamed to ask openly. And three or four times I tried to put to her the question—"what is it you ask?"

I say I tried—yes, I tried hard to utter the words, but I could not; my tongue clung to the roof of my mouth out of sheer terror, my mouth was all dry, and try however I might, backed by the boldness born of desperation; and pity for the supplicating figure before me. At the end of five minutes in this position she turned and glided back towards the room from which she issued, with very quick but noiseless steps. There was also one thing very remarkable about her, she walked very quickly, and as soon as she had reached the door she turned again and walked back towards me with something in her arms. Before I had time to notice what it was that she carried, she reached my table and, on it she threw down a still-born child!

I started violently, caught the arm of the chair with my left hand and nail rose from my seat at the distinct thud of the throwing of the child and the very perceptible shaking of the table and stared down at the child with my eyelids opened their widest, every hair on my head and body standing its straightest. The child lay there, a full-formed child, but for ten seconds only, after which—it vanished! And as I looked up from the table towards the woman, who also was standing beside the table all the while the child lay on the table—she had vanished too.

had vanished too!

I remained in that posture, half risen from my seat, my left hand tightly clutching the left arm of my chair, my feet rooted to the floor where I stood, my head turned to my left and my eyes fixed upon the half lighted gloom of the mysterious room, when from it again come out the first apparition—the chaprasi—and made towards me. My mind and eyes were both dazed and the only thing which I felt working in me was a mighty effort against swooning. Meanwhile, the figure came up to the table, took the candle up in his right hand, and with his left beckoned me to follow him, as he advanced towards the open door of the side room through which I had entered the bungalow. My mind now worked with lightning speed. Should I follow as I was bid, or remain where I was? If I did the former, I thought, he might lead me to some danger or kill me. But something whispered again, so far both the male and female apparitions had been rather submissive than aggressive in their behavior, and if I refused to follow the chaprasi now, it might anger him and lead him to harm me. These thoughts flashed to me within a few seconds and my mind was made up, for there was no other alternative but to do his bidding.

I followed him as he led me across the side room, and out into the open ground, through the front door and down the steps, with the candle-stick still in his hand. It was a bright moonlit night and a gentle breeze was blowing which cooled my brains a little as I mechanically walked behind the ghost. He made for a jack tree which stood in front of the bungalow a little to the right. Reaching within three or four feet of its trunk, he placed the candle on the ground, pointed to me in an earnest manner the top of the tree with his right hand and then bending low scratched the ground near the place where he had placed the candle with the fingers of the same hand as if to indicate that both the top of the tree and the ground at the foot had some mystery concealed. He then drew up, turned on his heels and glided back towards the front door of the bungalow. I watched his retracing figure till he went up the steps, entered the front door and disappeared.

I then turned my eyes from the bungalow to the candle and sat in the open air gazing at its flickering flame, for how long I do not remember. I had no wish any more to see any fresh phenomenon from the other world in which I had hitherto no sort of belief whatever. Those I had already seen within the last few hours were enough for my nerves which had now been tried to their utmost. I now thought of nothing but the morning as I squatted down there on the grass beside the candle. It must be more than a couple of hours that I sat there, cooled by the breeze and reassured by the moonlight in which everything around me was brightly bathed.

Suddenly I started, as I heard some voices behind me, and, as I turned back, I saw four sturdy fellows with huge sticks in their hands approaching and salaaming me. Before I uttered a word, one of them informed me that they had been sent by the Raja at night to keep watch in the bungalow against any harm that might come to me, and that they had been keeping watch all night at different points of the house. But now finding huzoor (that is myself) sitting under the jack tree, they had come up to ask if I had come to any harm or had been frightened. This made me laugh so I saw through their lie at once. The fellows had indeed, been bid by the Raja to watch the bungalow, but being mortally afraid of it, had kept away and after spending the night in sleep at some safe distance, had come to lie and tell me that they had been watching the house all through the night. I told them they were brave fellows, but I had come to no harm.

It was now dawn, and so I rose from where I sat and entered the bungalow in company with the fellows to pack up my things and take leave of the house; for, I was not inclined to have a taste of another night's apparitions. But I did not like to have the Raja believe that I had got frightened and so the removal was made as smoothly as possible, the Raja being informed that the bungalow was too far away from the village and that therefore I would select one of the houses shown me on the previous day. This was done before evening, my runaway servant having returned in the meantime, making all sorts of excuses and helped me in the removal. It appeared he had been frightened by his relatives whom he had gone to visit from passing the night in the bungalow, but I made no fuss about it, keeping a discrete silence all through, answering even the Raja evasively when he asked me if I had seen anything over night.

Days went on and I proceeded with the duties of my post as if nothing had happened to disturb my mind. I could not, however, help making inquiries about the bungalow and its previous occupants whenever an opportunity offered in the hope of finding a clue to the strange phenomena I had witnessed. By and by I came to what I believed the root of the story, for the things I learnt appeared to offer a satisfactory explanation of the strange scenes in the haunted house. I was informed that the house had passed from the hands of the indigo planter who was its first possessor into the possession of a tolerably well-to-do family of the village in satisfaction of an unpaid debt. The family consisted of a mother, and her grown-up son with his wife. Soon after they had got possession of and moved into the house the son got convicted of a penal offence and was sentenced by the district court of——to one year's rigorous imprisonment. During his absence his young wife unfortunately contracted a liaison with a good-looking khitmudgar of the house and got enciente. Her husband, on his return from prison, after his term was over, discovered how things stood, whispers about which had reached the poor fellow when he was serving out his term in jail. The reports having been confirmed by what he saw, in wild fury his first act on his return was to kick his wife in the stomach which caused an instantaneous miscarriage, the child being a still-born one and the mother dying soon after. The stabbing of the offending khitmudgar was a natural sequence to this tragedy and it did not take more than a few minutes to follow the first scene of horror. The story goes that all three, the dead wife, the khitmudgar and the still-born child were buried deep at the foot of the jack tree to which the ghost had led me; and though many suspected no one was inclined to utter any whisper about how and where the young woman and her paramour had disappeared. It was generally understood that they had eloped. The young man and his mother died natural deaths in their respective times and there are now only the apparitions to give a clue to a mournful tale to the unwary stranger who might pass a night in the haunted bungalow. A GOOD SUGGESTION.

Sing to Departing Souls and Make Their Departure Easier—Even Humming to Yourself Will Check Attack of Nervous Prostration Due to Noises of Great City. Special Time Devised to Prepare Patient to Undergo Operation, Another Ready to Calm Spirits in All Stages of Transition.

The London, Eng., higher thought center lately listened approvingly to a lecture by MacBeth Bain, one of the higher thinkers, of the power of music to heal and quicken.

One of the higher thoughts submitted by the lecturer was that there is only one cure for nervous prostration caused by the continual crash of heavy traffic and the other deafening noises of a great city. This cure, he said, was the indulgence of the sufferer in melodious tune.

Even Humming Will Do.

The lecturer did not suggest that, at the approach of a lumbering omnibus or trolley car, the victim should forthwith raise his voice in gladsome song. It would, he declared, be sufficient to sing inaudibly, "in his soul." Nor did it matter whether the song had words or not nor whether the sufferer was able to sing tunefully, provided he had his soul inspiration in harmony.

The lecture was illustrated by several short songs adapted for special occasions. These were sung by Mrs. Davis, another higher thinker.

These songs are designed to meet various afflictions besides outrageous noises. One calm, compelling strain was prescribed as being suitable to combating the din awakened by a motor omnibus.

Useful to Departing Souls.

Some others recommended as useful to sing to departing souls, to souls just after they have departed, to disembodied souls and souls in various other stages of transition.

There also was a lullaby, which was advocated as being soothing to a patient about to undergo an operation.

Sleep-Walker Robs Own House.

Detroit, Mich., July 17.—Mrs. Mills Manning discovered to-day that it was she who rifled her husband's pockets as she slept, abstraced his paper money, tore it to fragments, and hid the pieces in a woodshed. She also found that she had been stealing her own silverware, which was found with the destroyed money. Police who watched the house last night, caught Mrs. Manning walking in her sleep, in the act of depositing a fresh installment of torn money.—Chicago Tribune.

Bad Teaching Makes Criminals.

In the whole history of American jurisprudence we greatly question if the demoralizing influence of a false system of religious belief is so well marked as is shown on the trial of Haywood, in Idaho, which everybody reads, hence the more value as an object lesson.

Orchard, under oath as a State witness, told of his multitude of crimes. He was a wholesale murderer to begin with, followed by innumerable lesser crimes, as larceny, bigamy, conspiracy, any one of which was punishable in the penitentiary. Then, arrested and held for trial, with the gallows or electrocuting chair staring him in the face, he is taught by a professed disciple of Jesus that he can "get religion," and work out his guilt in the "blood of the Lamb." This will save him from punishment in a future life, and as an orthodox believer, rescued from perdition by belief, his veracity is established among the self-styled saints.

Judging from the evidence, this monster criminal planned to turn State's evidence, then labored to shift his crimes upon innocent persons, by perjury, swearing he was the tool, a hired assassin, at about one hundred dollars a head for each victim slaughtered.

Another wash in blood will efface the later guilt of perjury, so Mr. Orchard, having deceived court and jury by criminal lying, expects to escape human justice. And as Eternal Justice rejoices more over one guilty person who repents than over ninety and nine just persons, so the bloody-handed wretch will be welcomed to the pearly courts, and golden streets with a warmth that has no equal.

Were it not we were piously raised, to emphasize our contempt for such a system of religious faith, we fear some swear words would thoughtlessly fall from our pen, for we cannot help thinking them.

An Independent Thinker Writes

Goldwin Smith, the eminent scholar of Montreal, well known to all American readers, has lately written the New York Sun, expressing his opinion that the religious world is in a transition condition, a sort of revolution, which is very liable to develop into quite a different thing from the past.

We quote:

"We have come to the point at which we must speak no more of orthodoxy and heterodoxy, but only of truth and falsehood. The case is urgent. Between the discoveries of criticism and those of science, the latter including the complete annihilation of the geocentric illusion, the religious foundation on which Christian society as well as Christian hope has hitherto rested is visibly giving way. * * * In the new theology it appears in place of the deity hitherto worshiped, the Creator, Father, Ruler and Judge, is substituted, a being pervading the universe, including man, and identified with it, but under the necessity of self-limitation that he may consciously realize his own existence. Haeckel would at once challenge us to produce any actual proof of the existence of such a being, and nothing that I can see in the manifesto of new theology as it lies before me would enable us to meet the challenge. Special and peculiar views respecting morality and other features of the dispensation dependent on the general theory would of course be involved in its rejection. Some of them seem to me extremely surprising in themselves."

Here is a definition, by this philosopher that is sustained by common sense, and is greatly preferable to the one given us by lexicographers:

"Miracle is an aureole woven by simple devotion around the adored head. It does not necessarily vitiate the rest of the history, but it is incapable of rationalization."

A Misleading Author.

InQuackenbos' Rhetoric, occurs the following:

"Celtic was itself an offshoot from the Hebrew or Phenician tongue; thus etymology, as well as profane history, confirms the account given by Moses of the peopling of the earth from one family. A marked resemblance may still be observed between the Hebrew and Welsh of the present day."

How strange that men of letters, with a modicum of common sense, could thus write. The people known as Hebrews had no language of their own. They used the Phenician tongue, and the Phenician characters in writing, just as English speaking people in America use the English tongue.
